Mr. STEWART. Where does he stop? I want to strike out the whole paragraph down to and including the word "dollars" in line 24.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When the Senator offered the amendment——

Mr. STEWART. I did not have the bill before me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was to strike out down to and including the word "dollars" in line 19. Now the Senator proposes to strike out all of the paragraph down to the end of it?

Mr. STEWART. Yes. It will be observed that it is very much mixed and confused. For instance, it says:

Chief inspector and deputy health officer, $1,800.

I do not see any necessity for a deputy at all.

Mr. McCOMAS. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. STEWART. I want to point out——

Mr. McCOMAS. It is on the point of the deputy health officer. Under the statute the deputy can do certain things when the health officer is not there, or during the thirty or sixty days, whatever time it is, when he takes his summer vacation. When he takes his little leave of absence there are two deputy health officers—Mr. McLean, the very efficient chief clerk, who is by law also——

Mr. STEWART. Let me go along and analyze it.

Mr. McCOMAS. You said there was no need for this officer.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think there is.

Mr. McCOMAS. I want to show that the law would fall if he were abolished.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think so.

Mr. McCOMAS. I will take occasion to show it later on.

Mr. STEWART. You can do it later on. Let me have a little time.

Six sanitary and food inspectors, at $1,200 each; sanitary and food inspector, who shall also inspect dairy products and shall be a practical chemist, $1,800.

That will be retained in the amendment.

Sanitary and food inspector, who shall be a veterinary surgeon, and act as inspector of live stock and dairy farms, $1,200.

There is no necessity for a veterinary surgeon in this office. They want to inspect the farms. There is no necessity of having one here at all. They want to be out inspecting the farms. They do not belong here, for the sick cows are not here to be examined.

Inspector of marine products, $1,200; chief clerk and deputy health officer, $2,200.

There is no necessity for it. I have made him the inspector of milk, and given him some direct duties.

Clerk, $1,400; four clerks, two of whom may act as sanitary and food inspectors——

Mr. MALLORY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him what bill he is reading from?

Mr. STEWART. The House bill.

Mr. MALLORY. I have it before me, and I do not seem to catch on.

Mr. STEWART. On page 60 you will see it.

Mr. MALLORY. I have it.

Mr. STEWART. Line 11—

Chief clerk and deputy health officer, $2,200.

By my amendment, I make him inspector of dairies and give him control of that subject, so that there shall be some order about it.

Clerk, $1,400; four clerks, two of whom may act as sanitary and food inspectors, at $1,200 each.

They may act in this way. It is all mixed up.

Mr. McCOMAS. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. STEWART. Wait a moment.

Mr. McCOMAS. Very well.

Mr. STEWART. I want to see what this is. It is very much mixed. There is no definite duty assigned to any set of men.

Four clerks, two of whom may act as sanitary and food inspectors, at $1,200 each; two clerks, at $1,000 each; clerk, $900; messenger and janitor, $900; pound master, $1,500.

I intended to retain the pound master. I did not intend to cut that out.

Mr. SPOONER. Did you cut him out?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. By mistake?

Mr. STEWART. Yes. Then come laborers. It goes right down, and is all mixed up. Now, you put in a lot more inspectors—seven sanitary and food inspectors, two of whom shall be veterinary surgeons. It is the most incongruous law I ever saw.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, in his amendment he has left out not only the pound master, but a messenger and janitor, and forty-eight laborers, who it seems are rather a necessary part of the Department.

Mr. STEWART. Yes, I desire to retain them. I will have to change that. I will have to let the amendment stop at line 19, and then make special amendments striking out the unnecessary ones to correct it. I think the chairman should think this over and study the application. There is one officer for one purpose and one for another. You do not know what the duties of these officers are, and anyone dealing with them does not know what the duties of any particular officer are. He may be a sanitary food inspector, a milk inspector, or he may be a milk inspector one day and something else the next day. There is nobody to whom to make reports. There is nobody overseeing this work. It is as loose as anything you ever saw. I will have to modify my amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Another important omission on the part of the Senator is that he has left out for the health department the ambulance driver.

Mr. STEWART. I did not intend to leave it out.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator would better put in that employee.

Mr. STEWART. Let that go down to line 19, and then let me amend this by striking out these supernumeraries below there. I will move to strike out, in line 20:

Seven sanitary and food inspectors, two of whom shall be veterinary surgeons, to assist in the enforcement of the milk and pure-food laws and the regulations relating thereto, at $900 each.

There is no use in having this mixed in. If I could take the amendment a moment, I would make the corrections.

Mr. McCOMAS. I wish to make a suggestion in aid of the Senator's idea. I am not expressing an opinion as to whether I can or can not vote for his amendment.

Mr. STEWART. You are going to vote for it.

Mr. McCOMAS. There are two deputy health officers. One is Mr. McLean, the chief clerk and deputy health officer, who does a very large part of the work, and the other is Doctor Fowler, who is the deputy health officer and chief inspector.

Now, the proposed amendment must be made to refer to one or the other of those officers before your language, if you will permit me, is coherent and your system is coordinated. I suppose you desire to have it refer to the chief clerk and deputy health officer?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCOMAS. Therefore I suggest that the amendment should be applied to the chief clerk and deputy health officer.

Mr. ALLISON. While the Senator from Nevada is re-forming his amendment, on which I reserve the point of order, I wish to say, briefly, that this series of appropriations for the health office is in accordance with the law. I desire to put in the RECORD a statement of the duties of these various inspectors. I will not ask that it be read.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Memorandum relative to the food-inspection service operated as a part of the health department of the District of Columbia.

The report prepared by the health department in response to the Senate resolution of March 3, 1904, has reference only to that part of the food-inspection service specified in that resolution, viz, the inspection of meat, poultry, game, fish, and oysters imported into the District of Columbia in cold storage or refrigerator cars.

The organization of the food and drug inspection service as a whole is as follows:

1. Inspection of meats, poultry, game, fish, oysters, vegetables, and fruits.
2. Inspection of live stock intended for slaughter.
3. Inspection of foods and drugs requiring chemical analysis.
4. Inspection of milk: (a) Inspection of dairy farms. (b) Inspection of dairies.
5. Chemical laboratory.

1. Inspection of meats, poultry, game, fish, oysters, vegetables, and fruits.—Four inspectors are assigned to this duty. One, the inspector of marine products, is stationed at the wharves where fish, crabs, oysters, etc., are received, so that they may be inspected in bulk rather than after being scattered through the District. Such as pass inspection here, however, are subsequently inspected in the regular course of business in the places where they are offered for sale. At the wharves condemnations are made in large quantities, at times even entire cargoes having been disposed of in that manner because unfit for food. Incidental to the inspection of marine products proper, the inspector specially designated for the inspection of such products inspects watermelons, etc., which arrive by boat.

Three inspectors are charged specifically with the enforcement of the laws relating to the sale of unsound and unwholesome perishable foods, such as are enumerated above, and with the enforcement of the laws relating specifically to the cleanliness of the places where such articles are sold. These inspectors, as a part of their duty, inspect meat, poultry, game, etc., brought into the District in cold-storage or refrigerator cars, as was set forth in the report submitted to the Senate. Each inspector is assigned to a given part of the District, and is required to in pect as frequently as practicable all perishable food stuffs held or offered for sale in markets, stores, etc., and from hucksters' wagons within the territory assigned to him. He is required to determine whether the food inspected is or is not sound and wholesome, and if it be not, to see that it is disposed of in such manner as to make certain that it will not be sold for food, the present practice being to anoint it with kerosene. These inspectors must determine whether the premises where such materials are sold are clean and in good order, and if they are not, must see that suitable action is taken to remove the objectionable conditions. The number of places requiring inspection by these three inspectors is estimated at 842. This represents an average assignment of 281 establishments to each inspector, scattered among 14,000 buildings, located along 150 miles of highway, and in an area covering 2 square miles.

Beef	pounds..	16,497
Mutton	do....	7,375
Veal	do....	1,528
Pork	do....	5,781
Rabbits		1,770
Birds		1,096
Fish	bunches..	10,233
Crabs		361,000
Clams		137,700
Cabbage		18,582
Cantaloupes		14,177
Berries	quarts..	5,702
Cucumbers		1,377

2. Inspection of live stock for slaughter.—One inspector, a veterinary surgeon, is engaged daily in the inspection of live stock intended for slaughter. Animals are inspected both before and after slaughter and in proper cases are condemned.

During the year ended June 30, 1903, there were slaughtered under inspection 31,915 hogs, of which 18 were condemned; 7,575 cattle, of which 7 were condemned; 9,134 sheep, of which 16 were condemned, and 2,070 calves, with no condemnations.

3. Inspection of foods and drugs requiring chemical analyses.—Two inspectors, engaged primarily in the collection of samples of milk and in the inspection of dairies, collect from time to time samples of butter, lard, olive oil, flavoring extracts, baking powder, phenacetin, etc., and present them to the chemist for analysis. A special inspector is assigned to this work from time to time as circumstances indicate. These samples are analyzed as a part of the regular work of the chemical laboratory. During the year ended June 30, 1903, there were analyzed 47 samples of butter, 39 of lard, 5 of olive oil, 58 of flavoring extracts, 53 of cider, 15 of honey, 49 of ice cream, 3 of vinegar, 15 of ice, 134 of phenacetin, and 8 of formaldehyde. This was in addition to the analyses of samples of milk, which will be referred to later.

4. Inspection of milk.—This branch of the food-inspection service must be considered from the standpoint of the inspections of dairy farms and the inspection of dairies.

(a) Inspection of dairy farms.—Four men are engaged daily in the inspection of dairy farms. All are veterinary surgeons. They are required to visit the various dairy farms in the District of Colombia and in neighboring States, amounting in all to 957, and to determine whether they are properly equipped and maintained for the production of milk. Notices are served for the correction of insanitary conditions, and cattle are condemned as circumstances warrant. This work covers a very large territory. For instance, at Frederick, Md., about 57 miles away, there is gathered daily the milk from 31 farms, and at Purcellville, Va., 47 miles away, the milk from 22 farms, for shipment into the District. Notwithstanding the distances which these inspectors have to travel, the number of visits paid to dairy farms during the year ended June 30, 1903, was 3,389, representing a monthly average of about 280. The number of inspections between July 1, 1903, and February 1, 1904, representing, of course, the months when the roads are most passable, was 2,388, a monthly average of approximately 350.

(b) Inspection of dairies.—Two inspectors are engaged specially in the inspection of dairies and in the collection of samples of milk from dairies, stores, lunch rooms, milk wagons, and other places where milk is sold. The number of licensed dairies in the District is 94. The number of dairy farms operating wagons for the distribution of milk direct to consumers is 148. The stores, lunch rooms, etc., from which samples of milk have been collected by these inspectors during the past two years is about 2,000. The dairies are subject to special sanitary inspection. The stores, etc., represent merely places where samples of milk are purchased.

During the year ended June 30, 1903, there were collected and analyzed 6,090 samples of milk, 146 of cream, 16 of skimmed milk, and 3 of buttermilk.

5. Chemical laboratory.—The chemical laboratory is operated by a chemist and an inspector who acts as his assistant. In this laboratory are analyzed all samples of foods and drugs collected throughout the District, as well as samples of water coming from public and private wells within the District and from wells located on dairy farms in adjoining States from which milk is shipped into the District. Such chemical analyses as are required by the police department also are done in this laboratory. The total number of samples analyzed during the year ended June 30, 1903, was 7,006.

Mr. ALLISON. There are on the statute book several laws upon the subject of inspection and health in the District. Those laws have been carefully prepared. They are not ancient statutes. They are modern statutes, prepared under the guidance of the late Senator McMillan, who, as we all know, was the most cautious and careful legislator as respects these subjects we have had, except my friend the Senator from New Hampshire, who now presides over that committee. During all this period Senator McMillan had the aid of able men, including the Senator from New Hampshire, as respects these laws. One of them was passed in 1895 and another in 1898, making complete inspection provisions, health provisions, and sanitary provisions in this District.

Mr. KEAN. Does not the Senator from Iowa think it would be well to have them read?

Mr. ALLISON. These laws?

Mr. KEAN. These laws or some parts of them.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think it necessary now. It may be necessary later in the debate. I regret to say that the report of the health officer for this year is not yet in print, I understand, but I have before me the report of 1902. I will give to the Senate a little indication of what these inspectors do. I should like to call attention to the report on page 51. This list is arranged alphabetically.

Then, on the next page, I see another long list to which I will not call attention in detail, showing the amount of food supplies condemned during the year:

Beef, mutton, veal, pork, bacon, sausage, chickens, turkeys, ducks, rabbits, squirrels—

Running down to rhubarb and butter. All these inspections are provided for in this paragraph. Now, the Senator from Nevada, as I understand him, has turned this whole paragraph over to milk inspection.

Mr. STEWART. I beg pardon.

Mr. ALLISON. To meat and milk inspection.

Mr. STEWART. I beg pardon; I submit that the amendment would entirely change the powers and duties of the health officer in this District as to inspectors.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa did me the honor to suggest that in conjunction with the late chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia this legislation had been enacted. I happened to be intimately connected with it, and we thought we were giving the District sound laws which would result in benefiting the health of the people. I think now that the laws as a whole are very good laws.

I was not present in the Senate on Saturday last when this subject was under debate. Some two or three things I have been attracted to in reading the proceedings. One was that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] inquired whether or not the Committee on the District of Columbia was entirely guided in their action by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. I will say, Mr. President, that we always consult the District Commissioners in matters of legislation, and after they have made their recommendations the committee act upon their own volition and report laws that in their judgment they think are sound.

There is one matter which I think was misunderstood, and I think even the Senator from Nevada would want to have it set right, and that was the report made in response to the Senate resolution of March 3, 1904, in reference to the inspection of meat. In the debate it was made to appear that that was all the inspection there is as to meats in this District. As a matter of fact, that Senate resolution simply called for the inspection of meats in cold storage, and it did not relate at all to the inspection of meats or other articles of food that were not brought into the District of Columbia in cold storage.

In justice to those inspectors it is but right that I should state what will be found in the paper the Senator from Iowa submitted, that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, these inspectors condemned 16,497 pounds of beef, 7,375 pounds of mutton, 1,528 pounds of veal, 5,781 pounds of pork, 1,770 rabbits, 1,096 birds, 10,293 bunches of fish, 361,000 crabs, 137,700 clams, 18,582 cabbages, 14,177 cantaloupes, 5,762 quarts of berries, 1,377 cucumbers, etc.

So in this debate it ought to be understood that the response to the Senate resolution simply covered meats in cold storage, and that these officials have been doing a work outside that, according to the statement I have just made, has been of great advantage to the people of the District of Columbia.

I will say that for myself I will be sorry if in the District of Columbia appropriation bill we undertake to legislate for the milk supply to the District of Columbia, including all the necessary details. The Senator from Nevada knows that in the Committee on the District of Columbia this matter has been largely placed in his charge. He reported a bill that passed this body with certain amendments, to which I think he agreed. It has gone to the other House, and is there under consideration.

I think the Senator from Nevada complains of certain matters which are going on there. I do not know anything about them, but I think this matter of milk inspection (and the Senator from Nevada, according to my judgment, is pretty nearly right about it) we ought to provide for in a separate bill, and that the Senator ought to make his fight along those lines. That is my conviction.

So far as the health officer is concerned, I think he is a very competent and, I have reason to believe, a conscientious official. I think he is overworked. He is young, vigorous, energetic, ambitious, and I think he has taken upon his shoulders more work than any one man ought to have in the matter of inspection and the control of officials under his charge. But that matter can be adjusted in due time.

As I before said, I really trust that we will not turn the District of Columbia appropriation bill into a bill to regulate the production and sale of milk in the District of Columbia, encumbered as it must necessarily be with all the details necessary to carry out an act of that kind.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire says that I must fight it out in the House. The bill that was prepared with his assent was unanimously reported here, and that it would have done a great deal to help this situation all admit. As far as I have heard from the health department, it was satisfactory to them. The health officer went before the committee there. I was there explaining it, and I was informed that it was referred back to him; and instead of amending that bill he produces another bill and it was introduced in the House. It includes the same provisions that are in the bill that passed the Senate and a good many other matters that are not acceptable.

Now, this is not legislation on this appropriation bill; it is only defining the duties of the these officers. The Senator from Iowa has been defining the duties. This purpose here is simply to define the duties.

Some things were left out in the amendment which I offered and I want to state the additions I have made to it. It provides for eight sanitary inspectors at a salary of $1,000 each. Those are under the health officer and he can go on with inspection with those; he can do what he pleases with them. Then the deputy health officer has special duties assigned to him, but he can still act as deputy health officer under existing law. It does not interfere with him at all. My friend from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] was mistaken about that. It does not interfere with his position, but it gives him special duties.

Deputy health officer, who shall be well versed in meats, game, poultry, and marine products, $2,000 per annum.

Five inspectors of meats, game, poultry, and marine products, $1,000 each per annum—

I do not know whether that is enough—

who shall be under the immediate control of the deputy health officer, who may suspend any of them at pleasure and report the same to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

That does not add anything more, but simply defines the duties of the deputy health officer and makes it specific and makes somebody responsible. What I complain about in all this work here is changing from one to the other and want of organization.

One milk inspector, who shall be familiar with the milk business and have a knowledge of chemistry relating to dairy products, whose duty it shall be to prevent the sale in the District of Columbia of any milk or cream—to prevent the sale in the District of Columbia of any milk or cream which is not pure and free from any foreign substance used as a preservative, and that the bottles and other vessels in which milk is sold shall be filled only at licensed dairies or dairy farms, and that no cream or milk is retailed in the District of Columbia except from such dairy or dairy farms.

The trouble is that under the provisions here you will not get anything done in the coming year, which is a most glaring defect in the present law. None of them can be inspected under the present law unless they are dairies, and the court decides that none are dairies unless the dairying is the principal business; and the health officer tells us that there are 2,000 of those.

That whole thing is now a failure if you let them sell at those places. All these inspectors are useless if they can not reach and control these places. This amendment simply says that it shall be his duty to see that the milk comes from a dairy regularly licensed or a dairy farm.

Six veterinary surgeons, at $1,300 each per annum, who shall be under the control of the milk inspector and whose duty it shall be to inspect all dairy farms and other places where milk or cream is produced for sale in the District of Columbia.

Eight dairy inspectors—

They are provided for here—

Eight dairy inspectors, under the control of the milk inspector, at $1,000 each per annum, whose duty it shall be to inspect all places in the District of Columbia from which milk or cream is sold, and also to inspect all milk and cream brought into the District of Columbia for sale.

This simply makes it definite. This is assigning a definite duty and fixing the number, and it also cures a vital defect in the law by providing that milk can not be sold anywhere without inspection. There are 2,000 of those places now: and what is the use of talking about having a good administration when it is admitted that at those 2,000 places there can not be inspection? His first estimate was over 500, and then afterwards he got the matter looked up here and stated that there are over 2,000. It is the duty of this milk inspector to see that milk is not sold at any place except from a licensed dairy or dairy farm.

My amendment also provides for a practical chemist in the health department at an annual salary of $2,000. That we have now, and that is not changed. Then there are seven clerks provided for at $1,000 each, and I put them all under one head.

Seven clerks, at $1,000 each.

Then I had omitted the following clause, which I have added:

Messenger and janitor, $600; pound master, $1,500; laborers, at not exceeding $40 per month, $1,920; ambulance driver, $540.

I had overlooked those items, and I add those, making it a complete section. It is no longer than the other provision, and it does not legislate further than to provide what their duties shall be. There ought to be a head of the milk department and a head of the inspection of meats and fish. There are three departments. Those are separate matters, and they are the most important. Then there is all the matter of garbage directly under the health officer. There will be as many inspectors for that purpose as they now have, and it is not going to interfere with anything that exists. It is no elaboration of the milk bill. It is especially directing the deputy health officer and the meat inspectors, defining their duties more particularly, and then putting all the clerks under one head.

I offer this amendment, with the provision attached to it as I read, as a substitute for the entire paragraph, to come in after the second line on page 60.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And to end where?

Mr. STEWART. At the end of the paragraph. I have not given the total there. That will have to be added.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I am constrained to make the point of order upon the amendment that it is general legislation. It gives to subordinate officers in the health department powers which are now given to the health officer by law. He is at the head of the health department of the government of the District of Columbia. The Senator from Nevada proposes to place all the duties and the responsibilities respecting them upon a deputy.

Mr. STEWART. I beg your pardon; that is not the amendment. The amendment simply makes it the special duty of the deputy health officer to attend to the inspection of meats. It makes it the special duty of the chief inspector to attend to milk. It is all under the health officer the same. It is all under the general provision of law. We do not take any power away, but assign the duties to these officers. The amendment the Senator has already put in defines the duties of the several officers. That can be done in an appropriation bill as well as anything else. It only systematizes it and defines the duties of these heads of departments, so to speak, the health officer, the deputy health officer, and chief inspector. It is all under the control of the health officer; and the deputy health officer has meats under his control. Somebody must look after that directly, and if anything happens people will know to whom to go. They will know who has charge of that business.

In the milk department, if an inspector does wrong, levies blackmail, makes false charges, or does anything of that kind, they do not know to whom to go to make a complaint. They will see that the chief inspector is the man who is attending to this business, and that they can go to him. Of course, there is a bill here making provision as to the health officer and the Commissioners of the District, but this systematizes the work so that I believe something can be done. Otherwise I do not know that they will be able to do more than they are now doing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Iowa to say that the provisions of this clause are in pursuance of existing law.

Mr. ALLISON. Every provision, so far as I know, is in pursuance of statutes, especially the statute which provides for a health officer and giving him control of the sanitary situation in this District. He is the responsible officer under the Commissioners. They are all subject to orders, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And the Senator says the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada is not in pursuance of the statute.

Mr. ALLISON. The amendment of the Senator from Nevada places responsibility and control in subordinate officers who are now under the control of the health officer himself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STEWART. That is the end of it, then.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I rise to a privileged question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair wants to call attention to the fact that there are other amendments of the committee on the same page.

Mr. ALLISON. There are other amendments on the same page.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PROCTOR submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10370) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 5, 6, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, 19, 20, 21, 24, 34, 35, 38, 42, 47, 54, and 57.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 8, 13, 17, 18, 26, 28, 30, 31, 32, 33, 36, 37, 39, 41, 44, 45, 46, 48, 53, 58, 59, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, and 74, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 6, line 14, of the bill strike the word "fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the matter inserted by said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following: "eighty-one thousand and six hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 7 of said amendment strike out the following: "the Adjutant-General's section and the Record and Pension section of;" and in line 31 of said amendment, before the word "military," insert the word "the;" and after the word "brigadier-general," in line 34 of said amendment, insert the following:

"Provided further, That when the office of military secretary, with the rank of major general, shall hereafter become vacant it shall not be filled with said rank, and thereafter the chief of the military secretary's department shall have the rank of a brigadier-general with the title of the military secretary, and there shall be only one officer above the rank of colonel in the said department."

And in line 42 of said amendment strike out the words "adjutant-general" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Military secretary: Provided further, That the chief of the military secretary's department shall be a member of the board of commissioners of the United States Soldiers' Home,"

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the words "seventy-six thousand two hundred" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "forty-five thousand eight hundred."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 43, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "audit," in line 14 of said amendment, insert the following: "and the Secretary of War may hereafter authorize the assignment to duty in the office of the Paymaster-General of such paymasters' clerks, now authorized by law, as may be necessary for that purpose;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 52, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word inserted by said amendment insert a comma; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 55, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all the matter inserted by said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following: ": Provided, That of the appropriation for construction and repair of hospitals not more than $40,000 shall be used for the enlargement or construction of a hospital at any one post;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 56, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the word "thirty-nine" and insert in lieu thereof the word "forty-five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 60, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 5 of said amendment strike out the words "direct that the same;" and in the same line, after the word "presented," insert the following: "by direction of the President and;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 73, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: After the word "accounts," in line 14 of said amendment, strike out all of the matter inserted by said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

Your conferees report a disagreement on the following amendments: Nos. 16, 22, 23, 25, 29, 49, 50, and 51.

REDFIELD PROCTOR,
J. V. QUARLES,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. A. T. HULL,
F. C. STEVENS,
JAMES HAY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator from Vermont what became of the amendment of the Senate conferring additional rank upon officers going on the retired list?

Mr. PROCTOR. That was disagreed to. I propose, if the report is agreed to, to ask for a further conference on the items still in disagreement.

Mr. TELLER. That is still in dispute?

Mr. PROCTOR. It is still in dispute.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What items are still in dispute?

Mr. PROCTOR. The items still in dispute are No. 16, the increase of enlisted men of the Signal Corps; Nos. 22 and 23, which is a slight increase—only five—of the clerks for the Bureau of Military Information; No. 25 is the pay of those clerks, a mere matter of arithmetic; No. 29 is the amendment the Senator referred to, an advanced grade to retired officers and detail of retired officers. Both those, I might say, are one amendment. I think the provision for detail would be readily agreed to, but as they are in one amendment the whole provision was put into disagreement. No. 49 is the Alaskan wagon trail; No. 50 is the Alaskan trail, which is provided for, and No. 51 is the provision for the Spokane River bridge.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont what became of the amendment which I understand was adopted in the Senate increasing the number of the Engineer Corps?

Mr. PROCTOR. That the House conferees agreed to. The Senate amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator what was done with the Porto Rican proposition?

Mr. PROCTOR. The three-battalion provision that we inserted we receded from, but the House conferees agreed to the balance of the amendment, which provides for a complete organization and for two battalions, and, just as we had it, the examination of the present officers and their provisional appointment for four years.

Mr. SPOONER. Then it is as it was when it passed the Senate, except that the extra battalion is omitted?

Mr. PROCTOR. It is exactly as it passed the Senate, except that the additional battalion put on by the Senate has been dropped.

Mr. SPOONER. I noticed that the Secretary read a provision in regard to the Chief of the Military Secretary's Department being a member of the Board of Commissioners of the Soldiers' Home.

Mr. PROCTOR. Under the law for a long time the Adjutant-General and other aids of the Staff Corps of the Department have been governors, and in changing the title of the Adjutant-General to Military Secretary we merely give the Military Secretary what the Adjutant-General always had.

Mr. SPOONER. It does not increase the number.

Mr. PROCTOR. It does not increase the number. It is merely a transfer of the authority of the Military Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move that the Senate further insist on the amendments in disagreement and ask for a further conference with the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference, and Mr. PROCTOR, Mr. QUARLES, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12833) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 60, line 24, in the appropriations for the health department, I move to correct the total so as to read "$50,760."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. Before that matter passes away I should like to remark that there are now over 2,000 places in this District where no inspection of milk can be had under existing law, and the filling of bottles in wagons in the early morning has not yet stopped. There is no machinery for stopping it. These evils are still existing. It is said I must fight it out in the other House. I am not in the habit of going to the other House, although I did go before the committee there to explain the matter to them. The health officer of the District of Columbia had the bill referred back to him and another was introduced, so I am afraid we shall hear no more of the matter.

My object is to inquire of the chairman of the committee if he has such an amendment, and if the matter has been so amended as to give the necessary jurisdiction so as to remedy the glaring evil of having 2,000 places selling milk that can not be inspected at all. I think they have got jurisdiction now, if they want to exercise it.

Mr. ALLISON. Under existing law the Commissioners of the District of Columbia have full power to make rules and regulations for adequate inspection in this District. We have now added, under the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], two additional inspectors. We have introduced other provisions here which, I think, will make inspection more effective; but whatever the defects are, they can be remedied by means of rules and regulations adopted by the Commissioners, if there is force enough provided for in this bill to enable the department to discharge the duty. If the Senator thinks there is not, and if he will offer any further amendment, I shall be glad to aid him.

Mr. STEWART. The attention of the Commissioners has been repeatedly called to the fact that those 2,000 places could not be inspected. I have agitated the matter for years before them and before the health office, and they have made no regulations regarding such inspection. I think they are under the impression that they can not do so, the courts having decided that a dairy is a place where the selling of milk is the principal business, and the Commissioners by their conduct have decided that they can not reach these other places. So this obnoxious practice is still going on.

I have done my duty to the full extent. If the people must submit to having bad milk for the want of proper laws and regulations, I can not help it. But I undertake to say that there has been practically no inspection of milk in this District under the administration of the health officer for the District of Columbia simply because it is said the matter can not be reached. Of course if there are three or four hundred places which they can not reach, they can not reach the 2,000. If they can not make the inspection, it must be from a defective administration. I have done my duty, and if the people of this city are poisoned by bad milk for the want of proper regulations it is not my fault.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment which was passed over will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations which had been passed over was, on page 61, line 16, after the word "harness," to insert "and for rent of stable, and rent and maintenance of quarantine station;" so as to make the clause read:

For the enforcement of the provisions of the act to prevent the spread of scarlet fever and diphtheria in the District of Columbia, approved December 20, 1890, and the act to prevent the spread of contagious diseases in the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1897, and for investigating the causes of cases of typhoid fever reported to the health department under the provisions of an act to require cases of typhoid fever occurring in the District of Columbia to be reported to the health department of said District, approved February 4, 1902, under the direction of the health officer of said District, including purchase and maintenance of necessary horses, wagons, and harness, and for rent of stable, and rent and maintenance of quarantine station, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 61, line 20, after the word "harness," to insert "and rent of stable;" so as to make the clause read:

For maintaining the disinfecting service, including purchase and maintenance of necessary horses, wagons, and harness, and rent of stable, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 62, line 17, to increase the appropriation for the necessary traveling expenses of sanitary and food inspectors while traveling outside of the District for the purpose of inspecting dairy farms, etc., from $1,200 to $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. Just a word, Mr. President. I expressed the opinion in the discussion on Saturday last that the health department inspectors should be appointed after passing civil-service examinations. I have learned since then that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia sought to have civil-service examinations applied to employees and officials of the District of Columbia, but that the Supreme Court of the United States decided that the government of the District of Columbia is not a department of the National Government, and the Attorney-General gave the opinion, which I think was correctly given under the law, that it therefore was not competent for the President by order to embrace these officials in the classified service.

After that became established, the Commissioners sought the enactment, so far as their recommendation was concerned, of a law by Congress putting these officials under the civil-service regulations. There was one such bill pending this year, and I think the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] reported it adversely from the committee, although the Commissioners recommended it.

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. What I mainly wished to say, and what I thought was only just to the Commissioners to say, was that I am informed by them that within the last year or year and a half, appreciating the importance of a very careful and critical examination of these inspectors with reference to their appointments, they have, by courtesy of the Civil Service Commission, had the benefit of their assistance in these examinations. So that practically all the health department inspectors——

Mr. ALLISON. And the veterinary surgeons——

Mr. SPOONER. And the veterinary surgeons are examined, so far as they are examined, under the rules of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. STEWART. I will make one more appeal to the Senator from Iowa in regard to making the point of order against the amendment which I will offer at the end of the paragraph. I propose to offer this amendment, to come in at the close of the paragraph on page 60:

Every place where milk is sold shall be deemed a dairy under the law for purposes of inspection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent to go back to page 4, to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received, in the absence of objection.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 4, after line 18, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, after line 18, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the personal taxes for the fiscal year 1903 levied against certain tapestries which were presented to the late Lieut. Gen. Philip H. Sheridan for gallant and meritorious services, and which are on exhibition in the National Museum, be canceled, and that no personal taxes be levied against said tapestries so long as they are exhibited in said museum.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in on page 81, after line 11.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 81, after line 11, it is proposed to insert:

And for the purpose of ascertaining the wasteful use of Potomac water by private consumers, by meter or otherwise, $5,000; and the District Commissioners are authorized to prescribe penalties for such wasteful use.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Nevada will not propose that amendment at this time. The amendment is to provide for meters to be applied to private consumers. I do not think we ought to enter upon such a scheme until we get our new water system. It is a proper thing, it seems to me, to ascertain how much water the General Government here uses, but I hope the Senator will allow that to go over to another year.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I simply wish to say this regarding the amendment: The Government of the United States and the District of Columbia together have gone to a large expenditure in furnishing a very ample quantity of water for the District of Columbia. Every little while an additional appropriation is made for the purpose of enlarging this supply, and it is only of late years that any appropriation has been made for the purpose of purifying and cleaning the existing supply. I see that the officer in charge of these works recommends a survey for the purpose of increasing the supply. That, of course, means in the end a very large capital expenditure for the District of Columbia.

The existing supply of the District of Columbia per capita is larger than that of any city in the world. The city of San Francisco, a city of 100,000 more people than Washington, consumes, I believe, about 20,000,000 gallons less per diem than Washington.

Mr. KEAN. May I ask the Senator from Nevada what is the amount of water consumed per diem in Washington?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The consumption per diem here is over 50,000,000 gallons, approximating 200 gallons for each inhabitant per diem. I believe the per diem consumption of water in New York is something over 100 gallons per capita per diem. This indicates that there has been in the District of Columbia a very wasteful use of water. No one complains of a liberal use of water; but complaint should be made of the waste of water which accomplishes no purpose whatever. The large and excessive use of water does not effectively accomplish the purpose of cleansing the sewers, for that can be better done by a limited supply of water, by banking the water up, and then letting it rush through the pipes and pour through the sewers, rather than by supplying a larger quantity and letting it gradually and continuously pass through the sewers. So that it does not serve the purpose as efficaciously as a system of banking up the water and allowing it to rush through with momentum. A smaller quantity of water can be made more effective in that way.

I have had some experience regarding this matter in the city of San Francisco. There a very large capital expenditure of four or five million dollars was contemplated for the purpose of enlarging the supply. It was concluded before doing that to ascertain whether there was not a waste of water, so the meter sy tem was introduced, not generally for the purpose of measuring to each consumer the water which he used, but simply for the purpose of applying meters here and there where waste was suspected for the purpose of checking such waste. The result was that such a waste of water was found and such waste was so checked as to postpone that capital expenditure for many years.

We have before us, then, a large capital expenditure intended to meet the demand of Washington for water in excess of its real needs, and we have, in addition to that, a constant operating expense in cleansing the water that is not beneficially used. We have not only the capital expense of supplying water not needed, but we also have the operating expense of cleansing it.

We are now expending about three and a half million dollars for the purpose of filtering this water, and if we very largely increase the supply we will probably have to go to an additional expense of many million dollars for the purpose of filtering the additional supply, for all the water that passes through Washington must be filtered. You can not distinguish between that which is used for drinking and that which is used for other purposes, because the same pipe carries the water that is used for all these purposes. The result is that in Washington you will be compelled to go to the expense of filtering nearly twice as much water as can be beneficially used in Washington.

My amendment has not in view at all the limiting of the beneficial use of water in the District; it has not in contemplation the parsimonious use of water. It simply has in contemplation the checking of the waste of water, doubtless unintentional, that accomplishes no good and no purpose whatever. My amendment simply asks for $5,000, to be expended by the District Commissioners in discovering the waste and in checking it. It also provides that they shall prescribe penalties for the waste of water.

The purpose is not to compel the people who are found to be wasting water to pay for the water which they waste, but to adopt such precautions as will make them check this waste.

This bill as it passed the House appropriated $3,000 for ascertaining, by meter or otherwise, the amount of water used by the Government; but I insist upon it that the Government is not the only wasteful user. I believe that you will find after inquiry that the waste of water on the part of private consumers in the District of Columbia far surpasses the waste of the Government itself; and if we are going to make an inquiry as to waste of water by the Government I do not see why we should not at the same time make an inquiry as to the waste of water by private consumers.

I will state to the Senator from Iowa that I should like to have this amendment inserted in the bill, so that the committee of conference can take up the whole matter and shape it according to their wisdom. If they feel that this provision should go out, I am sure I shall have no objection; but it strikes me that it is a matter of importance and that we should insert here the addition to the provision inserted by the House, which will cover the whole matter comprehensively and at the very small additional expense of only $5,000. That additional expense may save the District three or four million dollars in capital expenditure and many hundreds of thousands of dollars in the expense of filtration.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I recognize the importance of the subject. There is beyond doubt a considerable waste of water in the District of Columbia, and I think that in some proper way it ought to be provided against. I do not really think, however, that an appropriation bill is the proper place for such legislation, and so I make the point of order against the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to offer an amendment, to come in between lines 23 and 24, on page 24; but before doing so I will state to the Senator from Iowa who has the bill in charge that the amendment I propose to offer provides for the extension of School street, which is partly built into the center of the block and stops there.

The children who are obliged to go to the school there—all those living south and west, and, indeed, all those living east of the school—are compelled to go around a very large block to get into School street. It is simply a cul-de-sac lying up against private property and having no outlet whatever.

This amendment provides for the extension of School street through to Kenesaw avenue. I think perhaps the Senator is familiar with it, as the matter was before his committee. I will say that the District Commissioners have eventually reported favorably on this proposition, providing the necessary money is forthcoming, etc.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator was very happy in his suggestion that the District Commissioners have "eventually reported" in favor of the proposition. There is a great contest about School street and how it should be improved. I understand that this matter is pending in the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. No; I will say to the Senator that it is not now pending there. The District of Columbia Committee have reported this amendment favorably.

Mr. ALLISON. They have reported it favorably?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. They have authorized me to report it.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations considered it very fully, and decided that until we knew exactly how to open up this street we would not make it a part of this bill. The item is not estimated for, and therefore I must make the point of order against the amendment of my friend that it is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has not been offered as yet.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The amendment is quite lengthy, and I thought I would explain it before it was read.

Mr. ALLISON. It requires the condemnation of property and considerable legislation. I think the Senator had better not press it at this session.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Of course, if the Senator would make the point of order against the amendment, I feel compelled to withhold it for the present.

Mr. ALLISON. I think that is better.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in on page 42, at the end of line 9.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 42, after line 9, it is proposed to insert:

That the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, the engineer in charge of public buildings and grounds, the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, the Superintendent of the Congressional Library, and the Superintendent of the Capitol shall constitute a park commission, which shall have general control of the plans for the park system and public grounds of the District of Columbia; but nothing herein contained shall affect the actual administration of such parks or grounds now existing. Such commission shall make recommendations to Congress regarding such park system, and the sum of $3,000 is appropriated for the expenses of such commission, of which report shall be made to Congress.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will say in explanation of that amendment that under existing conditions the parks and public grounds of the District of Columbia are under the control of four or five different officials. The Engineer Commissioner has the control of the National Park, which commences beyond the Zoological Park and extends to the District line; the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution has the control of the Zoological Park; the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds has the control of the Mall; the Superintendent of the Capitol has control of the grounds immediately around the Capitol, and the Superintendent of the Congressional Library has control of the grounds around the Congressional Library. The result of all this is——

Mr. COCKRELL. Who has control of the various parks throughout the city?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The engineer officer in charge of public buildings and grounds has charge of all the public spaces, I believe, in the District.

The result is that there is no cooperation or harmony of action between these officials regarding the park system of Washington. Each park is, I have no doubt, well conducted, but it is not conducted as a part of a general system. I think it is apparent to everybody that in the end all these parks will be connected by parkways, and it is of the highest importance that there should be some general plan for the park development of the District and for harmony and cooperation of action between the officials who are in charge of these various public parks and grounds.

It has been proposed frequently that we should have in the District of Columbia a park commission composed of citizens of prominence, but it seemed to me in framing this amendment, as all of the officials referred to in the amendment are men of ability, men of skill, and men of experience in matters relating both to architecture and to landscape gardening, that the most efficient way would be to consolidate them into one commission and give them the power to meet together and make recommendations to Congress regarding the general park system and to make arrangements for cooperation in their work. This amendment calls only for an appropriation of $3,000 for the expenses of such a commission; and it seems to me that it would be money very well spent. There is a lack of that unity of action that is necessary in such work, a unity of action which Boston has, which New York has, and which all the great cities have.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the point that this amendment is new legislation, and therefore not proper on this bill. Besides, these parks are owned by the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ALDRICH. Before that matter is disposed of, I should like to make a suggestion, not, however, in regard to the merits of this particular question.

A different rule has always been held in the Senate in regard to the District of Columbia appropriation bill from the rule applied to other general appropriation bills. I should dislike very much to see a rule established that would be so narrow as to prevent any legislation for the District of Columbia in this connection. Any legislation that pertains to the District of Columbia is in a sense local legislation. Congress being given the sole power to legislate for the District of Columbia. Any legislation which is pertinent to the District of Columbia is not general legislation.

Mr. ALLISON. I entirely agree with the Senator from Rhode Island that we should not take too narrow a view of the powers of Congress over the District of Columbia, but I submit that it is hardly proper on the District of Columbia appropriation bill to undertake to gather in all the parks that belong to the United States and make regulations respecting them, especially so when there are numerous opportunities constantly arising where these questions may be dealt with in a better way.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will not press the point.

Mr. FRYE (Mr. KEAN in the chair). If the Senator from Rhode Island will allow me one moment. I presume that the Chair ruled this amendment out on the ground that it was a new item making an appropriation: that it had come from no committee; that it was not in response to any existing law, and that it was not estimated for. I think the amendment clearly out of order in those respects.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DESIGNATION OF LAND IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a few days ago Senate bill 3456 was read, and some objection was made to it, which I am now prepared to obviate by amendments. I ask that the bill may be now considered.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill will take but a moment, and I hope the Senator from Indiana will not object.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I have no objection if the bill can be speedily disposed of.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say that if there is any discussion on the bill, I will immediately withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3456) to distinctively designate parcels of land in the District of Columbia for the purposes of assessment and taxation, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it will be remembered that the Senator from Georgia took exception to the words "county of Washington" in the bill. The committee have made inquiry about that, and are satisfied that those words should be stricken from the bill. I move to amend the bill by striking out, in section 1, line 4, after the word "the," the word "county" and inserting "territory within the limits of the District of Columbia lying outside of the city;" in line 4, after the word "Washington," by striking out "in the District of Columbia:" in line 6, after the word "land," by striking out "in the said county of Washington;" so as to make the section read:

That for the purpose of facilitating the assessment and taxation of real property in the territory within the limits of the District of Columbia lying outside of the city of Washington the following system of designating the several subdivisions, blocks, lots, and parcels of land is hereby prescribed, and each and every designation made or given in conformity with said system shall be deemed a sufficient description of the property to which it relates for all purposes of assessment and the collection of taxes and assessments of every kind.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move, in section 2, page 2, line 3, after the word "all," to insert "of said;" and in line 4, before the word "as," to strike out "in the county of Washington, in said District;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to cause to be given numbers to all of said blocks or squares, lots or parcels of land, as said blocks, squares, lots, or parcels of land have been formed by the highway-extension plan now of record in the office of surveyor of the District of Columbia, and existing subdivisions, and to place the numbers so given upon the said highway-extension plan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In section 3, page 3, beginning in line 5, I move to strike out:

Said volumes to be known as the taxation and assessment plat books of the county, and marked "County taxation and assessment plat books."

So as to read:

SEC. 3. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall cause to be prepared a series of volumes of plats, on a scale of 100 feet to the inch, embracing all the land in said District outside the city of Washington, these plats to show at all times the separate parcels of land created by subdivisions, sales, wills, condemnations, dedications, decrees of court, or otherwise, each with its distinctive number.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In section 4, page 3, line 21, after the word "boundaries," I move to strike out "of county property;" so as to read:

SEC. 4. That for the purpose of keeping said books constantly current and up to date, the said Commissioners shall cause an employee of the surveyor's office to make daily transcripts of all deeds of conveyance, wills, condemnations, decrees, and other instruments or proceedings by which boundaries are changed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to designate parcels of land in the District of Columbia for the purposes of assessment and taxation, and for other purposes."

BUILDING FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE, ETC.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1508) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection thereon of a public building to be used for a Department of State, a Department of Justice, and a Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask the Senator from Indiana if he is willing to go on with his remarks to-morrow, or to have a time fixed for a vote on this bill, and have a short executive session this afternoon?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If there could be a time fixed for a vote on this bill to-morrow, it would be entirely agreeable to allow the bill to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that the Senator ask that a vote be taken before adjournment to-morrow.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. That is entirely agreeable. I ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken upon the bill before adjournment to-morrow.

Mr. PATTERSON. I hope the Senator from Indiana will not press that request. My colleague is not in his seat and I know he takes some interest in this bill, and I would rather that he were here when a disposition of this kind is made, unless the Senator from Rhode Island knows——

Mr. ALDRICH. No; I do not know, but I took it for granted that as this bill has been under discussion for some time we might close the discussion on it to-morrow.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I do not think there is much remaining to be said upon it, if the Senator from Colorado will allow me. I have no doubt that whatever his colleague desires to say can be said before the bill is finally voted upon to-morrow.

Mr. PATTERSON. If the Senator will modify his application for unanimous consent so as to allow the senior Senator from Colorado to object if he desires to do so to-morrow, I will not make any objection.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I do not quite hear the Senator.

Mr. PATTERSON. I said if the Senator from Indiana will so modify his request for unanimous consent as not to make it applicable to the senior Senator from Colorado, but as to all the rest, I will not object.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I do not quite understand the effect of the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. PATTERSON. The effect would be that if my colleague desires to object in the morning, he can do so.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that the Senator from Indiana renew his request in the morning. That will be better, perhaps.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I am willing to take the unanimous consent with that limitation, if you please, because I believe the Senator's colleague will not be unreasonable.

Mr. PATTERSON. He spoke to me the other day about the bill, and he not being here, I think I ought to make a reservation in his behalf. That is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the request of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. That this bill be voted on before adjournment to-morrow, reserving the right to the senior Senator from Colorado to object to-morrow.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business, being Senate bill 1508, may be voted on to-morrow before adjournment, unless the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] objects. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 29, 1904, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate March 28, 1904.

SECRETARY OF LEGATION.

Joseph W. J. Lee, of Maryland, to be secretary of the legation of the United States at Panama, Panama, vice William W. Russell, appointed envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Colombia.

SURVEYOR OF CUSTOMS.

Jacob S. Greenwald, of Utah, to be surveyor of customs for the port of Salt Lake City, in the State of Utah. New office created by the act of Congress approved March 18, 1904.

PROMOTION IN THE REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

Ralph M. Johnson, of Washington, to be a second assistant engineer with the rank of third lieutenant in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States, to succeed B. A. Minor, promoted.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 28, 1904.

SECRETARY OF LEGATION.

Charles Dunning White, of New Jersey, to be secretary of the legation of the United States at Buenos Ayres, Argentine Republic.

POSTMASTER.

TEXAS.

Crockett Campbell, to be postmaster at Lufkin, in the county of Angelina and State of Texas.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 28, 1904.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 26, 1904, was read and approved.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENTS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, without objection, will appoint Mr. MORRELL, of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Committee on Militia.

There was no objection.

The following additional committee appointments were announced by the Speaker:

Military Affairs, Mr. PATTERSON of Pennsylvania.

Private Land Claims and Enrolled Bills, Mr. CASTOR.

Pensions, Mr. AIKEN.

Disposition of Useless Papers in the Treasury and other Departments, Mr. BATES and Mr. BASSETT.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14416, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, with Mr. BURTON in the chair.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, after encouraging the House in this way to think that I was going to spare them, I appreciate that it is cruel and almost inhuman in me to proceed to take any time; but, inasmuch as a part of what I intend to say is somewhat in the nature of criticism of a speech which was made the other day, I think it no more than fair that I should give oral expression to it.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SPIGHT], on the closing day of the general debate on the post-office appropriation bill, delivered a speech on the southern problem, which seems to me so reactionary, so surprising, and so discouraging that some one ought to at least express dissent from the extraordinary propositions to which he gave utterance. It certainly has never been my wish, and I think never my conduct, to excite sectional feeling in this House. I hoped the time had come when such questions could be discussed temperately and moderately. I am sure we have recently had a beautiful exposition by a southern man—Mr. Thomas Nelson Page, in the last two copies of McClure's Magazine—of temperance and moderation in the discussion of this question, and in what I say I shall try at least to emulate the fairness of his point of view, though I presume his conclusions will differ from mine.

The gentleman from Mississippi made complaint the other day that in the North there is a hypocritical and pharisaical method of criticising the southern problem, and the gentleman expressed openly what we have sometimes suspected, but what has been generally denied by that side of the House, that the attitude of the South toward the enforcement, or, rather, the violation of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution is intentional and, he goes on to say, is permanent. These are his words:

> We have enough of this prejudice, if you wish to call it so, to forever debar the negro from active participation in our State governments, to exclude him from our dining rooms except as a waiter, and to shut the door tight and fast to any approach to social equality.

Now, in the cloakroom, in private conversation, it has often been admitted by Members on that side of the House that the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments were violated and intended to be violated; that the new constitutions of some of the Southern States were clearly such violations; but this is the first time it has come to my notice that that has been expressed on the floor of this House, and that it has been stated that it is their intention forever to prevent the participation of the negro in their government. It seems to me that a declaration of that kind ought at least to receive prompt protest. I wish the protest could have come from that side of the House. I think somebody on that side of the House might, with advantage to himself and his section, have expressed dissent from that doctrine, for it seems to me it is what can not ever be substantiated or upheld by rational argument, and it puts this side of the House and puts the North in an unfortunate dilemma.

I have been one who has been glad that we have not acted radically, as I think we had every right to and every provocation to in the case of some of the delegations that have come from the Southern States. I have believed that it was wiser in these cases to rely, as we always must in the end, on local sentiment, with the hope that that local sentiment would gradually develop and gradually become more generous and progressive and fair. It seems, however, to be getting more reactionary, more proscriptive, and more bitter. The force bill, as it was improperly called, was enacted and finally repealed, and while many Republicans were quite willing it should be repealed, yet at the same time they did not abandon it because they felt it was unjust, but because it was felt to be impossible of execution, and we have to admit that any Federal law, when you come to the final instance, is dependent for its execution on local administration and juries, and therefore any law which has not local sentiment in its favor can not ultimately be executed.

We have recently had an illustration of that before the United States Senate committee, when one of the apostles of the Mormons publicly proclaimed that he was living in open and flagrant violation of the law, and said, in what I thought was a mock heroic attempt to appeal to public sentiment, that he would not abandon any of his wives; he would not be so cruel as to refuse them the pleasure of his attentions, but would rather submit himself to the legal penalty of the crime. It struck me, sir, that that was an empty boast, an absurd affectation of courage, because he well knew that he was not subjecting himself to any danger: he knew that the district attorneys who must draw the indictment against him, the grand juries who must find it a true bill, and the petit juries who must try him were all in sympathy with him and that there was not the slightest possibility of his being convicted. So any Federal law in the South or in the North must always depend on public sentiment to support it, and as long as public sentiment is overwhelmingly against it the law is useless. Lord Brougham, in his redundant and rhetorical style, expressed this thought generations ago when he said:

> In my mind he was guilty of no error, he was chargeable with no exaggeration, he was betrayed by his fancy into no metaphor, who once said that all we see about us, King, Lords, and Commons, the whole machinery of the State, all the apparatus of the system and its varied workings, end in simply bringing twelve good men into a box.

So we must all admit that the jury system, necessarily representing local sentiment, regulates the enforcement of the law; and it is useless to have a law which has no local sentiment behind it. But this House has had abundant opportunity to act upon the unconstitutional laws of the South if it so desired. When the Louisiana constitution was adopted against the open and forcible remonstrance of the two distinguished Louisiana Senators, who insisted that it was unconstitutional, though I suppose they were in sympathy with its purpose, and when the delegation from Louisiana came here and took their seats under a law which I think a majority of this House believed unconstitutional, we had an opportunity, if we so wished, to say to those Members, "Go back, and stay back until you have a legal election."

For myself I am glad that this House did not adopt that course. I believe it is not always wise to inflict deserved punishment. I believe that although we had a perfect right to declare those seats vacant, although it was legal and would have been no more than fair, yet I think it would have had a worse effect upon the country to have had a sovereign State entirely shut out from representation here than it would to allow the injustice of having a State represented here by Members elected under unconstitutional laws. And I was glad the other day when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] brought in the unanimous report of his committee that they would not go into the question of the validity or invalidity of the South Carolina election, but would leave that question to the courts, for it seems to me it is often much wiser that we should submit to injustice than that we should go to extremes. We had an illustration of that, I think, in 1876——

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts kindly explain in what particulars the provision in the constitution of South Carolina at this time regulating suffrage differs from the provision in the constitution of Massachusetts on that subject?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that I will take the time of the House to do that. I said that I was in accord with the decision arrived at by the committee, and I do not wish to be diverted into the question which the gentleman from South Carolina would have me take up when there is no difference of opinion between us about it.

I was saying that it is often better to submit to injustice than to go to extremes. I think that in 1876 a great majority of the Democratic party probably believed that they were defrauded of the Presidency; but I was very glad that wise counsels prevailed, and that instead of the hot-heads rushing, as they wished, to arms, and having a war over the disputed election, they submitted. I think that possibly the fact that the most distinguished general in the world was at that time at the head of our Government with a devoted army under him, and that the chances would have been very strongly against them, may have had something to do with their decision; but at any rate I am glad that the decision was made. And if the commission had decided against the Republican party, intrenched as they were in the Government, I trust they would have been equally wise; and although a majority of them, if the decision had been against them, would have believed that they were defrauded of the election, I trust they also would have yielded. I think that sometimes it is wise to yield to what you think is an injustice rather than go to some forcible extreme.

Mr. LAMB. Does the gentleman think that the Republicans, if they had been defeated on that issue, would have thought that they were defrauded?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do think so.

Mr. LAMB. I differ with the gentleman. I have a better opinion of the Republicans.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I am sorry to see that there is a little intolerance still left in the mind of my friend. I believe that the great majority of both parties at that time believed that they were right, and whichever party lost was sure to think it had been defrauded of its rights, though if the Republicans had lost I trust they would not have cried about it as persistently as the Democrats have.

I simply use that illustration in stating why I am glad the Republican party did not adopt the extreme course, as I think it would have been fully justified in doing, of saying to the delegation from Louisiana, "You are here under an unfair election; you are here in fraud of this House, and you shall not be allowed your seats."

But I do not by that mean to apologize for or at all to assent to the position that was taken in Louisiana and is taken in these other States. I do not believe it is fair or wise, and to me it is astonishing that gentlemen as intelligent as those on that side of the House should to-day say that they intend forever to debar the negro from participation in government. Why, there are 10,000,000 of people who can not stay as they are, who must either go up or go down, who will have either to be bondsmen forever or to be citizens, and yet gentlemen come out boldly and say that they mean forever to keep them from any participation in government, and the last gubernatorial election in Mississippi indicates that they wish to keep them forever in ignorance. That does not seem to me to be a thoughtful view to take of the subject. And while I can appreciate how the great mass of the thoughtless people in the South may drift into such opinions, I am surprised that Members of this House, who of course look at the question thoughtfully and with deliberation and with a view to the future, should express such opinions. Nobody on this side of the House expects you or wants you to submit to negro domination. Nobody on this side of the House denies that there is a great mass of the negroes to-day who are not intelligent enough for the suffrage; but what does seem to me Bourbonish and outrageous is to say that none of them ever shall have the privilege, that none of them ever can be developed into the ability to vote or to become citizens.

That, to me, is the phase which I think ought to be criticised and contradicted on this side of the House. We do not blame you for not submitting to negro domination, but why do you not do as we do, and exclude all ignorance, all incapacity from the suffrage? That would be constitutional; that would be fair; that would attain your object; but it almost seems as if you preferred to be unconstitutional and unfair in order to provoke us and prove how useless are constitutional restraints. As far as I know in this session nothing has been said on this question from this side of the House. When we do express our minds we are told that we are exciting sectional feeling. We have heard from the other side arguments in favor of the repeal of the fifteenth amendment. We have heard various statements about social equality and political equality, and I think that, lest it should seem that we are assenting to these doctrines, we ought at least to state that we consider them obsolete and reactionary.

Now, there was another phase of the gentleman's speech on which I wish to say a word or two. He says:

> I frankly confess, and am sorry that I have to do it, that unnecessary lynchings have sometimes occurred in the South. So far as I am concerned, I am opposed to mob violence as a general proposition.

Well, that is something of an admission, although I confess it does not to me seem to do great credit to the gentleman. It sounds a little like assenting to virtue in general and wishing to give yourself a little leeway. I suppose that is the way all of us would like to be virtuous—to have everybody else virtuous and yet to make a little allowance for ourselves. But I am surprised—and this is another question on which the action of that side of the House surprises me—I am surprised that somebody on that side of the House, representing the country where most of the lynchings have occurred, does not get up and put himself on record as opposing lynchings, and as recognizing the principle involved and the result to which they lead. It seems to me every thoughtful man must recognize that they ought to be stopped. I will not speak of burnings——

Mr. SPIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. SPIGHT. I notice that you said "on this side, where most of the lynchings occur."

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. SPIGHT. Does the gentleman know that according to statistics, comparing the negro population North and South, three or four times as many lynchings occur North as South?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not see what relevancy there is or what right you have to compare the negro population. I have said, and the gentleman can not deny it, that an overwhelming proportion of the lynchings occur in the South.

Now, I will admit, of course, that lynchings occur in the North. I will admit it, and with regret. Why is it that they have occurred in the North? That is one of the things I hold you of the South partly responsible for. We all know that in the North, in every large city or small city, there is a disorderly element which is always ready to plunge into lawlessness. That is not confined to the South.

In every city in the North there is a big element that would always like to have respectable leaders, that would always like to have the apathy of the police, and that upon any impulse would rush into crime. But there is this difference between the South and the North, it seems to me: In the North it is emphatically the disorderly element which does it. In the North the great masses of the people openly condemn it. In the North a man is not afraid to come forward and denounce it at the time, and that is what I wonder at in the South—that you gentlemen who know how wrong it is, know how subversive of popular government it is, do not come forward and publicly and openly try to stop it. That is the complaint I have. Why, I have no doubt that there are plenty of people both North and South who can be excited very readily into an outbreak of violence. It does not take a great deal of inducement—only a little certainty that they will not be prosecuted, that the police are not dangerous. Under such conditions almost anywhere a mob can be aroused and excited. But what prevents it starting is because the thoughtful, intelligent people of most parts of the world recognize that mob violence and lynching ought to be stopped, and therefore, regardless of their indignation at any crime, leave it to the courts to convict and not to a mob.

Why is it that we object to mob violence? Why is it, really, that lynching should be stopped? It is not because we think the man does not deserve what he gets. Undoubtedly in many cases burning is none too good punishment for the fiend. We none of us have a particle of sympathy for him, but we recognize the barbarity of it and the fact that it turns back our civilization over a thousand years. We recognize that there is a principle in every republican government which must be supported if the government is to survive, and that is respect for law; that every time a man is lynched it infringes and breaks down and diminishes that respect for law without which no republican government can long endure.

I was surprised the other day to see this Mississippi doctrine showing itself in this House and to hear the leader of the minority express his disregard for law. He said in discussing the question of an appeal from the decision of the Chair:

> Now, I hope that we will not let a little technical matter of parliamentary law stand in between us and a great public purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I did not hear what the gentleman said. I have just been informed that he made some reference to me in that connection.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I read from your speech made the other day.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I did not hear you.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I will read it again:

> Now, I hope that we will not let a little technical matter of parliamentary law stand in between us and a great public purpose.

Now, that is exactly the same spirit——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman, as I understood, was accusing me of somewhere indorsing lynching.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The only thing I was seeking to lynch was the point of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I think if the gentleman would be a little more courteous in injecting his remarks——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman has granted me his permission.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I have not. I was only answering your question. You asked a question, and I answered it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I certainly do not intend to be discourteous to the gentleman.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Very well.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, it was only parturiunt montes, nascetur ridiculus mus.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The gentleman said that we will not let a little technical matter of law stand between us and a great public purpose. Is not that exactly what every mob that ever lynched a man would say? Do not they say, "We won't let a little matter of law stand between us and a great public purpose?" It is exactly the same spirit of disrespect for law that the gentleman brings in here, it seems to me, that every mob displays when they lynch a victim. They have a purpose which they think ought to be accomplished at once. There is nothing to prevent them but a law, and if they can violate that with safety they consider nothing further, and apparently the leader of the minority follows the same line of argument. Ulterior considerations and the danger of inculcating disregard of law are forgotten.

But when you go out among the public at large with that as a doctrine, when the people get in the habit of saying, like the gentleman, "Do not let a little matter of law stand in between us and a great public purpose," then you are undermining the principles upon which a republican government stands. The law must be the foundation. If we are going to have a republic, the people must know and feel that it is not safe at any time to violate it. Now, of course a great majority of the people are not going to be thoughtful and philosophical. They have not time. They do not reason much about the matter, and do not philosophize as to what the ultimate effect of lynching is; but what is going to dominate them is the opinion of the newspapers and public men and their preachers and teachers, of the men they get in the habit of following and trusting.

That is going to lead them; and if in this House, where are leaders of the people, men who are thoughtful, who know that lynching ought to be stopped, not because of sympathy for the victim, not because they think in any particular case it does injustice, but because the law itself is in peril and must be sustained—and you all know it—if the Members of this House on that side would maintain that doctrine here and at home we would soon put a stop to this lynching. The lynching that has occurred at the South has stimulated lynching at the North. There are disorderly people North just as well as at the South, and unless public men, public newspapers, and public opinion shall discourage it until gradually there is instilled into the people a respect for law that in the end will prevent all lynching our republican Government can not stand without deterioration.

Of course there is another minor objection to lynching. The wrong person is sometimes lynched. I read in a paper yesterday that in South Carolina a man died and admitted that he had killed his wife some years ago, for which three negroes were lynched. Of course we do not know how often instances of that kind happen. The unfortunate part of it is thus far it is almost mainly directed against one class and one race of persons. I appreciate that I can not look at that question of the race as you gentlemen of the South do. I recognize what a terrible infliction it is to have an enormous mass of ignorance right in your midst, and I will confess I do not know——

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman mentioned a case a moment ago where he said three negroes had been lynched and that a white man afterwards confessed. Did I understand you to say that it was in South Carolina?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That is my recollection.

Mr. FINLEY. Has the gentleman followed that up? And if he has followed it up, does the gentleman not know that that story has turned out to be a canard, pure and simple?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That is possible. I have not followed it up. I simply saw it in a newspaper. If the gentleman has followed it up, I will take the gentleman's explanation; but of course we all understand that it does not prove anything as to the principle. It may happen a great many times, but at the same time——

Mr. FINLEY. It proves this: That very often charges are made against the South which have no foundation in fact.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Oh, well, that may happen, of course. This happens to be from a South Carolina paper, but the gentleman knows perfectly well that such accidents and such mistakes are liable to happen, though I have not based my main criticism on that ground. I simply mentioned that as incidental. The astonishment I express is that you gentlemen who know the danger to our system of law do not come forward and protest against this custom, which is so rapidly increasing in the South.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Where should we protest, in this House?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I think the better place would be in your homes.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Have you ever heard anybody in this House protesting against the Springfield, Ohio, riot?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not know that I have.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Anybody in this House anywhere?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not know that I have.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. There was a lynching in my own county last August. Do you know whether the papers or people in our State protested against it? How do you know that they do not protest against it?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Well, I think I would have heard of it occasionally if they had.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. But you have not heard anybody protesting against the Springfield riot?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes; I have heard a great many people protesting against it.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Not in this House. It is not our duty to protest here in this House, is it?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Not necessarily.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN (continuing). Every time a lynching takes place?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly not.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Any more than it was the duty of the Ohioans to protest against the Springfield riot, although I believe they have at home——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. But when a gentleman in this House gets up to defend this proposition, do you not think the time has come to say something in this House?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Who did that?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Mississippi defended it indirectly.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Have you ever heard any Member in the House defend a lynching for any crime except rape?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No. Does the gentleman defend lynching for that crime?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. At present I neither condemn nor defend it for that crime. I live in a county in which recently this crime was committed. I have seen with my eyes the lacerated dead victim and have heard the sobs of the mother and the screams of the children——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman intend to go on and make a speech?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. If you lived in a community in which this most horrible of all crimes was committed, would you then and there denounce lynching?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not believe I would defend lynching on any terms——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. May I interrupt the gentleman? The gentleman said he has never heard of any condemnation of lynching in the South and by southern people. I understood you to make that statement?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Oh, no; I did not say that.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understood it to be that broad.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Oh, no; I did not say that I never heard of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that last week at a meeting of the old Confederate veterans at a reunion at Grenada, Miss., they passed very much stronger resolutions against lynching than ever came from the State of Ohio anywhere in connection with the Springfield riots.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, that illustrates the argument of that side of the House, because I happened to notice those resolutions, and they were not against lynching.

Mr. FINLEY rose.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts (continuing). They were against burning.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Not until I have answered the gentleman from Mississippi. I happened to notice the resolutions, and they were very strong. They were a little bombastic I thought; but I was delighted to see them; they expressed a most admirable spirit; but they did not denounce lynching—they denounced burning.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I beg the gentleman's pardon; they denounced lynching. They denounced lynching for any crime except, perhaps, the crime of rape; and then they went on and denounced burning for any crime whatever. They denounced burning as cruel, barbarous, and brutal. They may not have clothed it in first-class New England language, don't you know, and it might have been a little bombastic, as the gentleman says; but they intended to say the right thing.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama rose.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I was very glad to see that they denounced even burning. That was something in advance.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama first.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has quoted from the resolutions adopted at the Confederate reunion, and the gentleman from Massachusetts does not agree with him.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I have no doubt that the gentleman from Mississippi has quoted them correctly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I have the resolutions here in my hand.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I wish the gentleman from Alabama would read them.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I will read them if the gentleman from Massachusetts has no objection.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Not at all.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The resolutions are as follows:

EX-CONFEDERATES OPPOSED TO LYNCHING.

An antilynching crusade has been inaugurated by the W. R. Barksdale Camp, United Confederate Veterans, of Grenada, Miss. The following significant resolutions were unanimously adopted at a largely attended meeting of the camp:

First, that we are unalterably opposed to the lynching of a human being, save, perhaps, for the one unmentionable crime.

Second, that as Confederate veterans and law-abiding citizens of Mississippi and of the United States we are violently, vehemently, and eternally opposed to the practice of burning a human being for any crime whatsoever.

Third, that we appeal in thundering tones to all Confederate veterans, their wives and daughters, and to that great and glorious organization, the Daughters of the Confederacy, one and all, to arise in their might and by precept and example, voice, and moral influence help put a stop to this diabolical, barbarous, unlawful, inhuman, and ungodly crime of burning human beings.

Fourth, that we heartily approve of and applaud the action of Governor Vardaman in his recent successful efforts to save a criminal from a mob bent on burning.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there can be but one thing added——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to have the gentleman add anything in my time. The resolutions have been read.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Whenever the negroes——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] know that the people of South Carolina as far back as 1895 protested against lynchings in the strongest manner possible by placing in the State constitution a provision making a county in which a lynching should occur responsible in damages to the family of the deceased, and that since that time there have been very few lynchings in South Carolina—no more perhaps than there have been in Illinois and Indiana?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman if any collections have been made under that law?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I know of no lynching in my section of the State since that time and of no suits that have been brought.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will state that there was one case brought in Orangeburg County, S. C.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the legislature of Ohio passed a law authorizing a collection of $5,000 liquidated damages in favor of the family or legal representatives of anyone lynched in Ohio. A lynching took place in one of the counties, and the question was litigated to the supreme court of the State. The supreme court upheld the law and the money was paid. There has been but one lynching there.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the resolutions from Mississippi, I am very glad that they have been passed, and I recognize that as an advance. I am very glad that the Confederate veterans expressed in such "thunderous" tones, as they remarked, their disapproval of most lynchings and come out so strongly against the outrage of burning. In this twentieth century it seems rather a reproach to our civilization that it should be necessary in any part of any country to denounce burning at the stake. At the same time I recognize it, if the gentleman so puts it forward, as an advance, and I recognize it gladly. I recognize also that to denounce lynchings, except, perhaps, for one crime, is praiseworthy. I wish that those people might go further and that thoughtful men would start an agitation, and it might begin right here, that no matter how atrocious the crime, when there are laws to punish it and laws that can be enforced, we ought to depend on those laws and never resort to mob violence. It seems to me that thoughtful men ought always to be willing to give their assent to that proposition, and when they get together and think about it and draft resolutions as they did in Mississippi, they ought not to make any exception about crime for which a man can be lynched. I am glad to hear that the State of South Carolina has passed that very commendable law.

Mr. FINLEY. It is embodied in the constitution.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Well then, that the constitution has embodied in it that very proper provision.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Why, certainly.

Mr. MACON. I want to ask the gentleman if I understand him to argue that if there is an infamous, atrocious crime, such as he has referred to in his speech, committed upon a nice, beautiful woman, he believes or feels she ought to be brought before a court of justice, to there detail that crime in all its horror?

Mr GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, that is the old argument which is ordinarily made. In some of the States of the South I understand they have laws which allow the taking of testimony outside.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. There is no such law as that in Mississippi.

Mr. SPIGHT. Will the gentleman name one of those Southern States.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I have seen it in the papers; I can not name it. But you could have the law, if you haven't got it.

Mr. SPIGHT. We could not have such a law without a constitutional amendment.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Well, they have put in constitutional amendments very easily for other purposes—to disfranchise the blacks, for instance—and why can they not have such an amendment for this purpose? It certainly could be arranged. Nor should it be forgotten that a very small proportion of the lynchings in the South are for the crime of rape; but at any rate it seems to me the gentleman does not comprehend that the reason I am opposing it is not because of any sympathy I have for the criminal. No punishment is too severe for him. Burning at the stake, of course, is not any too good for him; but it is much better that the criminal should escape his punishment in this life than the law upon which the whole country rests should be gradually weakened.

Mr. SPIGHT. Mr. Chairman, does not the gentleman know, as a lawyer, that in every State constitution almost there is a provision that the defendant in a criminal proceeding shall have the right to be confronted with the witnesses at the trial?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. But that law can be as readily changed as the other laws of the constitution. You are constantly changing them.

Mr. SPIGHT. And that there can be no trial except by the woman coming into court and giving her testimony?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Why, yes; if the law is fixed differently.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to ask the gentleman, as a matter of information, whether there did not occur up in Massachusetts last year, or some time recently, a case where a mob tarred and feathered a man and a woman in one of the suburbs of Boston—I think in Marion?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. If the gentleman knows anything about that case he can give it—not in my time, however.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman say that he does not know anything about that case——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not.

Mr. BARTLETT. And the gentleman never read of it in the papers?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I may have done so. I do not remember anything about it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me to say that I hold in my hand a few newspaper clippings that I cut out of different papers during the summer vacation. Three of them were cut out since I came here at this session. All of them are cases of the lynching of negroes north of Mason and Dixon's line. I want to ask the gentleman whether he will object to my inserting these in the RECORD?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly nobody takes the floor in his own right oftener than the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I have no doubt he can secure in his own right the opportunity to publish those matters, if he wants to do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do not want to take up the time of the House in reading them——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. You can not put them in my remarks. You will have abundant time, no doubt, to get them in your own. [Laughter.]

Mr. KENNEDY. I should like to ask one question: Will some gentleman undertake to explain why or how it is any apology for lawlessness in the South to cite certain instances of like lawlessness in the North?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I think I said a little while ago that there is mob violence in the North as well as in the South; that there is a disorderly element in the North, always ready to break out, and I think it is vastly encouraged by these continual outbreakings in the South. The spread of this lawlessness affects both sections of the country.

Now, the natural feeling of antipathy to the negro is, I think, stronger and more instinctive in the North than in the South. I think there is in the North a stronger physical repugnance, because we are not brought up with the negroes; do not see them so frequently; do not have the same feeling of intimacy with them as those who have been brought up with them as children. For this reason, I suspect there is a stronger natural repugnance toward the negro in the North than there is in the South. At the same time, we do not recognize this preposterous talk of "social equality" or inequality, which, coming from the South, rather amuses me, as if there were in this country social classes; as if there were such a thing as social superiority and social inferiority, and as if a man is injuring himself by associating with one man, or not injuring himself by associating with another. It seems to me that this feeling is one of the unfortunate growths of this whole problem.

The argument constantly advanced is: "We can not admit the negro to social equality."

I confess I'm somewhat at a loss to know what they mean by social equality, and I don't believe they know themselves. I had supposed that in this Republican form of government all social grades and orders and precedence had been forever abolished, and that there could be no social claims or distinctions. That there will be different social circles everywhere is inevitable; that each man has the right to select his social friends and associate with whom he pleases, I supposed, was a natural and inalienable right here, and this will naturally lead to social sets and cliques, but they will all be founded on taste and congeniality, and will have no basis in equality or inequality. Indeed, the opposite argument denies this right of each man to choose his own social friends, and says he must claim them in the class others dictate. I suppose theoretically in this country everyone is equal socially. We know, of course, that everyone is not equally agreeable socially, or equally refined, or equally brilliant, or equally companionable.

The social qualities in value, the elements which entitle a man to distinction and popularity socially are, I think, first, refinement and cultivation of mind and body (senses), then a genial, kindly nature, then a power of brilliant or interesting conversation. That is, I think, a rare enough combination of qualities to entitle any man or woman who possesses them to social distinction. I can not see how any accident of birth, such as color of skin or hair or eyes, can affect at all this title to social distinction. Any such accident of birth may arouse individual prejudice or dislike and may give that individual just cause for avoiding his society, for everyone is entitled to claim his own associates and may justly allow prejudice or whim or folly to exclude persons from his social intimacy, but he has no right to set those standards for others or pretend that his prejudices make a just basis for a general law of social distinctions.

The true basis of social eminence every reasonable person ought, I think, to admit, is in the qualities defined, and while anyone has the perfect right to disregard them for himself and select his own companions according to his own whims, and associate with men as coarse and vulgar as he pleases, he has not the moral right to try to impose his unusual tastes on others as a general social law. That law in this democracy must be admitted by all to be merit; and while you or I may choose not to associate with persons of a particular race or religion or occupation, yet we have no right to impose our prejudices on others or to claim our social inclinations constitute a social code or law of caste. I think we all feel inclined to ridicule the social pretensions which we read of in the press of our great cities as if there were some imaginary four hundred who are entitled to social preeminence. That seems to be founded mainly on wealth, often vulgar and ostentatious, and of course has as little title to superiority as color or any other accident.

It is quite natural that those who can afford to live on something the same scale should associate most closely; that those should be invited to elaborate and expensive entertainments who give similar entertainments in return, and as it is the gorgeousness of a social affair which must attract the attention of the press, it is quite natural that those who spend most money in society should be most talked about and should form, as far as notoriety is concerned, the most prominent social circle; and so, doubtless, in our large cities there has developed a certain social exclusiveness, founded mainly on wealth, which perhaps considers itself and is treated by the press as socially preeminent. But no thoughtful person will admit any social superiority to this assumed aristocracy. Every reasonable person knows that in every large city there are other social cliques with, to say the least, as much intelligence and refinement and attractiveness and morality and pursuit of high ideals as are found among their more showy and conspicuous neighbors, whose pretension to social supremity is mainly a sham and a folly, for it has not the true American basis of real superiority. All pretension to social superiority founded on anything except superior refinement and knowledge and courtesy is preposterous and un-American.

The most aristocratic of England's poets laureate says: "Kind hearts are more than coronets, and simple faith than Norman blood." And if we ridicule and censure an imaginary superiority founded on wealth, how much more ridiculous and censurable is a superiority founded on complexion. It sometimes leads to grotesque absurdities. I was traveling in the South not long ago when the men in the smoking compartment were discussing social conditions in a way so narrow and unintelligent that I occasionally suggested a few questions, and in a short time was engaged in a good-tempered argument, which resulted in their sage conclusion that I must be from Massachusetts and of course could not comprehend their point of view—a very easy and comfortable way for them to dispose of my troublesome questions. One of the most loud and extreme of the party, who stated that his occupation was what we in New England would call a "runseller," and who was clean neither in his language nor his linen, asked me if I considered a negro my social equal. I responded that whether a man was equal to me socially depended on his qualifications and not his complexion. Whereupon he loudly exclaimed that he considered every white man his equal, but that he was superior to every negro.

I felt like admitting the first part of his statement, but the preposterousness of the last part impressed me, and yet I suppose it is the view which has been so carefully cultivated in the South that it has become general. Here was this runseller, inferior to Booker Washington, for instance, in every quality you can think of—inferior in physique, in cleanliness, in intelligence, in knowledge, in cultivation, in morality—incapable of comprehending the aspirations which govern that negro's conduct, and yet, in the ignorant self-satisfaction of race pride, loudly asserting his superiority.

If one man is superior to another socially in this country, it is because he has greater refinement and courtesy, and for no other reason. It matters not whether he lives in a palace or a hovel, whether he has the skin of a Caucasian or a Hottentot or a Chinese, if he has developed those qualities which humanity the world over recognizes as making a gentleman he is entitled to a gentleman's treatment. You are not obliged to associate with him—every one can choose his own friends—but to pretend that you are socially his superior is to proclaim your ignorance or your insincerity.

You gentlemen from the South in this House are not ignorant. You are not ignorant of the facts. You know that in a country where there are no titles of nobility, where there is no legal aristocracy, equality can have but one standard—merit; and yet, knowing these things, you are afraid or unwilling to admit them. You have not the courage to state what you know. How, then, can you be surprised if there comes to us, who note this occasionally, the suspicion that this whole attitude upon the negro question is artificial and insincere, and is encouraged and cultivated and maintained as an easy way to continue political supremacy and solidity, and to preserve that usefnl asset—a solid South. Do not pretend to misunderstand me, and to pretend that I mean that contempt for the negro is artificial and insincere. That I do not assert. On the contrary I believe that it is genuine throughout the South—deep seated and fiery. But what I do mean is that you men of the South, who are intelligent and thoughtful, know that this contempt is justified, if at all, not by the color of the race, but by the ignorance and coarseness of the race, and you know that when individuals rise above that coarseness and ignorance and show knowledge of refinement they are entitled to the same recognition as other men.

You, who know that in this land of equality merit is the only true basis of distinction socially or otherwise, do not dare admit these fundamental truths, but you either observe a politic and timid silence or, worse yet, approve and encourage a prejudice which your judgment must condemn.

That is the complaint I make against you who ought to be leaders of thought in your section—that you do not dare to affirm and maintain what you must know to be right; that not one of you dares to rise above local prejudice and assert the universal truth that in this country every man should be judged upon his own merits and not upon the merits of his ancestors. Race prejudice is not new. It is one of the most common and bitter incidents of history; but until now there have always been men brave enough to defy it. The Jews have been persecuted from the time of Pharaoh, but there have always been men among the persecutors to rebuke and condemn it. But you have cultivated in the South such a consuming hatred that apparently no man dares express an enlightened opinion.

We have not been without race prejudices in the North. You all know how in the fifties the people became alarmed at the vast tide of ignorant foreigners that came sweeping over us; how they feared that our political institutions would be wrecked in this deep and muddy current, and how they appealed to race prejudice, and how that appeal took possession, as it always will, of the thoughtless, selfish minds, and how it swept the country with the appropriate title of "Know-nothings." But during that craze there were not wanting in the North men who dared defy popular passion; who dared appeal to the fundamental principles of American democracy; and though their voices were disregarded for the moment, the sober sense of the people gradually recognized their folly and disowned and deserted it.

But so arrogant and proscriptive is public opinion in the South that no man raises his voice against it. And can you wonder if, when we see this apparent unanimity of opinion, contrary to the dictate both of reason and humanity, and when we observe that it is the main basis of the political solidity of the South, the cement that holds firmly together the most incongruous materials; when we are so frequently assured in private conversation that but for this one issue they would be Republicans—can you wonder that we sometimes suspect that the reason more of you gentlemen—leaders of the thought in your section, as I presume you are—do not try to mitigate the passion of race prejudice is not so much that you are timid and fearful as that you are selfish and politic; that you find here a useful and unassailable method as long as you hold together of keeping your political power intact, and so, instead of denouncing it as savage cruelty, encourage it as necessary, and so are free to talk free trade or free silver or any other heresy which will appeal to the Democracy of the North as Democratic doctrine, while you know that the South is safe by the unceasing pressure of race prejudice—so violent and brutal as to crush out all contradiction?

That race prejudice should exist surprises none. The occurrences of the past half century have been such as to inflame it violently. None could expect or ask that it be eradicated. It exists everywhere, but that it should be pushed to a greater extreme than exists anywhere else on the civilized globe, that it should extend to both political and social status, and that no man should rise up enlightened and courageous enough to disown its thraldom and admit its barbarity is both surprising and discouraging. And when you find that it is this prejudice which keeps all political power safely in one party—that it can always be invoked to do party service—you can but suspect that the reason intelligent men cater to it is not that they find it respectable, but that they find it useful: not that it keeps their districts orderly, but that it keeps them in office; not that they believe it salutary for their country or their State, but very salutary for their party.

Now, do not misunderstand me. I do not claim that you or I or anyone else is obliged to associate with anyone he does not like. Each of us can choose for himself his own associates. You can choose them by color or by any other quality; but we have no right to say to somebody else that they shall not exercise the same choice. We have no right to say that our friends are the only social caste, and that all those who associate with any different caste are degrading themselves or disgracing themselves. As the gentleman from Mississippi said the other day about that little incident that happened in the White House—and I was very sorry to hear him say it; I was very sorry to hear a man of his eminence say that it was a disgrace to have invited Booker Washington to lunch—I do not know anything about——

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. POU. I simply desire to remark that the gentleman's protest against lynching is probably well timed, for the Boston Advertiser of the 28th or 29th——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Well, I just yielded to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. POU. Only one sentence. I find in that paper a statement that a mob of white men in your town ran a negro nearly 2 miles, trying to get at him because at a base ball game he had whipped a white man in a fight.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Well, that is a very pertinent interruption! I was not discussing that question at all—left it some minutes ago. I think——

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. May I interrupt the gentleman one minute?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I believe the gentleman is perfectly honest and sincere in his expression of belief.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I believe that. Now, the gentleman said there ought not to be any social superiority. The gentleman makes a difference between social superiority and social equality, does he not?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Well, I suppose one is a contradiction of the other.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Now, how many negroes are there in your State?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not know.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. About thirty or forty thousand, I believe.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not know.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Will you state whether you ever practiced social equality by inviting negroes to dine with you or to visit your family?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, that is like the old question before the war—"Do you want your daughter to marry a nigger?"

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. We wish to know whether you practice what you preach?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I have never invited a negro to my table.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Why have you not done so? I understood you to yield to me for a question.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I did. Will you please keep quiet until I can answer it? [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, there are a great many more than 40,000 people in the State of Massachusetts that I have never invited to my home and table. I invite whom I please.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. You misapprehended my question if you think that is an answer.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I have not got through with answering you.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Why did you not invite some one of these 30,000 negroes?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Because I did not please to.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Why did you not please to do it?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. If you will please keep quiet, you will find out perhaps. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I have never invited one. I invite to my table exactly whom I please. I select my social companions from those agreeable to me, and shall continue to do so, and I also exercise the same privilege in the selection of those whom I shall invite to my home. I do not claim that those whom I invite are of any better social standing than those whom others may choose to invite.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question there? That is a very long answer to a short question.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I supposed I had the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. You yielded to me for a question.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I invite those whom I please, and I think that every man has that right; and, further, any man who does not want to invite a man because of his color or slight acquaintance, or because of some peculiar temperament or any deformity, can decline to do so. That does not make them superior, nor does his declining to do so make them in any way inferior.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. That is a good answer.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. All right.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I just want to ask you this question now.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I will not yield now until I get through.

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHEN. It will be a very easy question.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I want to draw the corollary from that. The corollary is this: I claim that I have the right to invite anybody I please, and I will say that every other man has the right to invite whom he pleases. But to say that because I invite some one whom it pleases me to invite, and others invite any other person whom they please, and I do not like, for me to say that it is a disgrace to him, is preposterous and absurd. A person can invite whom he pleases, and nobody can say simply because some one else has chosen to invite another person whom he dislikes, that that is a disgrace. That is the distinction I draw. That is the condition, I suppose, with all of us.

Mr. SLAYDEN. With the gentleman's permission, I would like to ask him two questions, simple questions. I do not want to make a statement. Does not the gentleman believe that any effort that the Caucasian race can put forward for the purpose of preserving race purity would be worthily done?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then does not the gentleman from Massachusetts believe that race purity is endangered by social and scholastic intermingling?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Oh, well; that is a scholastic question. I hardly feel at liberty to answer it. I suppose, as to race purity, Mr. Chairman, the very first trouble was when we brought into this country these negroes. Now we have got them here. Of course their presence does threaten race purity; but the question, to my mind, the way to solve it, is not by setting up superiority and inferiority, is not by claiming that a man disgraces himself when he invites a negro man to his table. That seems to me to be preposterous.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit me to make a statement?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. You will have plenty of time to make a statement later.

You are going back to the old, old, obsolete theory that it is blood that makes caste. It is not blood that makes caste. It does in Europe.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But blood does make caste in the United States.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It does in some parts of the United States; but blood has no right to make caste. Why, we are all of us, I suppose, glad to have good blood and at the same time good blood does not amount to anything. I know I took some pride a while ago—it was foolish vanity, I suppose, but it rather pleased me—to run across in one of the early reports of Massachusetts the name of my great-grandfather as being a Federal judge who was deposed, put out by the Democratic party when the Democratic party conquered Massachusetts, the last stronghold of Federalism. We are, I think, pleased when we run across an ancestor who was distinguished in any way, but we recognize, at least I do, that it is a foolish and weak vanity, and after all it does not amount to anything.

Lord Chesterfield used to say that it took three generations to make a gentleman. We know better than that. All of us who knew the late President of the United States knew, although he had no ancestry to boast of, that in his ideal union of dignity and courtesy, of self-respect and respect for others, he constantly manifested a perfection of manner that even Lord Chesterfield would have envied. We all recognize that it does not take any generations in America to make a gentleman. We have proved that too often, that any man, no matter what he springs from, may become a gentleman; that it is not an inherited right or caste right; that it simply depends upon the man's own cultivation and refinement and intelligence, and it seems to me Americans have got to stand upon that basis, and any section or any part of the United States that departs from it is laying for themselves a foundation of deterioration, and I am sorry that any gentleman as distinguished as the gentleman from Mississippi should get up and say it is a disgrace to the White House that a President invited a negro there. I do not know anything about the circumstances of it, but I assume, I suspect every impartial man will assume, it was a momentary impulse, just what any other man would have done had——

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. I desire to say I am very glad to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts apologizing for——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Indeed, I am not apologizing for the President. I may say for myself that if he had any reluctance to do it, if he did not wish to do it, if he did it because he thought the President of the United States ought to be high enough and enough above prejudice to treat one man as another no matter what the result was to him, I admire him for it. [Applause.] It was done in a big-hearted way, and done by a man who had birth and breeding and cultivation, so that nobody could dispute his being a gentleman; but I do not believe there was any such serious design in it. I have no doubt it was a mere accident, although I know nothing about it, and yet from that accident apparently have sprung great consequences.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has occupied one hour.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I would like to have a few minutes more.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts time sufficient to conclude his remarks.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I had no intention of occupying anything like this time and I am sure the House will recognize I have not used it all. Now, Mr. Page in his article remarks this about that incident: "The effect was so unexpected and so far-reaching that it astonished and perplexed the whole country." I think it did astonish us, but I think that Mr. Page, not being a politician and not seeing the purpose, did not recognize the real reason. I believe the reason the effect was so great was because about that time there was an election in the State of Maryland and that shrewd Democratic politicians there saw a chance to help their cause by exciting race prejudice, and so, by demagogic appeals, they created a feeling greater than anyone would have anticipated and which I have no doubt carried that State.

And yet in the State of Maryland they pretended that there was danger of negro domination when the negroes are in a small minority, and it was done for political purposes, and unfortunately succeeded.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I want to interrupt the gentleman a moment to remark that in line with what he is now saying the president of the World's Fair Exposition at Chicago, an ex-minister to the court at Madrid, an honored ex-United States Senator, a man than whom no one has a higher standing in Michigan socially, invited Booker Washington to his home. He slept in his house; he sat at his table; and yet I never have heard it mentioned outside of the current item of news in the Detroit papers from that time to this. Why is it that no political capital has sought to be made out of it?

Mr. SLAYDEN. But this gentleman was not President of the United States.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. No; but he was worthy to be.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I think that is the reason that this incident was made so much of, simply that they saw in it an opportunity to make political capital, and gentlemen on the other side must excuse us if we occasionally have a suspicion that this preposterous claim of social superiority is not really genuine in thoughtful minds; that they know perfectly well that in this country race does not make superiority, but they seek by thus appealing to race prejudice to make their whole section solid politically, although they tell us conversationally that if it were not for that fact many of them would be Republicans. Now, that may be an ungrounded suspicion; I hope it is; but I think they must pardon us if we occasionally have this suspicion thrust upon us.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman never heard it suggested also that there was politics in it, in that the delegates to the Presidential convention might be easier secured in that way than in the old way. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I never did, and I do not believe any honest man ever thought so.

Mr. MACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. MACON. The gentleman from Michigan a moment ago asked the gentleman from Massachusetts why it was that so much talk had been made about the President inviting Booker Washington to his table when there was nothing said about the gentleman in Michigan inviting him there to his table. I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts this question: Does not the President of the United States represent every man, woman, and child in the United States as the Chief Executive?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. MACON. Then, sir, wouldn't it be natural for one that is representing me—may I not have the right to complain if that Chief Executive misrepresents me in his executive capacity when he invites negroes to the White House, which belongs to all of us——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Doesn't it belong to the negro?

Mr. MACON. Yes; but—the gentleman in Michigan did not represent any of us, nobody but himself. But the Chief Executive in the White House represents all of us, and on that ground I believe that every true southerner resents it in that way.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that he did not believe that any honest man made the statement which I have heard.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I said that I did not believe that any honest man believes it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I saw it suggested in one of the papers of the South, and also in some responsible paper in the North; whether they believe it or not I can not state.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not believe that any honest man believes it. I think it is utterly preposterous, and I think anybody who thought a minute would say it was the most impolitic thing for the President to do.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow a suggestion of another instance to go along with these others?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes; if the committee is not too tired.

Mr. LACEY. We have a street-car line running from Washington to Mount Vernon by way of Alexandria. Not very long ago the daughter of Gen. Robert E. Lee was summarily arrested in the city of Alexandria and taken from the car by the police because she happened to go to the Jim Crow end of the car.

Mr. OLMSTED. And insisted upon staying there.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry so much has been said about this little incident, which I think was a very casual occurrence and did not deserve the publicity. I think it obtained its publicity and notoriety for political purposes. It is not the first time in our history that such a thing has happened. We remember a Presidency was lost once to the Republican party because of that phrase "Rum, Romanism, and rebellion," which at the moment attracted no attention, but which was taken up for political purposes and exaggerated and made a party cry. I think exactly the same thing happened in this case. That was picked up and exaggerated and made a party issue, and in this case also was extremely successful. I think for any man to say that act was disgraceful argues a very un-American method of looking at our social conditions.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How does the gentleman account for the fact that in the North, where the negroes are permitted to vote, as I understand him, without interruption at all, they are denied the privilege of membership in labor unions and are denied practically in many instances the opportunity to gain a living, when no such prejudice obtains against them in the South?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I am not aware of the fact.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is a fact, if the newspapers have been telling the truth repeatedly from year to year. I make that statement again on the authority of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. It may be true, but that simply corroborates what I have been saying all the time, that there is race prejudice North as well as South.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it artificial?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No; it is natural everywhere. But it is not natural that thoughtful, reflecting men should stimulate it. You may feel it, but every thoughtful, reflecting man knows that it is prejudice and that it is something that ought to be put down, that it is not wise, and he does not try to set it up as a canon for everybody to bow down to, but tries to repress it. That is the trouble I find with the South. I do not blame you for race prejudice. I have no doubt that all of us, if we were there, would feel it.

But what I criticise is the constant attempt to increase it and cultivate it and to apply social ostracism to everybody who does not bow down to it, and therefore to make it constantly more bitter and overwhelming. That is what I object to.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the same race prejudice exist on the Pacific coast against the Chinese?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And would it not exist in the South, or in Massachusetts, or elsewhere if the Chinese—a race possibly as alien to ours as the negro race—were scattered over this country in any considerable numbers?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly, Mr. Chairman. I do not mean to say that race prejudice is not genuine. I think I have made myself clear enough on that point. I agree that this race prejudice is perfectly genuine and far-reaching. The only thing I criticise is that men will not recognize that it is an unfortunate fact, that it ought to be done away with—will not join me in regretting that thoughtful men are not doing what they can to suppress it, instead of constantly doing what they can to artificially educate it, instead of using every effort of social and political influence to stimulate and increase it. That is my objection—not against race prejudice, but against the attempt to increase and spread that prejudice.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have said infinitely more than I had the slightest idea of saying. As I said at the beginning, I certainly do not wish, by any word or act of mine, to stimulate sectional feeling. I appreciate very thoroughly, I think, the condition which faces the South, the terrible experiences it has undergone, and it is encouraging to see that some of the newspapers there are themselves apparently trying to modify this feeling. There is apparently an attempt in some quarters to mitigate it. I think such an effort ought to be shown in this House. Here are the leaders of opinion from the South: here are the men who are thoughtful, who are statesmen, who want to look at these facts as they exist, and who, it seems to me, ought to use every effort not to inflame or extend this feeling, but to temper it. Instead of that, the only speeches we hear here from the South are to defend and inflame it.

Mr. BURGESS. I should like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. He makes quite a grave charge against the South. He says that we are "playing politics" on the negro question.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I did not charge that. I said there was sometimes excited in my mind a suspicion that such was the case. I carefully avoided making any such charge.

Mr. BURGESS. By innuendo you did make it.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No; I said that there was sometimes excited in my mind a suspicion of that kind. I carefully avoided charging it.

Mr. BURGESS. Now, let me ask the gentleman this question: Is not this a case of "the pot calling the kettle black?" Does not the gentleman think that the least said from his standpoint about "playing politics" on the negro question, the better? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let us be fair.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I will be fair to the gentleman. If he alludes to me when he talks of "playing politics," I will tell him that in my district there is no appreciable colored vote. The colored vote makes no difference to me; but I think it no more than fair when such statements are made as were made on the other side that some one on this side should intimate that all of us do not acquiesce in that statement, and it should not be allowed to go without some contradiction. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr BURGESS. I do not pretend to know anything about the political conditions in the gentleman's district, and I can not undertake to enter into that personal question, but when by innuendo he makes this a political question, and says that it is the purpose of the South, in the position taken on the negro question, to do it for political or partisan purposes, I ask the gentleman whether it is not true that his party look upon the negro as a political asset to be played in their interest?

Mr. SLAYDEN. And the negro has been enfranchised for that purpose.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. As to the question of the negro having been enfranchised for that purpose——

Mr. BURGESS. I did not say anything about that.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. But another gentlemen did.

Mr. BURGESS. In speaking about the present agitation of this question I desire to say to the gentleman and to the House that no man living can be more anxious than myself to see a cessation of the bitterness that always arises between the two sides of the House when we go into this question, and, therefore, the less said about it, especially by those who do not live in the midst of southern conditions, and do not know of what they speak, the better for the country.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I quite agree with a little that the gentleman said—that the less said on this question the better, perhaps. I will admit that I hesitated a long time, and I questioned whether it was wise to say anything; but I have intended to speak with so much moderation and temperateness, suppressing much that I felt, so that it should not be considered that I was trying to stir up sectionalism. Whether I have succeeded or not, I shall have to leave to the House. No man himself knows about that; but I did not intend to do it in a political way, certainly, and I say it could have no advantage to myself; but I did think that when speeches had been made on the other side, as they have this session, announcing doctrines which it seemed to me were obsolete, which ought to have been abandoned long ago, which were preposterous and intolerant, it seemed to me it was proper that at least a moderate and temperate statement should be made expressing what I deeply feel, that those remarks ought not to be made, and that they indicate, I am sorry to say, that the South, instead of cultivating forbearance, instead of cultivating moderation, instead of toleration growing there, as I certainly thought it would after the abrogation of all so-called "force laws," and after the entire neglect on this part of the House to exclude, as they had the right to, delegations on that side whom we thought were unfairly elected, I had hoped that, since for many years the South has been left practically to deal with the question as it pleased, moderation would grow up on that side.

All Federal restraint has been removed, there has been no criticism from this side, no matter how much has been felt, and yet apparently in the South the social, political, and industrial possibilities of the negro are being constantly narrowed. It seems to me that in this Congress there has been great harshness of statement from that side of the House, and I thought I would take the responsibility, having no personal interest in it, to state as temperately as I could what I sincerely believe to be the earnest feeling of the great part of the North on this subject.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question, if he will permit.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. REEDER. I want to bring out the fact that with the number of statements that have been made from the other side in regard to our President, whom the Republicans regard as one of the greatest that has ever been in the Presidential chair—I want to bring out the moderation of the North in not speaking of this matter heretofore, by asking this question: I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks there is a village or a small city in any part of the North where ten of the most prominent and most respected citizens would not regard it as an honor to invite Booker T. Washington to their tables if he were in their city?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Of course the gentleman's opinion on that is probably more valuable than mine.

Mr. REEDER. I want to say to you that in my section I believe there would not be one out of a hundred who would not regard it as an honor to invite Booker T. Washington to their table were he to come to our cities or our towns. Now, when we feel that way I want to say that we feel that the President did not go out of his way; and when these accusations are made by the other side, we have been exceedingly temperate not to take the matter up with a good deal of energy.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I think I will let the gentleman put that statement in as his own.

I am very sorry to have detained the House so much longer than I expected.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask how much time the gentleman from Massachusetts consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. Eighty-one minutes.

Mr. BENTON. I yield so much of ten minutes as he may desire to my colleague [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] has given the House the benefit of his studies in sociology and ethnology, and yet there are some people who will continue to believe that social distinctions may be properly based upon race. The gentleman from Massachusetts believes that race and color afford no basis for social distinctions. This merely illustrates what has been said very often and believed very generally—that there is no accounting for some tastes. [Laughter.]

The only thing, it seems to me, that is worth commenting on in connection with this matter and which leads up to the one point on which I wish to speak for a short time is that the gentleman from Massachusetts confesses that prejudice, based upon color, operates to deprive him of a portion of the social advantages which he might otherwise enjoy. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Chairman, in order to illustrate some portions of his address, finds something suggestive of the mob spirit and some danger abroad of mob law in the course of this side a short time since upon two or three different occasions in endeavoring to secure an investigation of the Post-Office Department. The gentleman likens the course taken by those of us upon this side who think there ought to be such an investigation to a mob that overrides the law in order to do what, according to the conception of the mob, ought to be done, but which, according to the mob, will not be done soon enough or not done at all by the law.

Let us see for a moment what was done over here, and see whether there is real, grave danger that there will be inculcated from what we did very much of the mobocratic doctrine, and whether much of mob performance will follow from it. It is a matter of general public notoriety that over in the Post-Office Department a good many things have been done which ought not to have been done and that a good many things have been left undone which should have been done. An investigation inside of the Post-Office Department, directed by the head of that Department—not directed promptly, but reluctantly, and when there seemed to be no other course—has disclosed a great many irregularities and uncovered a good many crimes, and there is every reason to suppose and the belief is general that the surface only was scratched; that where one crime or irregularity was brought up and publicly exposed a dozen and perhaps a score remain to be exposed, corrected, and punished.

Under this condition of things an effort was made upon this side of the House—more than one effort—in an orderly and regular way to have a committee appointed and the Post-Office Department investigated. The committee to which the resolutions looking to that result were referred decided not to report them—took adverse action upon them. The majority side of this House has made it very evident by its acts of omission and acts of commission that it has distinctly determined that there shall be no investigation of the Post-Office Department if it has the power, by the use of technical and partisan rules, to prevent it. Under these circumstances an effort was made, more than once—and effort will be made more than once again before this session closes—to compel an investigation by resort to the best means available. Now, these efforts are characterized as prompted by a mob spirit and likened to the application of mob law. Let us see about it.

The gentleman from Massachusetts says that the one thing to be inculcated and observed above all others is regard for the letter of the law. The gentleman seems to lose the distinction, which I think is apparent to those who may look into the matter, between a law and a rule of this House for the government of the Members of this House in the transaction of our business here. These rules are supposed to be made—are made in theory—to aid in the regular disposition of business in the House. On this side they are not supposed to be properly designed to prevent the House from doing what it ought to do and what a majority of its Members are in favor of doing. Among the other rules is one which prevents the adoption on an appropriation bill against objection of a provision for an investigation of the Post-Office Department.

We propose here to have that investigation, if we can get it, and if it can not be secured in the regular way—not because the rules forbid it, for they do not, but because a partisan majority forbids it—the effort of the minority will be, as it has been and ought to be, to set aside the rule for the time being, in order to accomplish what ought to be accomplished, what could be accomplished under the rules if the majority were disposed to use them fairly, and with regard for the public good rather than for partisan interests.

The proposition was and is, simply and plainly, inasmuch as the resolution for investigation was not permitted and will not be permitted by the majority to come before the House in accordance with the rules, that the House avail itself of its rightful power to declare for an investigation, even if it be necessary in order to do it to set aside temporarily any rule that may stand in the way.

Does the gentleman from Massachusetts forget, or did he not think, that the disregard of the rights of the people, disregard of the necessities of the occasion, disregard of the public welfare, in denying, for partisan power and for partisan purposes, an investigation of this Post-Office Department, might in itself be a suggestion of sympathy with mob rule, and might itself be a very fruitful intimation that gentlemen upon his side of the House have very little regard for law and right when partisan interest is in the balance upon the other side? [Applause on the Democratic side.] If we can not have an investigation according to the rule, what difference about the rule being shoved aside temporarily in order to have an investigation anyhow, for the good of the country and the good of the service?

Now, what would there be about this investigation if it were ordered? We have not the power to appoint the committee; we have not the power to dictate the appointment of a single man upon it; we have not the power to keep a single member off of it; we are not trying to make up the committee; we are not trying to hamper the Speaker in appointing the committee.

Our position is simply that enough has been disclosed in reference to transactions in the Post-Office Department to make it an imperative legislative duty, a high, patriotic, American duty, to investigate that Department by a committee from this House. That is our position about it. We have sought in regular channels to reach the end. The partisan majority here block proceedings in the regular way, and when we then attempt in the only other way open to us to accomplish a result so much to be desired, and one against which honesty and patriotism ought to interpose no objection, on which side is the mob spirit? Our only chance for a vote for and against investigation is found in trying to set aside, temporarily, the rule with reference to whether or not a particular proposition is technically in order at a particular time. That is all there is about it, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, with no amount of discussion about sociology and ethnology, and as to taste in social affairs, based upon a disregard of color, can obscure the fact that we are trying to get an investigation and you prevent it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifty minutes to my colleague [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to mix up in this debate on the subject of lynching; but I will tell the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] when lynchings will cease. Whenever the black man or yellow man or white man or red man ceases to commit rape, then lynchings will cease. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, by accident or design two of the ablest Republican debaters in the House sit side by side—the gentleman from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, and the gentleman from Iowa, Colonel HEPBURN. They are veteran Representatives, each having served in Congress almost a fifth of a century.

> So they grew together,
> Like to a double cherry, seeming parted,
> But yet a union in partition;
> Two lovely berries molded on one stem;
> So with two seeming bodies, but one heart.

[Laughter.]

They are luminaries of the first magnitude in the Congressional galaxy—high priests in the temple of protection. Considering their high standing in their party and their great influence over Republican Members, each might without exaggeration or bad taste adopt the descriptio personæ which the centurion gives of himself in the eighth chapter of the gospel according to St. Matthew, which runs in this wise:

> For I am a man under authority, having soldiers under me: and I say to this man, go, and he goeth; and to another, come, and he cometh; and to my servant, do this, and he doeth it.

[Laughter.]

Consequently they are heard here gladly, while in the country at large Republicans who have neither time nor opportunity for independent investigation accept their statements and conclusions without cavil and with pathetic credulity. This is not the language of flattery, but is only a fair exposition of the status of these two conspicuous statesmen. We are all proud of their skill in mental pugilism—none more so than myself—even though many of us bear scars as testimonials of their prowess. [Laughter.]

Lord Bacon took all knowledge for his province. Our two friends are not so ambitious. The gentleman from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, takes prophecy as his peculiar domain, occasionally dipping into history as Silas Wegg dropped into poetry, while the gentleman from Iowa, Colonel HEPBURN, usually confines himself to history, with now and then an excursion into the realm of the imagination. [Laughter.]

The truth or falsity of a prediction can not be ascertained till after the event; therefore the gentleman from Ohio is on less dangerous ground when essaying the rôle of Elijah and Isaiah than is the gentleman from Iowa when speaking in his capacity as the Tacitus, the Sismondi, the Gibbon, or the Macaulay of our country.

A celebrated dictum of Aaron Burr was this:

Whatever is boldly asserted and plausibly maintained is law.

Our two friends appear to think that—

Whatever is positively stated and forcibly reiterated is argument.

Occasionally these two statesmen fall afoul of each other; but their spats are merely lovers' quarrels. They soon kiss and make up again, continuing to fight in pairs.

On the 1st day of December, 1903, the gentleman from Iowa, Colonel HEPBURN, in a fine burst of eloquence, said:

A little while ago—ten years ago—we used to pride ourselves on the fact that we produced 11,000,000 tons of pig iron. It used to be said that the production of iron indicated the status of a nation in its civilization and that those nations that were capable of the greatest production stood highest in the plane of civilization. We boastfully used to say, "Look! 11,000,000 tons." Last year—we produced 44,000,000 tons of pig iron, and this year (1903) it is estimated that the magnificent results in the production of iron will reach the stupendous sum of 48,000,000 tons, a result, I say, direct and clear of the protection that we have had the wisdom to give to our labor in that direction.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD discloses the fact that that gorgeous passage was received with "Loud applause on the Republican side." And no wonder, for it was wild enough to arouse the least emotional person to enthusiasm.

He says that we produced 44,000,000 tons of pig iron in 1902. His Republican friends who applauded him will be astounded to learn—perhaps he will, also—that in 1902 we produced only 17,821,307 tons of pig iron, instead of 44,000,000, and that he overstated the amount by 26,178,693 tons, thereby multiplying our output of pig iron by more than two and one-half times what it really was.

Jonah's gourd vine has been considered the ne plus ultra of fast growers ever since he was ordered to start on his journey to Nineveh. Hereafter when anyone desires to indicate the most rapid growth of any particular thing, he will compare it not with Jonah's gourd vine, but with Colonel HEPBURN's pig iron. [Laughter and applause.]

This is the day of watered stocks, and Colonel HEPBURN simply fell into the evil habit of the times and watered his pig-iron statement liberally—so liberally in fact as to qualify himself for membership in the defunct shipbuilding trust. [Laughter.]

Did he do it with intent to deceive? Of course not, for he is an honest man. He did it from lack of information—merely that and nothing more. Likewise those enthusiastic but benighted Republicans who furnished the "loud applause" did so for lack of information. It was a clear case of the blind leading the blind and all tumbling into the ditch together.

The figures as I give them are taken from the Statistical Abstract and from a well-considered editorial in the Scientific American.

The gentleman from Iowa owes it to his own reputation and to the country to rise in his place and frankly confess that he inadvertently overstated our output of pig iron in 1902 by 26,178,307 tons, otherwise hundreds of Republican editors and orators, who regard him as an oracle, will be quoting his inflated and erroneous figures as arguments during the impending campaign, thereby deceiving the unwary voter.

In that same glowing and amazing speech Colonel HEPBURN said:

I live in a county of 24,000 people, a farming community. There is not a protected industry in that county.

I thank him for that last sentence—"there is not a protected industry in that county." By that one declaration, unwittingly uttered, no doubt, the gentleman from Iowa answers completely all the Republican speeches, editorials, and essays as to how the high tariff helps the farmers.

His is one of the finest agricultural counties that a crow ever flew over—almost as rich as those composing my district. Not his county only, but his entire district, produces corn and other cereals in profusion and of highest quality. His is one of the greatest corn-producing districts in America, and therefore in the world. About Shenandoah, in his district, they raise what they claim to be the finest seed corn on the whole face of the earth and sell it as high as $2 per bushel.

Is corn raising an industry? Most assuredly, and a vast one. Is it protected? The gentleman practically says, "No." The Dingley bill, together with Republican spellbinders and editors, says, "Yes;" and the fallacious theory that corn raising and kindred industries are protected has held Iowa in the Republican column for years.

The Dingley bill levies a tariff tax on corn of 15 cents per bushel of 56 pounds, and on corn meal of 20 cents per bushel of 48 pounds. The rates on other farm products are about the same.

When the farmer complains about the extortionate tariff rates on articles which he must buy, he is told by Republican leaders that he has no ground to kick; because by the tariff on corn and corn meal he is protected.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If there were no tariff on corn or corn meal, where would the competitive product come from—what country produces corn?

Mr. CLARK. That was precisely what I intended to ask the first Republican that rose to say that the tariff on corn and corn meal is really intended to keep out foreign corn and corn meal.

There is no corn belt except in the United States. They can raise oats, wheat, barley and rye in Canada, and some little corn. Canadian corn consists principally of nubbins. They can not raise such corn as grows in Colonel HEPBURN's district or in Judge SMITH's district or in my district or in any other good corn district in the United States. Now I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question; and if he can not answer it, I will give anybody else leave to answer it, and that is that if there is no corn to be brought into the country in competition with our corn, what did you put the tariff tax in that bill for? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will allow me, I suppose it would be a very good measure to use in reciprocity with some other country.

Mr. CLARK. Reciprocity! Go to! [Laughter.] I want to give you the figures. I will tell you what it was put in there for. It was put in there as a bait to catch gudgeons. [Laughter.]

How much corn is imported into the United States? In 1902, the last year for which I have the figures, we produced 1,522,519,891 bushels; exported 28,028,688 bushels; imported only 17,238 bushels. Think of the American farmer fearing competition in corn raising with such a showing as that! In 1901, in which there was a bumper crop of corn, the figures show a much greater disparity between production of corn and imports thereof. That year we produced 2,105,102,516 bushels; exported 181,405,473 bushels; imported only 5,169 bushels. There is scarcely a quarter section in Colonel HEPBURN's district or mine which will not produce that much corn in any fair crop year. Last year one of my constituents had 11 acres of corn which produced an average of 133 bushels and a fraction to the acre, and it wasn't an extra good season for corn. On 39 and a fraction acres he could have raised as much corn as we imported in 1901, and yet farmers are expected to whoop it up for the Republican candidates because they are protected from competition with foreign corn raisers.

After using the words which I have quoted, the gentleman from Iowa proceeded:

On the 1st day of last October there were $2,580,000 of deposits in the little banks of that county. Ninety-five per cent of those deposits belonged to the farmers, and they amounted to more than a hundred dollars for every man, woman, and child in the county.

All of which he attributed to the tariff, utterly ignoring the sunshine, the rich soil, the rain, the delightful climate, the favorable geographical location, and the labor of Democrats and Republicans alike in that great county. His is the "post hoc ergo propter hoc" argument by which any fallacy can be seemingly established.

The gentleman's memory was unusually bad on December 1, 1903, for he declared that for nearly seventy-two years, meaning from 1789 to 1861, both inclusive, "the country experimented with your methods," meaning thereby Democratic methods. If the departed spirits of the mighty dead take any cognizance of debates in this House, I wonder what Henry Clay, father of the "American system," so called—a palpable misnomer for a system old even in mediæval times—thought of that declaration by Colonel HEPBURN? What does anybody who has read even a handbook of American history think of it? Certainly it was a most reckless statement—very wide of the mark. Surely the Democrats ought not to be charged with what happened or failed to happen from 1789 to 1801—twelve years—for Washington belonged to no party, and old John Adams was a rank Federalist, a fierce hater of Democrats. It was under his Administration and for words written about him that that immortal Democrat, Mathew Lyon—the only man ever elected to the House of Representatives from three States, the maternal grandsire of Colonel HEPBURN—was clapped in jail under the sedition laws. Would to God that brave old Mathew's Democracy had descended along with his splendid talents to his distinguished grandson. [Applause.] When Colonel HEPBURN rebels against the Republican programme of unrighteousness, as he sometimes does, it is the unconquerable spirit of Mathew Lyon, the bosom friend of Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson, stirring within his breast and refusing to be entirely exorcised.

Surely John Quincy Adams, William Henry Harrison, John Tyler, Zachary Taylor, and Millard Fillmore, with their Administrations, should not be charged to us. So that by that measurement the gentleman's seventy-two years dwindle to forty-eight.

No fair statement of the matter will take from Henry Clay and charge to Democrats what happened, good or bad, under his various protective-tariff acts, beginning in 1824 and extending practically to the passage of the Walker Act in 1846.

The Walker Act, a Democratic measure, gave such satisfaction, the country so flourished under it, that in 1856 no party mentioned the tariff in its platform, and Mr. Blaine in his book accounts the period from 1846 to 1861 as the most prosperous long stretch of years in our annals.

In that same speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] there occurred the following dialogue with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]:

Mr. HEPBURN. Ah, compare prices. The gentleman from Mississippi is exercised because of the shelter that is given by the protective tariff to the steel trust. Why, steel is worth $24 a ton now. When you had your way about it, when the Democracy gave us our tariffs, when steel was introduced into this country under the Walker tariff, what did we pay for it? One hundred and sixty-five dollars per ton in New York for steel rails.

That was the price until encouragement to manufacture was given by the Republican party.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Can I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Has not that same comparative reduction in the price of steel rails taken place in Great Britain and everywhere else in the world?

Mr. HEPBURN. Surely. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But it is the competition of the United States and the superior methods of the United States and the greater intelligence of the workmen of the United States, stimulated by Republican tariff, that has brought this reduction in price. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Once more the Republicans furnished the "loud applause," because they didn't know what they were doing.

The idea that Colonel HEPBURN really intended to convey, until Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi cross-examined him, was that the Walker tariff was responsible for steel selling at $165 per ton prior to the civil war and that the Dingley bill is responsible for its selling as low as $24 per ton now. Clearly the gentleman from Iowa was presuming on the ignorance of his hearers, and judging from the vociferous applause on the Republican side of the House, his presumption was well founded. It is perfectly apparent that if steel has gone down all over the world, gone down lower in Europe than America, as Colonel HEPBURN admitted when prodded by Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi, then it must be plain to even the dullest intellect that the lowering in price was not produced by American tariff laws, but by some cause operating generally throughout the world.

When catechised by Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi, Colonel HEPBURN tried to get out of the hole by asserting that the falling off in the price of steel was caused by "the competition of the United States, and the superior methods of the United States, and the greater intelligence of the workmen of the United States, stimulated by a Republican tariff."

That bald assertion may satisfy Republican Members of Congress and cause them to applaud, but it will not deceive any intelligent man elsewhere, for everybody that knows anything of the subject knows that the principal element in the reduction of the price of steel throughout the world was the invention in 1864 of the Bessemer process of making steel, which the Scientific American editorially declares—was and will ever be the greatest invention in the history of iron and steel.

The Scientific American continues:

By this service—

The use of the Bessemer converter—

it was made possible during an operation of an extremely simple and inexpensive character and in a few minutes' time to convert common cast iron into steel. Steel, from costing as high as 6 or 7 cents a pound for the common grades, began steadily to decrease in cost until in the closing year of the nineteenth century steel billets, in lots of a hundred thousand tons, came to be sold at the rate of "3 pounds of steel for 2 cents." The entrance of the Bessemer converter marked the close of the iron age, and from this time on steel became the standard material of construction in all but a few limited classes of work.

It was not long before the Bessemer process was introduced into this country, and this fact, coupled with the period of general commercial prosperity which followed upon the close of the civil war, stimulated the development of the iron and steel industry so greatly that by the year 1872 the total production of pig iron had increased to 2,548,713 tons.

Unfortunately, the gentleman from Iowa is entirely wrong in his statements. I wish it were true that an American had invented the process which has so greatly cheapened steel, for I would like to see my countrymen win all the honors of this world. I do not believe it is possible for the gentleman from Iowa, with all his facility of utterance and power of expression, to frame a more patriotic sentence than that; but the plain truth of history is that Henry Bessemer, who invented the Bessemer process, was an Englishman. He was knighted for his invention and is known in history as Sir Henry Bessemer. If in England men were ennobled for bestowing blessings upon people instead of killing them, then Henry Bessemer, instead of having a baronetcy for his reward, would have had a dukedom, for with the single exception of Lord Bacon, father of the inductive philosophy, he contributed more to the comfort of his countrymen and his kind than any other Englishman that ever lived.

Even Colonel HEPBURN, with his disposition to claim everything for the protective tariff, will surely not claim that it was responsible for Sir Henry Bessemer or for his process of making cheap steel.

That Americans have improved the Bessemer process is true, and have thereby still further cheapened steel—facts at which we all rejoice, whether Democrats or Republicans.

The speech of the gentleman from Iowa, from which I have been quoting, warmed the cockles of the heart of the gentleman from Ohio and caused his face to shine. So, when Colonel HEPBURN concluded, General GROSVENOR arose and began his remarks by saying:

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend, in the time allotted to me, or in so much as I may use, to mar the beauty and symmetry and irresistible logic of the speech of the gentleman from Iowa.

There hasn't been anything as rich as that since Rev. Dr. Chadband ceased from stretching out his arms and unctuously exclaiming, "God bless you, my children!" [Laughter.]

When I was a boy back in the hill country of Kentucky, I attended a horse race at a crossroads village. A man wanted to bet and kept bawling, "Who will hold the stakes?" "I will hold them," said a stranger. "But who the deuce will hold you?" inquired the would-be bettor. [Laughter.]

General GROSVENOR indorsed Colonel HEPBURN's speech, but who indorsed the General? [Laughter.]

Before quitting this steel subject I wish merely to mention the preposterous theory of the very pleasant gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] that the railroads pay for the steel rails which they use and that it is nobody else's business at what price they buy them. That sort of logic may be accepted in Pennsylvania, but it will not go anywhere else in the wide, wide world. Everybody knows that in the last analysis the passengers who travel on railroads and the shippers and consumers of the freight shipped over them pay for the rails, rolling stock, and everything else and for everybody used in conducting a railroad. And the pay is collected in advance—at least, usually. Uncle Sam contributes to the cost of steel rails, etc., for he ships his mail, military stores, and soldiers over the railroads in great abundance. Consequently he is interested in the cost of steel rails, as is every person that rides a mile on a railroad or ships a pound of freight.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; certainly.

Mr. OLMSTED. The gentleman is aware, doubtless, that steel rails are higher now than before the present tariff bill was passed.

Mr. CLARK. Well, I suppose they are.

Mr. OLMSTED. And wages are higher.

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. And yet the railroad rates are lower.

Mr. CLARK. The volume of business is greater, and therefore the profits are greater. What have you got to say to that? [Laughter.]

Mr. OLMSTED. There is an increase in the price of rails, an increase of wages, but notwithstanding all that your farmer pays a lower rate of transportation by about 12½ per cent than he did before.

Mr. CLARK. Suppose he does? Your proposition is that the railroads pay for the steel rails. They don't do anything of the sort. Rates have come down because of the volume of business and competition. Your Uncle Samuel is interested in the price of steel rails. He ships his supplies for the Army, his munitions of war, and his soldiers over the railroad, and you can risk your head on the proposition that he pays the highest rate that the traffic will bear. Therefore as legislators we are interested in cutting down the cost of steel rails, as citizens who use the railroads we have an interest in cutting it down, and I give it as my opinion, whether it is anybody else's or not, that it is an outrage for American steel rails to be sold in Europe and Asia for a less price than they are sold to the American people, who are made to pay the difference. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman announced his objection to the Dingley law. Would he repeal that law, and if he would, does he wish to return to the Democratic Wilson bill?

Mr. CLARK. You can not inveigle me into any discussion about the Wilson bill now. I have not time for that at present. I will tell you in a few minutes what our position is on the tariff question; I will come to that; I have got it all prepared for you. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I wish the gentleman from Missouri would explain why an ad valorem tariff which amounts to more than 20 cents a bushel was put on corn in that remarkable instance.

Mr. CLARK. I will explain that to you also. The men that got up the Wilson bill simply took that rate from the McKinley bill. Where the framers of the McKinley bill got it I don't know. [Laughter and applause.] I have not traced its pedigree any further back. It is absolute idiocy, but they borrowed it from the Republican party.

Mr. DALZELL. They were the Democrats who borrowed it?

Mr. CLARK. Some were Democrats and some were sort of Democrats. [Laughter.] Here is what I say about that: That the tariff on corn is a humbug and fraud, I care not who puts it into a bill.

Mr. DALZELL. I would like to ask the gentleman if the rates of the Wilson bill were put on corn for the same purpose that the gentleman states the rates were put in the Dingley bill, a bait to catch gudgeons?

Mr. CLARK. No; they were put in there because it was in the McKinley bill.

Mr. DALZELL. Well, they didn't follow the McKinley bill very closely. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK. The trouble was that they followed it too closely. If they hadn't followed it so closely, we would have succeeded in the election of 1894 and have had the Government ever since.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What assurance can the gentleman give to the country that if the Democratic party should be put into power again they will not follow the Dingley bill?

Mr. CLARK. Because JOHN S. WILLIAMS, CLAUDE SWANSON, SAMUEL B. COOPER, SAM ROBERTSON, BOURKE COCKRAN, and CHAMP CLARK constitute the minority on the Committee on Ways and Means, and we are a new set of Democrats.

Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota. How does the gentleman know he will be appointed again?

Mr. CLARK. How do I know we will be appointed again? Of course we will be appointed. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. But JOHN WILLIAMS will not be with you. He will be in the chair.

Mr. CLARK. Well, if he is in the chair, he will appoint the rest of us, especially me. [Laughter.] And if I happen to beat Mr. WILLIAMS for Speaker, I will appoint him. [Renewed laughter.] So we are going to have a Democratic Ways and Means Committee when we get into possession of this House.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether he entertains the same views and stands in the same position to-day as regards the tariff that he did in 1897, when the Dingley bill was on its passage?

Mr. CLARK. Academically, yes. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Just exactly. Now, sit down until I answer you. [Laughter.] Academically, yes.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman allow me for a moment?

Mr. CLARK. Wait until I get through with the other Pennsylvanian. I heard the Hon. Thomas B. Reed state, on the floor of this House, that free trade is a beautiful theory; that it might do for England, but that we had not yet reached that state. Practically, as legislating for the country, with certain laws on the statute books and certain habits formed, I would not go to a free-trade basis, and before I get through, if I have the time, I will state the Democratic position exactly about cutting down the tariff rates.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman allow me now?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. DALZELL. I want to know whether the gentleman on March 31, 1897, said on the floor of this House the following:

> I repeat, so that all men may hear, that I am a free trader, and proudly take my stand with Sir Robert Peel, Richard Cobden, John Bright, and Henry George. I may be an humble member of that illustrious company, but it is better to be a doorkeeper in the house of honest free traders than to dwell in the tents of wicked protectionists.

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. DALZELL. That is an accurate quotation?

Mr. CLARK. I think it is. It sounds like I would have put it. [Laughter.]

Mr. DALZELL. Does the gentleman still keep the same position?

Mr. CLARK. Theoretically, yes. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

I will tell you my position about it exactly. If a new continent should be discovered and I should be given charge of its government after it was populated, I would establish free trade.

Mr. LACEY. And not otherwise?

Mr. CLARK. Not otherwise? There is no sense in adding those words to it. I have stated the case. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota. Will not the gentleman be good enough to define "free trade" as he uses that expression now?

Mr. CLARK. Free interchange of the products of the world.

Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota. Without a tariff on any import?

Mr. CLARK. In order to raise money to run the Government I would levy a revenue tariff. We are in a situation produced by the practice and theory of over a hundred years. The American people have fallen into the habit of raising a large part of the revenue by tariff taxes, and they seem to think it is easier to do it in that way than in any other. Therefore I would not go to the basis of free trade. I would cut down the exorbitant and outrageous exactions of the Dingley bill.

Mr. DALZELL. But, if the gentleman will allow me, we are in precisely the same condition to-day that we were when he made that declaration, so far as revenue is concerned.

Mr. CLARK. Oh, no; we are not.

Mr. DALZELL. Precisely.

Mr. CLARK. I made that declaration in 1897, and the Treasury was empty. Now the Treasury is overflowing, and if they will pare down the appropriation bills in this House as they ought to be pared down we could cut off two hundred millions of revenue and never miss it.

Mr. OLMSTED rose.

Mr. CLARK. Oh, wait a moment until I get through with Brother DALZELL.

Mr. WATSON rose.

Mr. CLARK. Wait until I finish with the gentleman from Pittsburg. Because we are in the habit of raising revenue by tariff taxes under both Republican and Democratic administrations, and because the constitutional provision for levying a direct tax is unfair, inasmuch as it makes it in proportion to the number of people in a State instead of in proportion to the property thereof, and inasmuch as the Supreme Court of the United States knocked the income tax in the head, to tell you the truth about it, I do not see any other way to raise a sufficient amount of revenue to run the Government except by tariff taxes and the internal-revenue system. That is the whole of it.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman gets away from that, I want to understand him. The gentleman says that he was for free trade in 1897 because there was no money in the Treasury, and that he is now for a moderate tariff while the Treasury is overflowing.

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. DALZELL. That is what the gentleman said a few moments ago. I will ask him whether he stands by that proposition?

Mr. CLARK. Yes. If the gentleman will give the rest of my sentence, and the rest of it was that if the appropriation bills in this House were pared down the way they ought to be you could dispense with two or three hundred millions of this revenue we spend here every session.

I say this, that theoretically the doctrine of free trade is right, but practically under our laws and our customs and our habits and our Constitution we must have a tariff to help raise money enough to run the Government; but in levying a tariff we want reasonable rates, not excessive rates. For that reason I am in favor of doing exactly what the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] says. I am going to include his remarks in my speech.

Mr. DALZELL. Did not the same considerations apply in 1897?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly. If I had been making an extended speech in 1897 and had undertaken to explain the whole situation as I am doing now, I would have made identically the same declaration in 1897 that I am making here now.

Mr. OLMSTED. On March 31, 1897, according to the RECORD, you said, speaking of custom-houses:

> I would destroy every custom-house in America. If I had my way to-day, sir, I would tear them all down from turret to foundation stone.

Now, I would like the gentleman to state whether that was theoretical or academic, or whether the gentleman really meant it.

Mr. CLARK. It was both academic and theoretical. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLMSTED. And you also said that you were ready to abolish the whole diplomatic service of the United States.

Mr. CLARK. I think it would not be any loss to the public if the entire diplomatic establishment were abolished right now.

Mr. OLMSTED. Meaning custom-houses or diplomatic service?

Mr. CLARK. The diplomatic service, of course. I do not want to waste so much time on that point——

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. In the same speech from which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has just read, the gentleman from Missouri said he would "rather be a doorkeeper in the house of the Lord than to dwell in the tents of the wicked." Was that meant to be considered as "academic?"

Mr. CLARK. That was taken from the Bible; the gentleman ought to read his Bible. [Laughter.]

Reverting to how the tariff on agricultural products affects farmers, I will quote certain pertinent remarks made in this Hall by an eminent Republican statesman—not a wild-eyed Democrat—the Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON, senior and perpetual Senator from Iowa. On March 24, 1870, he said:

> The agricultural interest, it will be seen, is much the largest interest in its aggregate product, as well as in the number of persons employed. I believe that no one will claim that this large interest is directly protected. It is true that under existing laws there is a small duty upon wheat, barley, oats, and other agricultural products. But this does not afford any protection to the great wheat and grain producing sections of the country.

The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Wilson, in discussing this question yesterday, stated truly that the cost of wheat in New England is about $1.70 per bushel, while in Illinois, Iowa, and Wisconsin, the price is about 65 cents per bushel. The Canada wheat is the only wheat which comes in competition with our own. Canada being nearer New England than the wheat-growing States more than makes up the duty in reduced transportation. What is true of wheat is equally true of other grains; therefore the farmer has no protection directly, and whatever benefit he derives is indirect and from the home market furnished for agricultural products. Unfortunately for the farmer the market price for his wheat is fixed by the price which the surplus will bring abroad or the price of wheat in London or Liverpool. At that market, where the surplus is sold and which fixes the value of the whole crop, he comes in competition with grain produced in Crimea, in Hungary, and in the region of the Baltic, from fields cultivated by what is known as "pauper labor."

But I am told that we must so legislate as to furnish a home market for all our agricultural products, and this can only be done by a high tariff. Anyone examining the subject will see that our agricultural products increase more rapidly than our population, so that if we do not export these products in the natural condition, we must do so by converting them into manufactured products when they are the cheapest, and the nation selling cheapest will control the market. This will exclude our highly taxed manufactured articles made from highly taxed materials from the markets of the world, although we have natural advantages possessed by no other nation. Hence our manufactured products are $10,000,000 less this last year than they were ten years ago. But our policy with reference to agriculture has a tendency to increase its products rapidly.

We give every man who will till the soil, whether native or naturalized, 160 acres of land. I do not condemn this policy. It is a policy which has developed the western portion of the country more than any other policy which could have been devised. But it is a policy the effect of which will be constantly to increase the agricultural products of the country, creating a surplus over and above the home consumption. That surplus must have a market somewhere, and that market will be found principally in Europe in its natural form or in the shape of flour, pork, beef, or some other concentrated product. This can only be avoided by such an adjustment of our industries as will make us large exporters of manufactured products, which is practically impossible under our heavy taxation, direct and indirect.

It is said by those who defend the present and proposed tariff that if we will wait long enough commodities will be cheapened. How long shall we be required to await this happy result when exactions under the tariff will be paid by the foreign producer? Certainly not until we can manufacture like articles cheaper than they can be made abroad. There are instances, doubtless, now where the tariff does not add to the cost of the articles to the consumer, depending on the character of the production, the particular place of production, and the relative cost of transportation to distant parts of the country; but this can not be true generally. A striking illustration of this untruth may be found in the cost of an article of large production and the raw materials of which are in great abundance, namely, iron, as set forth in a report made to the House by the committee appointed to take into consideration the cause of a decline in American commerce.

The testimony disclosed in that report shows that it is impossible for us to compete with the English in building ships. And why? Because the tariff by increasing the duty on iron has increased its cost. Now, if it has increased the cost of iron to the shipbuilder in this country, it has also increased its cost to every consumer in this country.

A few days ago the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] delivered a carefully prepared speech in this House on reciprocity, which has been lauded by the "stand-pat" organs as the very best presentation of their case, and there can be no doubt that in that estimate of his argument they are correct, for he is one of the ablest men in public life. Personally he is a most delightful gentleman; intellectually he is the peer of any.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman will allow me to say that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] told me that that was one of the best speeches made in the House.

Mr. CLARK. Well, if the gentleman from Mississippi told you that he displayed very good taste. I will say that you can come as near making black appear white as any man on the face of the earth. I will give you that testimonial of Republican good character right now. [Laughter.]

During the course of his remarks the following colloquy took place between him and myself:

Mr. CLARK. I want to ask the gentleman three questions.

Mr. DALZELL. Does the gentleman expect me to answer all of them at once?

Mr. CLARK. No; you may answer them all at once or may answer them seriatim. Is not Hon. John A. Kasson, of Iowa, a Republican in good standing and an officer in a Republican Administration?

Mr. DALZELL. Well, he is known as a Republican. I do not know anything about his standing. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. All Iowa Republicans are in good standing.

Mr. DALZELL. I would not like to certify to that.

Mr. CLARK. In the second place, did not Mr. Kasson, as the appointee of President McKinley, negotiate quite a number of reciprocity treaties which have been pigeonholed with great unanimity by the Senate?

Mr. DALZELL. I have already said so.

Mr. CLARK. Now, my third question is this: If the gentleman's statement here to-day properly expounds the present Republican position on the subject of reciprocity, then does not the transaction touching the Kasson treaties show that the Republican party has changed its base on reciprocity in the last seven years?

Mr. DALZELL. Not at all. The Republican party has been consistent from the beginning; it never agreed to any reciprocity treaty that involved anything except noncompeting articles. [Applause on the Republican side.] And it is because it has been consistent to its principles that those treaties have never been ratified, and, in my judgment, they never will be ratified by Republicans.

Mr. CLARK. The real reason those treaties have never been ratified is because McKinley died, is it not?

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, not at all.

He was trying to prove that the present Republican stand-pat position is the one occupied by President McKinley and the earlier Republican statesmen, while I was endeavoring to force him to admit that the stand-patters have departed from their old-time position.

In order to prove that he was advocating McKinley reciprocity the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] quoted one-half of a sentence, and one-half only, from Mr. McKinley's first inaugural address, and two short, disconnected sentences from his Buffalo speech, not choosing in either case to quote the context. Now, here is what President McKinley said, and all that he said, in his first inaugural, on reciprocity:

In the revision of the tariff special attention should be given to the reenactment and extension of the reciprocity principle of the law of 1890, under which so great a stimulus was given to our foreign trade in new and advantageous markets for our surplus agricultural and manufactured products.

The brief trial given this legislation amply justifies a further experiment and additional discretionary power in the making of commercial treaties, the end in view always to be the opening up of new markets for the products of other lands that we need and can not produce ourselves and which do not involve any loss of labor to our own people, but tend to increase their employment.

In that address Mr. McKinley declared for an enlargement of Blaine's reciprocity scheme. And what was that scheme? Blaine's reciprocity, as he forced it into the McKinley bill, was in the following words:

That with a view to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing the following articles, and for this purpose, on and after the 1st day of January, 1892, whenever and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the government of any country producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, raw and uncured, or any of such articles, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States which, in view of the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides into the United States, he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power, and it shall be his duty, to suspend, by proclamation to that effect, the provisions of this act relating to the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, the production of such country, for such time as he shall deem just, and in such case and during such suspension duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides the product of or exported from such designated country as follows, namely:

And then follows the schedule of articles and the tariff rates which the President was authorized to place upon them.

That was the reciprocity which President McKinley favored March 4, 1897. Time went on. From his coign of vantage he took a wider view of the world and his ideas broadened, so that four and a half years later, in his great speech at Buffalo—which was his farewell address to the American people—he indicated that our old modus vivendi was too narrow and must be expanded. The keynote of that speech is this philosophic sentence:

We must not repose in fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing.

I here quote the whole passage from that speech from which Brother DALZELL quoted only two disconnected sentences. It is as follows:

Our capacity to produce has developed so enormously and our products have so multiplied that the problem of more markets requires our urgent and immediate attention. Only a broad and enlightened policy will keep what we have. No other policy will get more. In these times of marvelous business energy and gain we ought to be looking to the future, strengthening the weak places in our industrial and commercial systems that we may be ready for any storm or strain.

By sensible trade arrangements which will not interrupt our home production we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus. We must not repose in fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing. If such a thing were possible it would not be best for us or for those with whom we deal. We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor. Reciprocity is the natural outgrowth of our wonderful industrial development under the domestic policy now firmly established. What we produce beyond our domestic consumption must have a vent abroad.

The excess must be relieved through a foreign outlet, and we should sell everywhere we can and buy wherever the buying will enlarge our sales and productions and thereby make a greater demand for home labor.

The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals. Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not.

If, perchance, some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue or to encourage and protect our industries at home why should they not be employed to extend and promote our markets abroad?

The fact that Mr. McKinley indorsed the Kasson reciprocity treaties furnishes proof positive that he was not in favor of reciprocity confined to noncompetitive articles, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania would have us believe.

What Republican will dare stand up in this House or elsewhere and assert that William McKinley was unsound on the subject of a protective tariff from a Republican standpoint? Yet, in transmitting to the Senate the reciprocity treaty which Mr. Kasson, his own appointee, negotiated with France, he used this language:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith, with a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, a convention signed at Washington, on July 24, 1899, by the respective plenipotentiaries of the United States and France, under the authority conferred by section 4 of the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States," approved July 24, 1897.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 6, 1899.

He might have killed that treaty by a pocket veto and withheld it from the Senate entirely. But he did nothing of the sort; he sent it to the Senate "with a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification."

The Senate not having ratified this Franco-American treaty within the time limit, there was a new treaty negotiated extending the time, and Mr. McKinley sent the following message to the Senate:

In view of the pressure of important legislation before the Senate, it has been deemed expedient to extend for a period of twelve months the time prescribed for the ratification of the commercial convention between the United States and France, signed at Washington on July 24, 1899. To that end the respective plenipotentiaries of the two countries, on March 21, 1900, signed an additional and amendatory article, which I transmit herewith for the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, March 21, 1900.

What Republican Member of this House will stand up in this presence and say that Theodore Roosevelt is unsound on this protective-tariff question from a Republican standpoint? I would like to see the color of the hair and the cut of the eye of the Republican Member who will perform that caper at this particular juncture. By so doing the prospect for pie of any Republican Member would go where the woodbine twineth. It is true that Colonel Roosevelt is a civil-service reformer of high degree, but, also, like Collins's ram, he is a man of his own head. He will allow no Republican to question his party orthodoxy. He holds the whip hand. Republican statesmen, great and small, must dance to his piping. After he came into the Presidency, this Franco-American reciprocity treaty not having yet been ratified, he sent the following message to the Senate:

I transmit, for the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, a convention between the United States of America and the French Republic, signed at Washington on September 24, 1902, further extending the time within which may be exchanged the ratifications of the commercial convention between the two countries of July 24, 1899.

I also inclose a report from the Secretary of State submitting the convention for my consideration.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, December 3, 1902.

Who will dare say that President Roosevelt was not honest in sending that treaty to the Senate for ratification? Now, remember that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] says:

Republican reciprocity is reciprocity in noncompeting articles and in nothing else. [Applause on the Republican side.]

This Republican reciprocity means, according to Mr. DALZELL, therefore, when stated in plain, unequivocal words, that we are to give favorable tariff rates only on those imports which we can not produce ourselves.

Some of you will be very much surprised to learn that scores and scores of articles produced in France and in Algeria, which we also produce in the United States, were to be admitted into the United States at much below the Dingley rates under the provisions of the Franco-American reciprocity treaty negotiated by Mr. Kasson and indorsed and recommended for ratification by Presidents McKinley and Roosevelt. Here is the Franco-American reciprocity treaty in full, containing a complete list of the articles to be introduced into the United States, with the scale of reductions from the Dingley rates:

CONVENTION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND FRANCE.

The United States of America and the French Republic, animated by a desire to facilitate and increase the commercial intercourse between the two countries, have agreed to conclude a reciprocal convention for that purpose, and have appointed their respective plenipotentiaries therefor, namely:

The President of the United States of America, Hon. John A. Kasson, special commissioner plenipotentiary, etc.; and

The President of the French Republic, His Excellency Jules Cambon, ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary, commander of the Legion of Honor, etc., etc., who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

It is agreed on the part of France that all articles of merchandise being the product of the soil or industry of the United States of America exported to France or Algeria (whether shipped directly to a French or Algerian port or arriving by way of an intermediate port) shall be admitted into France and Algeria upon payment only of the minimum rates of duty imposed on the like articles of any other origin; and no port or other charges of any kind shall be imposed upon such merchandise prior to entering into consumption unless they are such as are equally applied to importations from all foreign countries; and no prohibition or restriction of the importation of any of the products of the United States shall be made except such as shall equally apply to the like products in the like condition arriving from any other country. The right to provide sanitary measures against the introduction of pests or of infectious or contagious diseases is reserved.

The following articles of merchandise are excepted from the provisions of this article respecting the minimum rates of duty, namely:

French tariff No.
1. Horses.
37. Butter.
89ter. Lucerne and clover seed.
164. Fodder.
295. Cast iron.
476. Skins and hides prepared.
478 to 482. Boots and shoes, and parts of same.
488. Belts and cords and other leather articles manufactured for machinery.
524. Dynamos.
525. Machine tools.
536. Dynamo conductors, and parts.
536bis. Arc lamps known as "regulators."
91. Sugar.
163. Chicory roots, green or dried.
34. Eggs.
36. Cheese.
38. Honey.
347. Porcelain.
462. Cardboard, rough in sheets.

ARTICLE II.

Reciprocally, it is agreed on the part of the United States that the articles of merchandise, the product of the soil or industry of France or Algeria designated and described in the following schedule (whether shipped directly to a United States port or arriving by way of an intermediate port) shall be admitted into the United States on payment only of the reduced duties as declared and set forth in said schedule; and no port or other charges of any kind shall be imposed upon such merchandise prior to its entering into consumption except such as are equally applied to importations from all foreign countries; and no prohibition or restriction of the importation of any of the products of France or Algeria shall be made except such as shall equally apply to the like products in the like condition arriving from any other country. The right to provide sanitary measures against the introduction of pests or of infectious or contagious diseases is reserved.

ARTICLE III.

It is further agreed that should the United States concede upon any articles of merchandise described in the preceding schedule being the product of the soil or industry of any other country a lower rate of duty than that herein designated for the like articles being the product of the soil or industry of France or Algeria, such lower rate shall be applied of right and without delay to the like articles being the product of France or Algeria.

It is also agreed that any reduction of the duties provided by the tariff act of the United States, approved July 24, 1897, upon sparkling wines, or upon the articles of woolen manufacture described in paragraphs Nos. 366 to 382, inclusive, of said tariff act, being the product of the soil and industry of any other European country, which may after the date hereof be conceded to such country by the United States shall be immediately extended to the same articles being the product of the soil or industry of France or of Algeria.

ARTICLE IV.

Should either of the high contracting parties during the term of this convention by any legislative action so change the relative conditions of trade as existing at the date of this convention, to wit, France by increasing the minimum rates of duty herein stipulated for products of the United States, or the United States by increasing the reduced rates set forth in the foregoing schedule, or increasing the existing rates upon other French products, or either party by imposing new restrictions or prohibitions upon importations from the other, in such case the option is reserved to the other high contracting party to terminate its obligations under this convention after six months' notice to the other of its intention to arrest the operation thereof.

ARTICLE V.

This convention shall be duly ratified by the respective Governments so soon as practicable and within eight months from the date hereof, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington; and it shall go into effect ten days thereafter, and shall, subject to the provisions of Aricie IV, continue in force for the term of five years from the date of such exchange of ratifications, unless one of the high contracting parties shall in the meantime have given notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same, in which case the convention shall be terminated twelve months from the reception of such notice by the other party. If neither high contracting party shall have given such notice before the expiration of five years, the convention shall continue in force from year to year thereafter until twelve months after such notice shall be given.

In witness whereof we, the respective plenipotentiaries, have signed this convention in duplicate, and have affixed our respective seals.

Done at Washington, this 24th day of July, A. D. 1899.

JOHN A. KASSON. [SEAL.]
JULES CAMBON. [SEAL.]

I call the attention of the House to the vast advantage that would have accrued to us under that treaty, for practically all of our products would have been admitted into France and Algeria at the minimum French tariff rates now existing or hereafter to be established.

Now, I will put it to the gentleman—he need not answer it now, but can answer it some other time, or he can answer it now, if he wishes to. That treaty negotiated with France is a sample of them all. It contains tens and hundreds of articles to be introduced from other countries that we raise or produce. For instance, silk goods, food products, cotton goods, straw hats, cement, furs, feathers not dressed, mineral waters, and hundreds of articles.

It lets in practically all American products whatsoever at the minimum French tariff rate that now exists or may hereafter be established. Noncompetitive articles! Why, the treaty we negotiated with Great Britain for Bermuda provides that Bermuda onions and Bermuda potatoes shall come in here either free or at a much lower rate than the Dingley tariff rate. So with Austria-Hungary; so with the South American states. One of them lets asphalt in free, and yet there is enough asphalt in the State of Utah to last the world for a thousand years. Talk about noncompetitive articles! It's utter nonsense.

Mr. DALZELL. Well, but if the gentleman will allow me, he is simply begging the question. He is talking here about treaties that have never been ratified and that I said never would be ratified as long as the Republicans were in power.

Mr. CLARK. Oh, no; but I am talking about treaties that William McKinley indorsed, that were negotiated by one of his agents; that John Hay, Secretary of State, indorsed; that Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States, indorsed; that John A. Kasson indorsed.

Mr. DALZELL. I hope the gentleman will put into the RECORD what Mr. McKinley said about those treaties and what Mr. Roosevelt said about those treaties. I do not care about Mr. Kasson.

Mr. CLARK. I will read them right now, if you will give me more time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to ask the gentleman a question, and he can answer it in connection with this. What authority has the gentleman from Missouri to say that because Mr. McKinley sent to the Senate these treaties that he indorsed them; and what right has he to say that the Secretary of State indorsed these treaties?

Mr. CLARK. The gentleman from Ohio understands the English language—no one better. Here is what Mr. McKinley said n his message transmitting it to the Senate:

I transmit herewith, with a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification——

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. Do you think that the President would send a treaty to the Senate that he was opposed to?

Mr. DALZELL. Why, that is the language of the Chief Magistrate sending treaties to the Senate ever since the time of George Washington.

Mr. CLARK. Do you believe there ever was a President of the United States a big enough fool to have a treaty negotiated and send it to the Senate for the purpose of having it ratified that he was not in favor of himself?

Mr. DALZELL. I do not think it is conclusive when he sends it to the Senate that he is in favor of it.

Mr. CLARK. Why, there never was any such an idiot as that in the White House.

Mr. DALZELL. I have seen no evidence that Mr. McKinley favored the Kasson treaties. I have heard the statement made and have seen it in print but have never had any evidence that was conclusive to my mind that Mr. McKinley had indorsed the Kasson treaties; and I challenge the gentleman from Missouri to quote a single Republican statesman who ever expressed himself in favor of reciprocity in competitive products.

Mr. CLARK. I am going to read you this message of the President.

I transmit herewith, with a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, a convention signed at Washington, etc.—

Being the Franco-American treaty.

I will leave it to the gentleman himself, I will leave it to any fair-minded man on the Republican side of this House, who has any regard for his reputation for veracity, to say if that recommendation does not imply that William McKinley was in favor of ratifying the reciprocity treaties. I will tell you what Thomas Jefferson did when a minister negotiated a treaty he did not like; he simply killed it by a pocket veto, and I have no doubt others have been killed in the same way.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. There never was any President who ever sent any treaty to the Senate that he was not in favor of.

Mr. CLARK. As the gentleman from Mississippi suggests, there never was any President who sent a treaty to the Senate that he was not in favor of. He would be an idiot if he did; and Mr. McKinley was not an idiot. Theodore Roosevelt is not an idiot. He knows something about more things than any other human being I ever clapped my eyes on. [Laughter.] Mr. Kasson's act was Mr. Secretary John Hay's act, and Col. John Hay's act was President McKinley's act, and at the same time it was the act of the Republican party. You gentlemen can kick and squirm as much as you please, but you have departed from the McKinley faith.

Nobody ever heard a single syllable of this "stand-pat" theory until just after the Ohio election in 1901. Then General GROSVENOR was interviewed as to the reason for the great Republican victory, and in his enthusiasm he declared that among other things it meant that there was no more chance of the Dingley rates being cut down or tinkered with than there was to amend the Ten Commandments. That is what he said.

Mr. GROSVENOR. How did it come out?

Mr. CLARK. I will tell you how it came out. I saw you sit in your place and vote that we reduce the Dingley Act. Did you not?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I voted for reciprocity with the island of Cuba.

Mr. CLARK. Well, when you did, you were voting to cut down the tariff rates.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all. I voted to make trade with Cuba, which is what you are in favor of.

Mr. CLARK. Did you vote for free coal?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did.

Mr. CLARK. Was not that cutting down the tariff rates?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Just as I would propose to take money out of my pocket and give it to a man who was suffering with the cold to buy coal.

Mr. CLARK. Why not vote for it now?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Because you have learned the futility of the legislation yourself.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. CLARK (to Mr. HEMENWAY). Can you give me fifteen minutes?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I can give you ten.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] very much for his kindness and his courtesy. So what I was saying and what I repeat is that you have departed from the faith. I do not care what your faith is. You are entitled to any position you choose to take; but you ought to have courage enough to come out of the brush and acknowledge that you have changed your position.

An inspection of the reciprocity treaties negotiated with Great Britain, with Austro-Hungary, with Ecuador, with the Argentine Republic, with Honduras, and with other countries will show that the reciprocity recommended by Presidents McKinley and Roosevelt was not confined to noncompetitive articles, but extended also to competitive articles and very freely, too. If Republican reciprocity on February 29, 1904, the day on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania made his speech, was what he declared it to be, then a vast change has come over the spirit of the Republican dream since those two Republican Presidents sent those treaties to the Senate.

There is no man now in public life who can state a proposition more luminously, more tersely, or more comprehensively than my friend the Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, floor leader of the minority in this House.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] says there is a Democratic reciprocity and a Republican reciprocity, and I have quoted his definition of Republican reciprocity. In his speech on Cuban reciprocity, Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi defined the Democratic position on reciprocity in the following language, and I commend it to all men possessing a sense of justice. It is an authoritative statement upon which we are willing to stand in the pending campaign and hereafter. Here it is:

The Democratic party believes that when on any articles that go to Cuba or any other people on the surface of the earth you get an agreement to reduce the burdens to their consumers by reducing the duties in their markets, you have conferred a benefit upon their consumers and also on the American producer, because you enable the consumer in Cuba or elsewhere, in any country entering into these reciprocal relations, to get the product at a cheaper price. That enables them to buy more of our product. That enables those who have been buying it to buy more, and enables those who have hitherto not been able to buy any to buy some, and that increases the volume of the consumption of American products and benefits the American producer by enabling him to sell more goods at the old profit, and thus both parties to the trade are benefited.

There is not even the shadow of a doubt that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] properly sets forth the present Republican position as to reciprocity, but it is the reductio ad absurdum. It is reciprocity whittled down to the little end of nothing—the play of Hamlet minus the Prince of Denmark. Articles which we do not produce are so few in number and so inconsequential in value when compared with those we do produce that reciprocity in noncompetitive articles only is a practical abandonment of the whole theory of reciprocity; it is a hollow mockery, a delusion and a snare, a stupendous confidence game upon the people. They ask you for bread and you give them a stone.

The initials of the Republican party should be changed from G. O. P. to G. O. H.—Grand Old Humbug.

The truth is that nobody ever heard an intimation of this stand-pat policy until after the election in Ohio in November, 1901. A day or two after the election the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] was interviewed as to the meaning of the overwhelming victory in his State. In exuberance of spirit he said, inter alia:

It means that there is no more prospect of the Dingley tariff rates being tinkered with than there is of amending the Ten Commandments.

That is the germ of the stand-pat doctrine.

There is an old saying, "Honor to whom honor is due." It is only fitting and proper that he should be given full credit for this new doctrine which is destined in the providence of God to destroy the Republican party utterly. His dictum has been modified through the formulas of "Let well enough alone," "Keep on letting well enough alone," and finally "Stand pat." But the idea which he expressed so epigrammatically is the essence of the creed of the stand-patters. It is apropos to state in this connection, that the most eloquent stand-pat speech ever delivered was by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH]. The greatest triumph of an orator is to force applause from his opponents. That he did in abundance. A man who can grow eloquent in favor of standing pat, could grow eloquent about a grindstone.

To once more quote my friend JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS: "Republicans advocate sham reciprocity: Democrats advocate genuine reciprocity," a fact which sooner or later will percolate through the public mind.

I have another important witness to show the Republican change of base—for the worse.

The Washington Post is one of the most brilliantly edited newspapers in America. It is independent in politics, generally leaning toward the Republicans. On many things I do not agree with it; it is a stanch advocate of a protective tariff. No man can call it a free-trade organ without doing for himself what Dogberry ordered his clerk to do for him—write him down an ass. Last fall, in a very able editorial discussing a speech made by Senator FORAKER in opening the Ohio campaign and larruping the Republicans for not keeping their pledges, the Post used this this caustic language:

On various pressing questions as to which no specific promises were made in the platform of 1900 the Republican party is hopelessly divided. The most important of these is the tariff, and the division on that is radical. The gulf that yawns between the faction of which BABCOCK, DOLLIVER, and Cummins are leaders and the greater faction, led by ALDRICH, Hanna, and PAYNE, appears to be unbridgeable. In the absence of "any sincere programme of legislation" on this subject the party will in all probability continue to stand pat on a policy that repudiates Blaine, McKinley, and Dingley, and whose bitterest assailants are distinguished and lifelong Republicans.

A little later on the Post made the following remarks:

A question that ought to be of some moment to Republican leaders is whether or not they will put their party into the Presidential campaign as the perpetrator of a palpable and gigantic fraud in a matter of interest to all the people.

The Dingley tariff, as it was properly called in its infancy, but as it can not now be called with due respect to the memory of Nelson Dingley, contained in itself the promise of a very early reduction of sundry schedules. That measure included the Blaine reciprocity scheme, to which the Republican party was committed by every possible form of commitment. Mr. Dingley and his Republican associates on the Ways and Means Committee believed in reciprocity and imagined that all Republicans shared that belief. Not doubting that their bill would soon be revised by reciprocal agreements, they naturally and properly placed the rates at such a height that they would not be too low after the intended and expected cutting down. This is history, despite its denial by gentlemen who should have been more careful, and, as we have said, the placing of those schedules at a height which left a margin for reciprocity trading was just what the occasion demanded—was an exercise of sound, practical business sense.

But the retention of those schedules at that height is a fraud. That ugly word is the name that fits it. It is a fraud on the great mass of the American people, perpetrated in the interest of a comparatively small number. It is a repudiation of Republican policy and pledges and the reverse of a compliment to the memory of Blaine and of Dingley. To use the reciprocity scheme in order to put the schedules at an unnecessary and unfair altitude, and then to repudiate reciprocity and keep them there is the dangerous game which the "stand patters" are playing, not in the interests of protection, but to pander to the greed of monopolistic combinations, and it is the avowed intent of the leaders to go into the Presidential campaign with their party's record thus decorated!

Even as late as March 25 the Washington Post contained the following editorial, which all concerned can read with a good deal of profit and instruction:

Yesterday's issue of the Post contained copious extracts from a speech delivered by Senator ALDRICH to his constituents at a meeting of the Young Men's Republican Club of Providence on Wednesday evening. That it was a strong speech need not be said, for the senior Senator from Rhode Island has always confined his discussions of public questions to that class of efforts. That it was a frank and full statement of the issues upon which it touched can not be said with due regard for truth. As chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, Mr. ALDRICH is high authority on tariff and finance. No man knows better than he that his own party is all at sea on the tariff and at sixes and sevens on finance. But the Senator ignores the factional strife on those questions. He says:

"In the tariff the difference is between those who believe in the policy of affording legislative protection to American industries and labor and those who, under one pretext or another, oppose this policy; between those who believe that modifications of protective duties should be made by friends of the system as fast as changing conditions warrant and those who, on the other hand, believe that the structure should be destroyed or mutilated at once by direct or indirect assaults."

That is not a fair statement of "the difference." That is not the way in which Senator DOLLIVER or Representative BABCOCK would have put it. That is not the feeling which, for several years past, has been manifested by millions of Republicans in New England and the West in their loud demands for tariff revision on protective lines—tariff revision by the friends of protection, who have long been in complete control of the legislative department. The real difference, as these Republican revisionists would state it, is between the protection views of Blaine, McKinley, and Dingley and the astounding new departure of the stand-patters; between those Republicans who have been and still are demanding the reduction of duties promised and prepared for by the Dingley Act and those who have so persistently enforced the policy of standing pat on tariff schedules framed with a view to their prompt reduction by reciprocal arrangements.

Within the last few years a thrilling slogan has been given to Republicans. "Stand pat!" which is suggestive of the war cry of the old-time chevaliers d'industrie, "Stand and deliver!" And, mirabile dictu! in their ranks has arisen a tariff reformer who is causing Republican big wigs to have insomnia from pestering their heads in the vain endeavor to invent ways and means to squelch him or to "circumwent" him, as Weller pere would have said. His theory of tariff reform has been heralded far and wide as "the Iowa idea." His habitat is Des Moines, his name is A. B. Cummins, and he is Republican governor of the Hawkeye State, serving his second term, having been reelected last year after his "idea" had been thoroughly exploited.

A comet with a tail of fire 10,000,000 miles long did not create greater consternation among the ignorant and superstitious idolators of antiquity than this mild tariff reformer has carried into the ranks of the "stand-patters."

Stand-pat organs have applied to him all sorts of opprobrious epithets, most common among which is that of "traitor."

Nevertheless in 1903 he was renominated for governor by acclamation by the Republicans of Iowa and reelected by an overwhelming majority, and, unless all the signs of the times fail, he will head the Iowa delegation to the Chicago convention.

If he is as bad a man as the stand-patters represent him to be, why was he reelected governor of one of the strongest Republican States in the Union? Was it out of superabundant tenderness for an erring brother, or was it because the Cummins following in Iowa is too strong to be turned down with impunity? Why is this "traitor" to Republicanism to go to Chicago as the bellwether of the delegation? Is it because he represents not only "the Iowa idea" but the true Republican idea also, or is it because the Iowa stand-patters fear him and would placate him at least till after the November election?

What is "the Iowa idea" as expounded by Governor Cummins? It is this, as expressed in the Iowa Republican platform of 1901, adopted by the convention which nominated him the first time:

We favor * * * any modification of the tariff schedules that may be required to prevent them becoming a shelter for monopoly.

That is the head and front of his offending. That is what has created such a flutter among the faithful.

Behold, how great a matter a little fire kindleth.

By advocating "the Iowa idea" Governor Cummins has become the bete noir of the stand-patters, and they would excommunicate him from the Republican church without delay and without ceremony were they not afraid that, like Samson, he would pull down the temple upon their heads as well as upon his own.

Here are a few excerpts from Republican organs, out of thousands which might be cited, showing the intense hatred entertained for him by the stand-patters:

Republican politics in the Hawkeye State is undoubtedly warming up to the boiling—perchance the boiling-over—point. The Red Oak (Iowa) Express, a stand-patter of the stand-patters, recently delivered itself of these red-hot remarks:

Mr. Blythe's statement to the effect that in order to restore harmony to the Republican party in Iowa at the present time he withdraws from the contest for a place as one of the delegates to the national convention and nominates Mr. Cummins as a delegate at large shows a good spirit, but it is not good politics. There should be no compromise at this time

Mr. Cummins has been compromised with before, and it is hoped most sincerely by the Express that he will be left at home when the honorable delegation starts for Chicago next June. When a man proves himself a traitor to those political principles that have gained him an office he should be hanged, politically speaking, the same as any other traitor The Republican party can not afford to compromise with a man who expounds such doctrine; neither can it afford to allow such a man a position of political trust, such as a delegate to the national convention must assume.

The American Economist, the organ of the Protective Tariff League, says:

If Governor Cummins is wise he will act upon the suggestions of the Burlington Hawkeye and the Sioux City Journal and stay away from the Chicago convention. The Hawkeye expresses the opinion that in view of the widespread demand for party unity but one honorable course remains open to Governor Cummins, viz, "to accept in good faith the opportunity to close up the breach and let Iowa be represented at Chicago as a unit for Roosevelt and the platform on which he will be nominated."

The Journal's suggestion is that in view of the positive manner in which he was turned down at the Polk County convention the indorsement by that convention of his candidacy as one of the delegates at large comes in the nature of a sort of left-handed compliment, and that finding that his tariff and reciprocity ideas are not those of the element that is certain to control the State convention the governor may decide to remain at home. Cheerful acquiescence in the will of the majority would be both prudent and tactful. Should Cummins carry out his threat of fighting for the chance of exploiting his theories as the Iowa member of the committee on resolutions it might be deemed necessary to reject him wholly as a dissentient and a disturber. He has played that rôle too long already. A voluntary retirement from the stage of national politics would seem to be his cue.

When I was a boy the children used to sing a song, two lines of which were:

Beauty is but skin deep,
Ugly to the bone.

That is a perfect description of the Republican condition to-day. Republican harmony, which they spell with a big, big "H," is only on the surface, while Republican dissension pervades the G. O. P. through and through. They may be able, by hook and by crook, to get together for this election, but that there will be a sloughing off of the party which will amount to a split in the near future is indicated by abundant evidence.

That Colonel Roosevelt will be nominated appears to be a certainty, but hundreds of thousands of Republicans will support him under protest. The "stand-patters" will make the platform, but a large minority will receive it sullenly. In fact, the reading-out process of the tariff-reform Republicans has already begun, as is evidenced by this editorial from the Moravian Falls (N. C.) Yellow Jacket:

Of all the funny two-legged animals that chew tobacco and walk on the forked end, those tariff-reform Republicans take the lead. By demanding tariff reform they actually take the position that it is necessary to destroy a part of our prosperity to prevent the Democrats from destroying it all. Reader, do you belong to that class of monstrosities? If you do, the proper place for you to trot is right over into the Democratic camp. All you lack of being a "good Democrat" is a tag and a tin rooster in your hat.

Very much of that sort of rancorous jabber will land hundreds of thousands of the most intelligent and patriotic Republicans in the Democratic camp. Perhaps they will come to us this year.

Last year the Iowa stand-patters and the advocates of "the Iowa idea" locked horns in their State convention and put forth this astounding sentence, among others: "Duties that are too low should be increased, and duties that are too high should be reduced." In all the range of political literature is there anything more preposterous than that? Certainly Talleyrand must have had the Iowa platform makers in mind when he cynically said:

Language is intended to conceal ideas.

And the old Latin author must have been thinking of them when he declared: "Parturiunt montes, ridiculus mus est—the mountains are in travail, a ridiculous mouse is the result."

"Duties that are too high should be reduced." Yea, verily. But what rates do the stand-patters admit to be too high. "There's the rub." Name any schedule you please and they declare at once that that particular schedule must not be touched or the whole tariff system will go to what Mr. Mantalini would denominate "the demnition bow wows."

Mr. WILLIAMS has introduced several bills to reduce rates which are palpably too high. They are all sleeping the sleep of death in that great tomb of tariff-reform hopes, the room of the Committee on Ways and Means.

I have introduced bills to cut the tariff on farming implements, salt, and other necessaries of life to the bone. My bills sleep in the same grave with those of my brother from Mississippi. Others have introduced similar bills, and they have all shared the same fate.

"Duties that are too high should be reduced!" Oh, yes; but I violate no confidence in stating that so long as Republican stand-patters rule the Congressional roost the tariff rate on no schedule whatsoever will be reduced.

Another thing about it while I am distributing honors. The most eloquent stand-pat speech ever delivered in this House was delivered by my friend Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH of Michigan, when he was leading the kickers on that side to run over the Republican machine in this House. The man that can grow eloquent in favor of the stand-pat doctrine can grow eloquent about a grindstone. [Laughter.] There is this much to the credit of Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH: He carries his nerve with him, and when the most of you Republicans got cowardly and voted for the Cuban reciprocity treaty he stood by his guns. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WATSON rose.

Mr. CLARK. Are you from Iowa? [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON. No; I am a Daniel come to judgment. [Laughter.] I want to ask the gentleman if he would like to have inserted in the body of his speech the prophecy that he made on the floor of this House on the 31st of March, 1897?

Mr. CLARK. No; the gentleman can insert that in his own speech. He can not insert it in mine. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman should insert any of my speeches in the RECORD, but I want him to wait until I have finished this speech.

THEIR OX GORED.

The American Publishers' Association a few weeks ago convened in New York and adopted unanimously resolutions calling on the Republican Administration to enforce the antitrust law against the paper trust. They also declared in favor of removing the tariff duties on pulp and white paper. Perhaps a majority of that association—certainly a large percentage—are Republicans, and their action would appear anomalous did we not remember Mark Twain's philosophy to the effect that human nature is very strong and that we all have a great deal of it in us. The members of the Publishers' Association, whether Republicans or Democrats, constitute no exception to the rule. Very much depends on whose ox is gored, and the paper and wood-pulp trust gores the ox of the Publishers' Association; hence this high kick. Of course the paper and wood-pulp trust is no worse than the salt trust, the nail trust, the coal trust, the lumber trust, the beef trust, and the whole brood of trusts.

When consumers of the articles controlled by trusts in general have raised a howl, these same Republican editors who now split the welkin with their protest against the extortions of the paper trust have looked on with a sardonic grin upon their faces, and with about as much sympathy for the victims as the old woman had for the live eels squirming in her hot skillet. In three Congresses I have introduced bills to place wood pulp, white paper, and all the ingredients used in their composition on the free list—one of the propositions now urged by the Publishers' Association as a remedy for trusts. Did the Republican members thereof aid me any? Not that anybody heard of. Now the iron enters their souls and I am glad of it. In the Fifty-fifth Congress they would have had to line up only eight Republican Members to have passed my bill, for every Democratic Member would have supported it most heartily, and no one in his senses doubts for one moment that the Republican members of that association could have lashed that many Republican Representatives, and more, into supporting my bill.

The other day, in the Committee on Ways and Means, I called up my bill to place wood pulp, white paper, and the ingredients thereof on the free list. Lo and behold! Every Democrat in the committee voted for the bill and every Republican voted against it. The Republicans being in the majority, it was defeated.

All the Republican members of the American Publishers' Association are hereby most cordially and urgently invited to train their guns on Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and his ten Republican brethren on that committee, and if they do not do so, they should forever hold their peace.

Commenting on the aforesaid resolutions of the American Publishers' Association, the New York Commercial remarks very pertinently:

It was to be expected that Democratic publishers would encourage such a movement, but it was hardly expected that men who are constantly preaching the benefits and advantages of protection would desert their colors merely because, for the moment, they might profit thereby. How much conviction will protection arguments in the journals published by these men be apt to carry hereafter?

On the 18th of this month the Republicans of Minnesota in convention assembled nominated a ticket and made a declaration of principles. In their platform they say:

We favor such modifications of tariff schedules as from time to time are required by changing conditions, and insist that such changes shall be made in line with the fundamental principle of protection.

That is a remarkable declaration—an effort to mix water and oil—an endeavor to ride two horses going in opposite directions—a palpable attempt to hold with the hare and run with the hounds. The first half is "the Iowa idea;" the last half is the stand-pat creed.

These Minnesota platform makers—artists in their line—

> Palter with us in a double sense;
> They keep the word of promise to our ear,
> And break it to our hope.

All Representatives are, of course, familiar with the Bible, and have read the twenty-seventh chapter of Genesis, in which is recorded that weird story describing the ingenious plan which Rebekah devised to enable her favorite son Jacob to secure from his father Isaac the blessing which was intended for his favorite son Esau. Isaac was old and his eyes were dim, so that he could not see, but his sense of feeling was still acute; and when Jacob presented himself to receive the blessing which did not belong to him, but to his hairy brother, Isaac, being somewhat suspicious, said unto Jacob:

Come near, I pray thee, that I may feel thee, my son, whether thou be my very son Esau or not.

And Jacob went near unto Isaac his father; and he felt him, and said: The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau.

And he discerned him not, because his hands were hairy, as his brother Esau's hands; so he blessed him.

And he said, Art thou my very son Esau? And he said, I am.

Governor Cummins and Brother DALZELL, representing the extreme factions in the Republican party, will have to exercise all their senses of seeing, smelling, tasting, hearing, and touch to judge whether the Minnesota statesmen are Jacobs or Esau, and will even then find themselves in gravest doubt. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The Des Moines Register and Leader, the Republican organ of Iowa, edited by Hon. George E. Roberts, President Roosevelt's Director of the Mint, not long ago contained these vigorous, not to say savage, editorial sentences touching the "stand-patters:"

When President McKinley announced that it was "our plain duty" to grant the Porto Ricans free entrance into the American market, the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives at once took up this hue and cry for narrowing the field for American labor. Was it wise, they asked, to dump the sugar and other products of Porto Rico on the American market when our own citizens were engaged in producing these things, and to deprive the American laborer of his job?

It was with great difficulty that Republicans in Congress brought themselves to yield to the weight and influence of President McKinley's judgment and to consent that at the end of two years Porto Rico should be granted a free market exchange. Now, what has been the result? Has the influx of Porto Rican products narrowed the field of American labor? Porto Rican exports have jumped from two millions to several times that amount—we do not have the exact figures at hand—and yet the United States, like the individual who hires ten laborers in the place of two, has broadened its own domestic field of operations, for it is selling to Porto Rico in exchange more in proportion than Porto Rico sells to it, so that to-day the cash balance of trade in our favor is greater than our total sales to Porto Rico were ten years ago.

The individual who spends an afternoon in painting his own fence in order to save a half dollar, and thereby misses a hundred-dollar deal, is the exact type of the public man who to-day in the United States advises against the broadest commercial reciprocity on the theory that everything that we import narrows the field of domestic production. Such a spigot-watching policy makes misers of men and backwoods settlements of nations. No individual ever gained wealth or influence by it, and no nation ever developed its real resources. There is a philosophy in the old Bible injunction that "there is a scattering that yet increaseth, and a withholding of more than is meet," that is much deeper than a great deal of our modern-day statesmanship is able to realize.

Whenever our stand-pat friends get into a hole they resurrect "the bogy man" of free trade and hold him in terrorem over the heads of the American people.

Nobody knows better than they do that there is no free-trade party in the United States, and they ought to quit asserting that there is. We can all be honest even if we can't be great.

By the unanimous vote of the Democratic Members of this House Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS of Mississippi was at the beginning of the extraordinary session of this Congress made the minority leader, and he has demonstrated over and over again that he is a leader who leads. To use his own language, he has been constituted "the mouthpiece of the minority" on this floor. He speaks, therefore, by authority, and he speaks so clearly that even the most stupid can understand him.

His black plume, like the white plume of Henry of Navarre, points the way to victory—not a temporary victory in this arena, but to ultimate victory in the country at large.

In the February number of Everybody's Magazine, in a thoroughly considered and felicitously expressed article, he defines the Democratic tariff position—a definition which he has frequently given in practically the same shape in his speeches in this body. He says:

As to the tariff, the Democratic party stands for the principle that protectionism is a system of taxation whereby many are robbed in order that a few may be hothoused by legislation into artificial prosperity. The method whereby "protection" does this is by deflecting capital and labor from naturally profitable pursuits into pursuits made by legislation profitable, pursuits which without legislation would have been less profitable or perhaps not profitable at all.

The ultimate goal of Democratic striving is "tariff for revenue only;" but in the striving toward this goal common sense, good judgment, and conservatism will prevail, and time will enter as a factor. Perhaps it might be said that an ideal Democratic "tariff for revenue only" would consist in levying import duties upon all or nearly all imports, dividing them, however, into three classes: First, necessaries of life and necessaries of industries; second, comforts, and third, luxuries.

In one of his speeches he added that the rate on each particular class should be uniform—lowest on the first class, higher on the second class, highest on the third class.

In his magazine article he continues as follows:

The general principle that protectionism is wrong, morally wrong—a prostitution of government to private ends—should never be forgotten; the goal ought not to be lost sight of. At the same time friends of tariff reform would not strike down in a revolutionary way—"overnight," as the Germans say—all the scaffolding which the false system has erected. * * *

In this country, owing to the decision of the Supreme Court in the income-tax case, founded on the provision of the Constitution of the United States about direct taxes, the goal can not be, as it was in Great Britain, free trade. "A tariff for revenue to carry on a government economically and effectively administered" becomes the American tariff reformer's goal. It must be kept in mind until it is reached, but it must be reached by the exercise of wisdom and good sense. The tariff reformer who would do things recklessly or too suddenly would run the risk of destroying the very end which he had in contemplation, by furnishing object lessons which would not help him but would hurt him, and in consequence of which he and those of his opinion might be hurled out of place and deprived of the power of doing anything.

But it may be urged by the captious that Mr. WILLIAMS is a Democratic witness. To satisfy them I quote a Republican witness.

It is really refreshing to find a Republican editorial in a newspaper of any considerable influence and standing which tells any truth whatsoever about the Democrats; hence it is with great pleasure that I quote these lines from the Washington Star, which is a Republican paper from away back:

Mr. Alfred Mosely, a distinguished English capitalist who visited the United States last year for the purpose of investigating our industrial methods, conditions, and line of thought, has since his return home been giving his countrymen, through the medium of the press, the result of some of his observations. Speaking on the subject of the tariff, he tells them in substance that there is no free-trade party in this country and that the discussion of revising our customs schedules goes no further than "whether perhaps they (the American people) are not taxing themselves unnecessarily in certain industries."

This statement is so true that it is surprising to find it contradicted by an American newspaper, the New York Journal of Commerce, which declares that the Democratic party in this country is quite out of sympathy with the protective policy; that they make their free-trade programme the corner stone of their policy and can find little else to rest it on.

The Englishman has the right of this matter. There is no free-trade party in the United States. No man whose name is mentioned in connection with the Democratic nomination for President this year stands for free trade or for anything approaching it.

Every Republican orator in the United States ought to be compelled to commit that editorial to memory and repeat it to every audience he addresses; but will it be done? Not on your life! [Laughter.] They will go on repeating their stale canards with a great deal of gusto as long as they can wag their tongues.

We go forth to battle with "tariff reduction and genuine reciprocity" inscribed upon our banner.

Our appeal is to the great body of the people. To them we pin our faith without hesitation and without fear. [Prolonged applause on Democratic side.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BOUTELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 13352. An act transferring the county of Pierce, in the State of Georgia, from the eastern to the southwestern division of the United States district court for the southern district of Georgia; and

H. R. 12904. An act providing for holding of courts of the eastern division of the northern Federal judicial district of Georgia at Athens, Ga.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4672) to authorize the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Connecticut River.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1618. An act granting an increase of pension to Thomas Herran;

S. 1572. An act granting an increase of pension to Isaac N. Hughey;

S. 1478. An act granting an increase of pension to Leroy R. Hawthorn;

S. 1310. An act granting a pension to Ella C. Tupper;

S. 716. An act granting an honorable discharge to Jacob Niebels;

S. 402. An act for the relief of James D. Vernay;

S. 329. An act granting an increase of pension to Bushnell B. Loomis;

S. 320. An act granting an increase of pension to Hiram W. White;

S. 208. An act granting an increase of pension to Alfred Kent;

S. 94. An act granting a pension to Alvin Rine;

S. 5028. An act granting an increase of pension to Charles W. Chargo;

S. 4919. An act granting an increase of pension to William C. Griffin;

S. 4899. An act granting an increase of pension to Laura M. Gilmore;

S. 4891. An act granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth G. Illsley;

S. 4846. An act granting an increase of pension to John Taylor;

S. 4842. An act granting an increase of pension to Siloam Williams;

S. 4817. An act granting a pension to Cornelia A. Thompson;

S. 4765. An act granting an increase of pension to Adrian Terry;

S. 4742. An act granting an increase of pension to Earl B. French;

S. 4648. An act granting an increase of pension to John T. Rader;

S. 4618. An act granting an increase of pension to William Varnes;

S. 4405. An act granting an increase of pension to Emma Thurston;

S. 4372. An act for the relief of H. Gibbes Morgan and other coowners of Cat Island, in the Gulf of Mexico;

S. 4343. An act for the relief of Talton T. Davis;

S. 4056. An act granting an increase of pension to George G. Wright, alias George Gravett;

S. 3938. An act for the relief of George H. White;

S. 3867. An act granting an increase of pension to Osmer S. Deming;

S. 3505. An act to amend the record of Maj. John Murphy;

S. 3030. An act granting an increase of pension to Charles O. Fargo;

S. 2950. An act to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of James B. Boyd;

S. 2711. An act granting an increase of pension to Fannie S. Moore;

S. 2423. An act granting an increase of pension to Benson C. Bellamy;

S. 2330. An act to correct the military record of Jacob McDowell;

S. 1989. An act granting an increase of pension to John McCabe; and

An act (S. 1654) for the relief of Theodore F. Northrop.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, in 1862 Congress enacted a law which was entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide agricultural colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts."

This act gave to each State and Territory 30,000 acres of the public domain for each Senator and Representative in Congress to which the States were entitled under the census of 1860. The law provided that each State claiming the benefits of the act should establish and maintain at least—

One college where the leading object shall be, without excluding other scientific and classical studies, including military tactics, to teach such branches of learning as are related to agriculture and the mechanic arts, in such manner as the legislatures of the States may respectively prescribe, in order to promote the liberal and practical education of the industrial classes in the several pursuits and professions in life.

This law, wisely conceived in its purpose and in its details, laid the foundation of agricultural and industrial education in this country. It was a recognition of the modern idea of education, that men can be profitably educated by the State through a study of concrete things as well as by contemplation and study of abstract ideas. Under this act agricultural colleges were established in every State.

In 1883 Hon. C. C. Carpenter, of Iowa, introduced a bill providing for the establishment of State experiment stations which should be departments of the agricultural colleges. The measure did not become a law until introduced by W. H. Hatch in 1887, when it was pushed through Congress by that stalwart, aggressive, and intelligent friend of the agricultural interest.

The act of 1887 provided that each State which should establish an experiment station as a department of the agricultural college located therein should receive out of the proceeds of the sale of public lands by the Federal Government $15,000 each year. This act provided further:

That it shall be the duty of said experiment stations to conduct original researches or verify experiments on the physiology of plants and animals, the diseases to which they are severally subject, with the remedies of the same; the chemical composition of useful plants at their different stages of growth; the comparative advantages of rotative cropping as pursued under a varying series of crops; the capacity of new plants or trees for acclimation; the analysis of soils and water; the chemical compositions of manures, natural or artificial, with experiments designed to test their comparative effects on crops of different kinds; the adaptation and value of grasses and forage plants; the composition and digestibility of the different kinds of food for domestic animals; the scientific and economic questions involved in the production of butter and cheese; and such other researches or experiments bearing directly on the agricultural industry of the United States as may in each case be deemed advisable, having due regard to the varying conditions and needs of the respective States and Territories.

The act required that the Secretary of Agriculture should furnish forms for the tabulation of results of investigations and generally to cooperate with the purposes and work of the stations. It also required that reports of the station work should be published at least once in three months, and that they should be mailed free of cost to newspapers and individuals engaged in farming.

Forty-eight States and Territories are each receiving $15,000 for experiment station purposes provided under the Hatch Act of 1887.

The bill now before Congress provides that the next annual appropriation to the stations shall be increased $5,000, and for a further increase of $2,000 each year for five years, until the total additional appropriation shall amount to $15,000 each year.

Secretary Wilson, in his report for 1903, calls specific attention to the work of the Iowa station, to the remarkable results obtained in corn-breeding experiments at the Illinois experiment station, and alludes to the investigations in the breeding of improved varieties of wheat at the Minnesota station, which station is attracting the attention of the entire wheat-growing world, and says:

"The amount of data published by the stations on many agricultural subjects is now very large, and the recent attempts which have been made to reduce this material to organized form in order that it may be utilized for purposes of agricultural education have shown that the stations are doing a great work in supplying the materials out of which a definite science of agriculture is being constructed and on which courses of instruction in agriculture of different grades can be successfully based.

"If our stations are to be continued on the broad basis on which they are at present organized, they must generally be supplied with larger funds for the general expenses of investigations, in order to conduct their work in a thorough and satisfactory manner. The States can and undoubtedly will supplement the national funds more fully as time goes on, but since the results obtained by the stations are in many cases of general value to the agriculture of the United States, it is worthy of consideration whether they should receive additional financial aid from the National Government. This supplemental aid should, if given, be granted under conditions which will insure its exclusive application to meet the expenses of agricultural investigations."

Dr. A. C. True, Director of Experiment Stations, Department of Agriculture, in his report for 1903, says:

These figures show conclusively that if our stations are to be continued on the broad basis on which they are at present organized, they must generally be supplied with much larger funds for the general expenses of investigations in order to conduct their work in a thorough and satisfactory manner.

The States can and undoubtedly will supplement the national fund more fully as time goes on; but since the results obtained by the stations are in many cases of general value to the agriculture of the United States, it seems proper that they should receive additional financial aid from the General Government, now that they have demonstrated their ability to stimulate and increase the agricultural production of the country. This supplemental aid should, of course, be granted under conditions which will insure its exclusive application to experimentation and which will stimulate the States to increase their contributions to the support of the stations.

The National Association of American Agricultural Colleges and Experiment Stations, which met at Atlanta, Ga., October 7 to 9, 1902, indicated its judgment in favor of increasing Government aid to the agricultural experiment stations by the adoption of the following resolution:

Whereas the sum provided by the Hatch Act of 1887 for the organization of agricultural experiment stations and the beginning of investigations in American agriculture has become insufficient for the questions now pressing for solution; and

ence and the increased number of questions propounded for their solution are conclusive evidence of their public utility: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the executive committee is hereby instructed, if in its judgment it should seem expedient, to urge upon Congress at the earliest practicable date that the appropriation to the several States under the Hatch Act be increased by the sum of $15,000 annually.

Only one-third of the increase asked for by that organization has been provided for in this bill. There is abundant reason for the appropriation of a larger amount. The appropriation has been placed at a modest figure for the purpose of securing its passage at this session, when as we all know, strong efforts are being made to keep appropriations within the narrowest possible limits.

The equipment of the various stations consists of experimental farms, buildings, machinery, laboratories, and live stock.

The experiment station farms range from 16 to 2,400 acres.

The following table, taken from advance slips of the report of Dr. A. C. True, of the Department of Agriculture, Director of Experiment Stations in that Department, gives the area of the agricultural college grounds and experiment-station farms in the several States and Territories. The experimental farms embrace all but a comparatively small portion of the areas here scheduled. It should be observed in this connection that the lands and buildings of the experiment stations have been contributed by the States, and that it is a very conservative estimate to place the value of the experiment-station farms, exclusive of the cost of the buildings thereon, at $4,000,000.

In the management of the stations there are 54 directors, 19 assistant directors, 3 special agents in charge, 160 chemists, 54 agriculturists, 27 agronomists, 39 animal husbandmen, 7 poultrymen, 79 horticulturists, 39 farm foremen, 34 dairymen, 56 botanists, 4 plant pathologists, 50 entomologists, 6 zoologists, 31 veterinarians, 10 meteorologists, 6 biologists, 6 physicists, 4 geologists, 23 bacteriologists, 11 irrigation engineers, 16 men in charge of substations, 27 secretaries, 12 librarians, 34 clerks and stenographers, and 50 persons employed as superintendents of grounds, buildings, apiaries, herdsmen, etc.—a total of 757 persons engaged in investigation work.

Three hundred and seventy-five station officers do some teaching in the colleges with which the stations are connected.

In 1903 371 annual reports and bulletins were published, and over 600,000 were directly supplied with reports of results of experiment-station work.

The following table, contained in the report of the Director of Experiment Stations for 1903, gives the lines of work carried on in each of the experiment stations:

Alabama (College)	Botany; soils; analyses of fertilizers and food materials; field and pot experiments; horticulture; plant breeding; diseases of plants; feeding experiments; diseases of animals; dairying.
Alabama (Canebrake)	Soil improvement; field experiments; horticulture; floriculture; diseases of plants; diseases of animals; dairying.
Alabama	Field experiments; horticulture; diseases of plants; animal industry; dairying.
Arizona	Chemistry; botany; field experiments; improvement of ranges; horticulture, including date-palm culture; feeding experiments; irrigation.
Arkansas	Chemistry of foods; field experiments; horticulture; plant breeding; diseases of plants; feeding experiments; diseases of animals.
California	Physics; chemistry and geographical distribution of soils; bacteriology; fertilizers, fertilizer control; field crops; horticulture; botany; meteorology; technology of wine and olive oil, including zymology; beet-sugar chemistry; chemistry of foods and feeding stuffs; animal husbandry; entomology; dairying; drainage and irrigation; reclamation of alkali lands; animal and plant pathology.
Colorado	Chemistry; field experiments; horticulture; plant breeding; entomology; irrigation.
Connecticut (State)	Chemistry; analysis and inspection of fertilizers, foods, and feeding stuffs; inspection of Babcock test apparatus and nurseries; diseases of plants; horticulture; forestry; field experiments; entomology.
Connecticut (Storrs)	Food and nutrition of man and animals; bacteriology of dairy products; field experiments; horticulture; poultry experiments; dairying.

This table indicates strongly the intensely practical character of the experiment-station work. It is made a part of the RECORD for the information of the House and the country.

There is not an agricultural experiment station in the United States that because of its work and the results of that work could not properly be made a subject of extended statement upon the floor of this House. But if the subject were taken up in detail, as it could be, it would involve an address as long as a speech upon the Panama canal question in that most deliberate body, the United States Senate.

It is almost unfair to the other stations to select the work of any particular station for illustration. The prime purposes of the stations has been not only to make two blades of grass grow where one grew before, but to produce two bushels of wheat where one was produced before; two bushels of corn where one grew before; two pounds of butter where one was made before, and generally to increase by intelligent methods the production of the American farms.

The Illinois station has done some remarkable work in corn selection and breeding. It is reducing the size of the cob and increasing the proportion of corn to the cob. It has undertaken to accomplish what, until recent years, has been regarded as an impossible work—the changing of the proportion of the nutrient elements contained in a kernel of corn. The defect in corn as a food for man and beast has been its extraordinarily large proportion of carbonaceous or fat and heat forming matter and its small proportion of nitrogenous elements, or bone and muscle and blood forming elements. In other words, it is not a properly balanced ration in itself. The Illinois station has succeeded in introducing from 5 per cent to 7 per cent more portein into some varieties of corn which it has developed. It has not only eliminated a portion of the cob and increased the quantity of the corn, but it is improving the quality—the commercial and digestive value of that grain. Its work has been so striking and effective that it has brought about the organization of the Illinois Corn Growers' Association, which is enlisting the interest of the farmers of that great corn-growing State in active and intelligent cooperation with the experiment station work. The practical results of the work of the Illinois Experiment Station in its improvement of corn has already meant an increase of millions of dollars to the corn growers of Illinois and will result in the addition of millions of dollars to the revenues of all the great corn-growing States.

Mr. Luther Burbank, the great plant breeder, is quoted by Prof. C. F. Curtiss, of the Iowa Experiment Station, as saying that it is an easy matter to produce a variety of grain that will yield a single extra kernel to the ear or to the head, yet this trifling increase to the agricultural crops of the country would amount to 5,200,000 bushels of corn, 15,000,000 bushels of wheat, and 20,000,000 bushels of oats. The experiment stations are doing precisely this kind of work.

The Iowa Experiment Station has done valuable work with forage plants and grasses and in feeding experiments designed for the increased production of meat and milk, which has been worth more to the farmers of that State than the Federal appropriation to the Iowa station would amount to in one hundred years.

The Minnesota and North Dakota experiment stations, working together, began the breeding of wheat twelve years ago. Two new varieties of distinct value have been distributed. One of these varieties has proved to be peculiarly adapted to northern Minnesota and to North Dakota, where it yields 15 to 20 per cent more than the common varieties. Five hundred thousand acres of this variety will be sown this year, and the increased yield, at a conservative estimate, will give an additional value to the crop of $2 per acre, or $1,000,000. The hard wheat milling qualities have not been lost in the development of this variety, while the yield has been materially increased. The second variety which has been developed is known as "Minnesota No. 169." It yields from 18 to 20 per cent more in an average year than the wheat which it displaces. It is of superior quality for milling purposes. Other varieties than those named are being developed by the Minnesota and North Dakota experiment stations which will still further increase the wheat yield of those and other Northwestern States.

The Minnesota station has developed a variety of flax which is 40 per cent longer in the straw than the old variety and may result in making the growth of flax fiber profitable in this country. The yield of flaxseed has also been increased through the introduction of new varieties.

The Minnesota station has produced a new variety of corn adapted to northern latitudes, and because of this the northern zone of the corn belt has been pushed 50 miles farther north in the last ten years.

A new variety of hardy alfalfa has been discovered by this station which promises to be useful among the forage crops of the North.

The Minnesota station has also done work of the greatest value in feeding experiments with dairy cattle, in distributing knowledge among the farmers of that State of the principles of breeding, in encouraging the intelligent production of butter and cheese, and generally has been a powerful force, aiding in the rapid and profitable development of the agricultural interests of the State.

The Connecticut Experiment Station has changed the character of Connecticut wrapper leaf tobacco, and the Storrs Station, in the State of Connecticut, has been for ten years working to obtain definite knowledge of the ways in which the body is nourished and of the values and uses of foods. It has made valuable dietary studies and added materially to knowledge of the laws of nutrition and of the physiological requirements of the body.

Exhaustive tests of food values have been made by the Pennsylvania Experiment Station under the capable direction of Dr. H. P. Armsby.

This station was one of the first, if not the first, American station which demonstrated the effectiveness of the tuberculin test in indicating tuberculosis in cattle, and thereby aiding in stamping out that disease.

The Southern States are doing a work of increasing value to the farmers of the South. In Georgia, in Texas, in Arkansas, in Alabama, and in other Southern States they are teaching the cotton farmers of the South the one thing that they need to appreciate and to know more than anything else, the ways of restoring the worn-out cotton lands of the South. Those stations are the breeding grounds of ideas which will enrich southern agriculture. They are teaching the southern farmers the value of rotation of crops, of manures, of the kinds of commercial fertilizers that he needs. They are endeavoring to interest him in dairying, because the directors of those stations know enough to know that the foot of the cow, like the hoof of the sheep, is golden; that the path of the cow leads always to richer fields and in the direction of golden harvests. They know that where the dairy business is there is the greatest wealth and the greatest comfort in farm life, and they know that this is true because the cow is a mother and not a robber; that she gives back to the soil as much as she takes from it.

President H. C. White, of the Georgia Agricultural College, declares, and the statement is undoubtedly true, that as good dairy products can be produced in southern Georgia as in any State in the Union. The "New South" that is being talked about so much and upon which so much eloquence has been lavished is becoming a new South not because of political agitation, but because factories are springing up; southern cities are noisy with the whirr of machinery; the factory is being planted by the farm. The southern farmer is more and more finding a home market, and is being taught, through the agency of the experiment stations, to become a thinking machine instead of a guessing machine.

The race question is a serious question for the South. We of the North realize it. But some of us believe with Booker Washington that the welfare of the negro is best served when he devotes himself to industrial rather than political activities. Whether right or wrong—a question which I shall not here discuss—southern prejudice against political domination by the colored race stands like a wall of adamant against the encroachments of the race upon political power. But every motive of self-interest upon the part of the intelligent and dominant element in southern political and business life should and undoubtedly does favor the building up of manufacturing and agricultural enterprises to such an extent that they should absorb, and absorb profitably, the attention and the energies of the men who can wield the hammers, run the machinery, plow the land, sow the seed, pick the cotton, hew the wood, and bring the water in the industrial life of the South. The agricultural possibilities of the South are magnificent. The experiment stations are broadening the field for profitable farm work. They will increase the demand for and the profits of labor. As a matter of politics and economics they should receive the support of every intelligent friend of southern agriculture.

For fifteen years the California experiment station, among other things, has been working upon the problems of irrigation and the reclamation of alkali lands. It has accomplished great results. Its work has resulted in the reclamation of millions of acres hitherto unused. It has also done a most valuable work in horticulture for the interests of that great fruit-growing State. It has brought into California sixty new varieties of figs, and has discovered through its investigations that the superior quality of the foreign figs is largely because of a minute insect which transfers from the pollen of a wild flower to the fig blossom a certain element which improves in a wonderful degree the quality of the fruit.

The Kansas experiment station brought Kaffir corn into that State. In 1902 500,000 acres of land were planted to that variety, increasing materially the total corn production of the State.

In my own State Dr. S. M. Babcock has worked out a simple test to determine the value of milk, and to-day that test is being used in every civilized land. The dairy industry of the United States annually produces $500,000,000 worth of products. It is far under the true estimate to say that the Babcock test is responsible for 1 per cent of that income, or $5,000,000 annually, nearly what the Department of Agriculture costs each year. Farmers all over the United States not only now sell their milk upon the basis of butter fat which it contains, but they buy their cows upon the basis of their butter yield, as indicated by the Babcock test. Dean W. A. Henry estimates that the annual value of the increase in dairy production caused by the introduction of the Babcock test is $800,000.

The Wisconsin Experiment Station turned its attention some years ago to the discovery of some remedy to prevent smut in oats, which was destroying a considerable portion of the Wisconsin oat crop. It discovered that the treatment of such oats with a weak solution of formaldehyde was destructive to the smut. Last year 25,000 Wisconsin farmers adopted this practice, and the oat crop for that year has been recently stated at 96,000,000 bushels. It is undoubtedly true that at least 10,000,000 bushels were saved through the experiment-station discovery, which means a saving to the farmers of Wisconsin, a single State in a single experiment, of $5,000,000.

The Wisconsin Experiment Station brought into that State Manshury barley, materially increasing the barley yield, and Mediterranean wheat, materially increasing the wheat yield of the State.

It has made exhaustive feeding experiments, proving absolutely the possibility of so feeding pigs that the best quality of bacon can be produced, the ideal streak of lean and streak of fat found in the Irish bacon.

And the work of that station in connection with the work of the Kansas station has made so general the intelligent feeding of hogs for the production of bacon that Sir Thomas Lipton buys immense quantities of American bacon, ships it into European markets, labels it "Irish bacon," and obtains the Irish bacon price for it because it is something equally good.

The Wisconsin station has ascertained through exhaustive experiments that cheese can be well cured at a low temperature. The effect of this new knowledge will be to eliminate cheese-curing rooms and processes from the cheese factories of the entire country and the shipment direct of new cheese to cold-storage warehouses. The saving of labor and of money and the improvement in the average quality of cheese which will result from this knowledge will benefit very materially the cheese-producing industry.

Every experiment station in the land is the enemy of a poor cow. Every experiment station in the land is the friend and defender and promoter and distributer of good cows. Every experiment station in the land is the enemy of waste upon the farm. Every experiment station in the land teaches the farmer to take care of his machinery; teaches him sound lessons in tillage; teaches him to maintain the fertility of his soil, which is the capital stock in the farmer's bank; teaches him to keep cash accounts; teaches him cleanliness in the dairy; teaches him proper housing of stock; teaches him how to build in the cheapest and most desirable way silos where the whole corn crop—ears, stalks, and all—can go in a succulent state and become practically canned green feed for winter use, furnishing a succulent feed for all the animals of the farm, housed under cover in comfortable weather, and fed during the long months of a northern winter without going out of doors.

The experiment stations have driven the frauds out of fertilizers and by their inspections of those costly necessities to many American farms have saved millions and millions of dollars to the American farmers.

The experiment stations have been object lessons to the agricultural colleges under whose shadows they are.

The agricultural colleges have given new dignity, new value, and new profit to farm life. The agricultural college deals with ideas; the experiment station deals with facts. The students in the agricultural colleges go from the atmosphere of theory in the class room to the practical life of the experiment-station farm and see demonstrated before their eyes, beyond question or dispute, the truth or falsity of the theories of agriculture.

The agricultural experiment stations are training men to know definite things about the farm, and carry their knowledge not only to the agricultural colleges, but through their correspondence, through the publication of bulletins, through personal contact with the farmers of their several States in institute meetings, carry it directly to the people themselves.

The farm institute has become an established factor in the agricultural life of the nation. Farmers' institutes are held in every State. They have been called the common schools of agriculture, which go close to the farmer's home and the farmer's life, and by the inspiration of contact with men who do things and who know things, teach him the practical lessons of his business, stir his ambition, his self-respect, equip his mind, and make him a greater producing factor in the nation's activities. One million farmers last year attended the farmers' institutes in the United States. In every State, among farmers of every community, there is a keen, active, appreciation of the teaching work which is being done by men who go out of the experiment stations with an equipment of ascertained facts, to drive their theories and philosophy home to the minds of the farmers.

In the publications of the Department of Agriculture, in the publications of the various State experiment stations last year, 4,000,000 pieces of agricultural literature were scattered among the 9,000,000 farmers of the United States. This work is valuable and needs broadening. The Federal Government, which has expended money for these stations so wisely and so profitably, can afford, now that they have grown and established themselves in the confidence of the farmers of this country, to give them the additional aid which they need to extend still further their scientific and practical researches. The men who run these stations are not Government officers working at high salaries a limited number of hours each day and dawdling away the hours in a perfunctory discharge of routine duties. They are men working for modest salaries, inspired by that enthusiasm which fruitful work always inspires in any man who is a man, and who realize keenly how greatly the farmers of the nation are being benefited by their work. Their representatives come here to Congress asking for an increase, not of their salaries but of their labors and responsibilities.

This agricultural experiment station work is not confined to this country. The first agricultural experiment station supported by government aid was established at Moecken, Germany, and will this year celebrate its fiftieth anniversary.

Russia has 102 agricultural experiment stations and three experimental forests. The Russian Government is not particularly affected by popular clamor. These stations have not been established because of the demands of the agricultural class. They have been established by a despotic government because of their very great value in developing the material resources of the Russian Empire.

Germany has 80 stations. That country has always led in the matter of agricultural education. With a population only a little over half of that of this country, it has more than one-third more experiment stations. They are established there not in obedience to a public demand, but because the statesmen of Germany wish to develop to the last degree the agricultural resources of that Empire, increasing its taxable wealth and providing, so far as possible, upon German soil the food of the people and the sustenance of the great armies of the Empire.

France has 71 and a system of agriculture which is not surpassed in the civilized world; Austria has 41; the British Islands have 30; little Belgium has 15; far-off Australia has 34; Sweden has 26; Switzerland has 10; Spain, the most effete monarchy in Europe, as might be expected, has only 4.

I have heard only two arguments against this bill. One is that it is paternalistic, and the other is that the States are not doing what they should, and should provide all the funds necessary for the proper development of the experiment-station work.

This bill is paternalistic. There is no question about it. So is the appropriation of $250,000 to exterminate the boll weevil, which was threatening the cotton industry of the South. The ghost of paternalism affects a great many gentlemen who do not happen to be benefited by the particular appropriation which they charge with being paternalistic. The boll-weevil appropriation was made to destroy an insect which existed in a single State—the State of Texas—and to a small degree in one other State. It was absolutely justifiable. It was preeminently to the credit of the Representatives of the northern Congressional districts that, so far as I know, to a man they supported that appropriation.

The Federal Government can well afford to use its financial power to protect and foster and build up the great cotton industry of the South. Cotton is still very nearly king in this country. It is the queen of our exports. When the Federal Government protects that industry from insects or any other material danger it can plead guilty to the charge of paternalism and glory in its guilt. If this Government is not strong enough to take care of its own the Federal Constitution ought to be amended. Not only were the cotton farmers of the South interested in that appropriation, but the farmers of the East and the West and the North had a direct business interest in it. If through any cause the cotton industry of the South should be obliterated, the millions of acres and millions of capital and hundreds of thousands of men employed in that industry would be turned into other lines of farm production, and the northern and eastern and western farmers would be finding in the markets of this country and of every country more corn, more wheat, more beef, and more dairy products, and therefore diminished prices.

The farming industries of this country stand together, or should stand together. Every new agricultural industry that is built up helps every other. Every old one that is maintained helps every other which exists or can exist. This Government has been wisely committed to the policy of spreading agricultural knowledge among the farmers of the nation. As a gentleman well said before the Committee on Agriculture a week ago, there is a good paternalism and a bad paternalism. The paternalism which benefits special interests to the prejudice of the general welfare is one thing. The paternalism which benefits special interests to the advantage of all others is another and entirely different thing.

We have made splendid progress in fifty years in manufacturing. In recent years our exports of manufactures have startled every manufacturing nation. The products of mines and forests and shops and factories have reached a total which stirs the pride of every American who rejoices in the upbuilding of America's industries and the increase of her wealth. But agriculture is still the greatest interest of the nation. It employs more people and produces more dollars than any other interest.

In 1887, when the original Hatch Act was passed, establishing the experiment stations, the total agricultural production of the United States was less than $3,000,000,000. In 1903, sixteen years after the passage of that act, the total agricultural production of the United States, according to the recent report of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, exceeded $5,000,000,000. No single agency has contributed more to this marvelous increase than the definite, practical, and fruitful work of the experiment stations. If a small appropriation of $240,000 is paternalism, then make the most of it. If the actual record of the stations indicates anything, it means that there will come back to the agriculture and the business of the United States hundreds, if not thousands, of dollars for every dollar carried in this appropriation.

In reply to the objection that the States are not doing enough, that they should carry the entire burden of these stations, permit me to call the attention of the House to the fact that the larger and wealthier States are contributing most generously to the experiment-station work.

The money provided for in this bill can be profitably expended in every station, but is particularly needed in the Southern States and in some of the newer Western States.

The State of Illinois has appropriated for use in the experiment station of that State in special lines of work $85,000 for the present year.

It should not be forgotten that the agricultural experiment stations are closely allied to the agricultural colleges, and that the States supplement the Federal appropriations largely, both for the stations and the colleges.

I submit herewith a statement, too elaborate to be read here, showing the manner in which the funds provided by the General Government for the experiment stations were expended during the past year. This covers the amount paid in salaries, labor, publications, heat, light and water, chemical supplies, seeds, plants and sundry supplies, fertilizers, feeding stuffs, tools, implements, machinery, furniture and fixtures, scientific apparatus, live stock, traveling expenses, contingent expenses, buildings, repairs, etc.

I also submit a table showing some State appropriations made in the last three years for the support of experiment stations. I will not take the time to read these tables, but will incorporate them in the RECORD.

a College and station.
b College and station, including $3,500 for station printing.
c College and station, including $10,000 for station maintenance.

In 1903 the States contributed to the agricultural colleges in appropriations for current expenses, buildings, and other special purposes $4,047,776.

Fifty-three thousand two hundred and fifty-two students have graduated from the colleges since the organization of the agricultural colleges. There are now 52,489 taking the various courses in the agricultural colleges.

In 1897 the appropriation to the Department of Agriculture was $3,182,902. The agricultural appropriation bill which recently passed the Senate carried in round numbers, $6,000,000. In seven years the appropriations for this Department have very nearly doubled.

The appropriations for the State experiment stations in seventeen years have not been increased a single dollar, while the States have greatly increased their financial aid.

In round numbers, France spends $9,000,000 annually for agricultural purposes; Austria, $9,000,000; Hungary, $9,400,000; Russia, $25,000,000, and the United States has expended an amount estimated at $11,000,000.

The expenditures of governments per acre of agricultural land are as follows: France, 9.8 cents; Austria, 13.2 cents; Hungary, 12.4 cents; Russia, 4 cents; the United States, 1.3 cents.

Government expenditures per capita of agricultural population are as follows: France, 52 cents; Austria, 69 cents, Hungary, 90 cents; the United States, 35 cents.

Agricultural experiment stations in different countries.

Country.	Area, square miles.	Number of stations.	Ratio of station to area.
Russia	8,660,325	102	1 to every 84,906 square miles.
Germany	208,830	80	1 to every 2,610 square miles.
France	207,054	71	1 to every 2,916 square miles.
Austria-Hungary	241,353	61	1 to every 3,956 square miles.
United States	3,602,125	60	1 to every 61,335 square miles.
Sweden	172,876	26	1 to every 6,645 square miles.
Italy	110,550	22	1 to every 5,025 square miles.
Belgium	11,373	15	1 to every 758 square miles.
Japan	147,655	15	1 to every 9,844 square miles.
Norway	124,130	12	1 to every 10,344 square miles.

I find that in 1903 Arizona appropriated $11,000; Connecticut, $24,000; Missouri, $62,000; Montana, $26,000; Nebraska, $100,000; Oregon, $40,000; Pennsylvania, $100,000, and South Carolina, $40,000.

I have a partial list of the appropriations made for buildings, repairs, equipment and furniture, special investigations, and the establishment of substations since 1900, which, in round numbers, foot up to $1,900,000.

This is a partial statement of the State aid given to these stations. A portion of the buildings provided for are used jointly by the agricultural colleges and the stations.

In 1902 the Federal appropriation amounted to $720,000, and the amounts received from the States directly and for permanent buildings and equipment, including what the stations received for fertilizer tests and for farm produce, amounted to $870,000, in round numbers.

The statement is not correct that the States are doing nothing for the stations. They have provided the land and the buildings, and many of them large annual appropriations.

This bill provides, first, that the increase of appropriations for these stations shall be $5,000 each; second, that an additional appropriation shall be made of $2,000 for each year for five years, until the total additional appropriation shall be $15,000 annually for each station.

The bill also provides that no portion of this money shall be used for the payment of salaries, the construction of buildings, or for the purchase or rental of lands. It is to extend the work of experimentation pure and simple. Nothing more and nothing less.

I have introduced this bill because I have seen the valuable results which have come from the experiment-station work in my own State, and have observed to some extent the fruitfulness of that work in other States.

When the bill was first introduced I addressed a letter to the director of each experiment station in the United States asking if the bill met his approval, and, if so, requesting him to state to me the reasons why his station needed the additional appropriation. Nearly all of these stations have responded.

I give the following quotations, indicating their work and needs, and would give the replies in detail if it would not require so much space in the RECORD:

UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA,
AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION,
St. Anthony Park, Minn., March 16, 1904.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Some reasons for the wisdom of this bill are offered herewith. The production of plants and animals in the country amounts to $4,000,000,000 annually. Experiments in breeding plants, in breeding and feeding animals, in dairying, in the general management of farms, in better cultivation of crops, and in combating the enemies of plants and animals prove that 20 per cent, or $800,000,000, can be added to the country's annual farm product at a cost of 1, or at the most a few, per cent of such increase. This has been done on millions of acres in the Northwestern States, where you and I are acquainted.

A comparatively small expenditure in Wisconsin and Minnesota in dairying has added many millions to the direct dairy profits in these States, and other millions through added soil fertility on dairy farms, making grain growing more profitable. Modest sums spent by the North Dakota and Minnesota experiment stations in breeding field crops have added millions of dollars of profit to the hundreds of thousands of acres now planted to the newly bred corn, wheat, and other crops, supplied to the farmers by the experiment stations. And the work of breeding plants and animals, commenced a dozen years ago, has only begun to give of its results already in hand to the farmers. This work has been reduced to a system comparable with organization of work in modern manufacturing. It has clearly proven to be a business in which $1 will produce a hundred dollars. Like the management of forests, it is a business for which public rather than private organization will secure the necessary long-continued efforts for the large final returns.

Plans for pushing animal improvement forward with the same effectiveness, and at the same relative expenditure, are also being formulated. America's strong soil, superior climate, unexcelled markets and bright people warrant the belief that we can breed the best pedigreed plants and animals in the world. Instead of buying seeds and pedigreed animals abroad, we should lead in their improvement, and besides having the best with which to increase our own products, we should supply foreign markets with pedigreed seeds and plants.

Investigations have shown that our farms are not run under systematic plans, but that system can be introduced here as in other lines of business. These investigations alone, if extended to all of the States, would bring back a return many times greater than the whole sum this bill carries.

Experimenters are already saving vast sums to growers of plants and animals by devising methods of combating injurious insects and diseases.

In the aggregate the station workers are an able class of men, and, as they are connected with agricultural colleges, they have large numbers of young men in training, who could be employed to aid in enlarging the work now being done.

Many of the problems, as breeding plants, breeding animals, devising systems of crop rotations, developing cooperative organizations among breeders of plants and animals, cooperative dairying, etc., require long years of continuous effort. This bill would greatly assist in keeping strong men at their tasks till completed. There is a tendency for our best experimenters to be drafted into editorial chairs, into commercial enterprises, and into Government positions.

Our agricultural colleges and experiment stations are the last institutions the Government should stint, because here the national influence is placed near the people. By giving the station more means you will greatly assist them in their cooperation with the Department of Agriculture. Their work has grown to such an extent that most of them are unable to cooperate with the Department for a lack of money. Problems of a local State nature can best be wrought out by a strong State experiment and strong departmental bureaus in cooperation. National experts and local experts working together can do far more on most problems than national officers working alone or State officials working alone. Besides, there are many problems purely local in nature, which can best be worked out by the State stations, others of a general nature which the national department should undertake alone.

The experiment stations are the right arms of our agricultural colleges. Strengthen the station corps, and the faculty is strengthened in a way that enables agricultural education to emerge from the dominance of the older education directed almost wholly to building up city life. The Hatch bill of 1887 did more to bring our agricultural college faculties to a proper balance than anything that was ever done. General education has been too prone to look upon money appropriated for the education of our country people as so much more available funds for higher education in general and technical lines. The development of agricultural education has proven a difficult and slow process, but it is now succeeding grandly in most States.

The Secretary of Agriculture should be charged with the duty of requiring that this money should be used only in experimenters. But there is no harm in the strength of the experimenters being useful in promoting agricultural education throughout their States, that the results of their investigations might have avenues through agricultural colleges, agricultural high schools, and consolidated rural schools to all country people.

This bill is but another large step in supplying technical education to the farmers and country home makers of our country.

If I can assist, please command me.

Very respectfully, yours,

W. M. HAYS,
Agriculturist, Minnesota Agricultural Experiment Station.

ARKANSAS AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION,
Fayetteville, Ark., February, 1904.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: This station needs an increase in its chemical force. The subjects directly relating to agriculture which it is the province of the science of chemistry to investigate are quite numerous and varied and require not only accurate scientific knowledge, but also many of them much time for reaching reliable results.

The department of horticulture, to which is attached pomology in a wide sense of that term, should be enlarged. The adaptation of large portions of this State to vegetable and fruit culture necessitate for their proper development a greater expenditure of funds than is now available.

A botanist, to give all his time to the study of plants, weeds, and fungous diseases, is needed.

Dairy husbandry, stock breeding, feeding, housing, etc., require much fuller development than can be given with our present means.

Rice culture, to which it is believed large sections of this State are well adapted, should be experimented upon.

Members of the station staff, so far as they can do so without seriously interfering with their duties at the station, should attend agricultural and horticultural meetings in the State, deliver lectures, and enlist a larger and more intelligent interest among farmers in scientific agriculture and in the work which the station is designed for and is endeavoring to do.

We have no emergency fund whatever for boll weevil, etc.

The amount appropriated when experiment stations were established is entirely inadequate for carrying on the work as it has developed.

Yours, truly,

W. G. VINCENHELLER, Director.

MAINE AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION,
Orono, Me., January 25, 1904.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of January 18 and the copy of the bill to provide for an increased annual appropriation for agricultural experiment stations are duly received.

There are many reasons, in my judgment to warrant this increased endowment. In the first place, when the stations were established the number of men that were experienced in agricultural experimental work were few. The result was that young men recently graduated were employed at small salaries. The demand for this class of men, both in and outside of the experiment stations, has tended to increase salaries, so that our station, at least, finds itself embarrassed by too large a salary roll in proportion to its income.

On this account it is practically impossible to take up new lines of work or even prosecute the lines already established as vigorously as is desirable without abandoning important subjects of inquiry. For example, the fruit-growing industry of this State is very great; there have arisen many new problems along the lines of economic entomology and mycology; with the present income it is impracticable for the station to give these the needed attention.

Important as soil investigations are and as large appropriations as have been made for the Bureau of Soils of the United States Department of Agriculture, this station has no funds that can be used for such studies, and this in a State with great diversity of soil.

Economic forestry has been placed upon a scientific basis since the passage of the Hatch Act. There is hardly a farm in this State that has not its own private wood lot and there are many thousands of acres of forest. It is impossible to devote anything from existing funds to this important subject.

In the propagation and breeding of both animals and plants there is a large amount of work that should be done in this State. While we are doing something along these lines, more funds are needed in order to accomplish anything like what should be done.

For instance, in a large section of this State the growing of wheat is a new and important industry, and has led to the establishment of five-roller flour mills. Studies made by the station have shown that the wheat here grown is not as well adapted to bread making as it should and can be. Preliminary studies upon the breeding of wheat were undertaken, but for lack of funds had to be discontinued.

These are specimens of the needs for agricultural inquiry in Maine.

Possibly the following, which illustrates the confidence the people of the State have in the station and the eagerness with which they seek the results of experimental inquiry, may interest you. The State prints the station publications. The station mailing list had not undergone thorough revision for many years and had reached above 9,000 names.

Not wishing to impose upon State funds by publishing editions larger than needed, in July, 1902, we sent out a bulletin containing a notice that the name of the recipient had been taken from the mailing list, but would be replaced on request. With the exception of the official mailing list of the Office of Experiment Stations and the list of Maine newspapers, the entire station mailing list was canceled and destroyed.

Six months later there were about 8,000 names again on the station mailing list, and the number is now back to about the original number.

Yours, truly,

CHAS. D. WOODS, Director.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In response to your favor inclosing the bill, introduced by yourself, for the purpose of increasing the appropriation for the experiment stations, I would say that so far as this State is concerned, such increase is most urgently called for. California's area is so great, its climates and soils so varied, that this station has long been unable, even with the aid furnished both by the State directly and by the State university, to keep up with the constantly and rapidly increasing demand for investigations of all kinds bearing directly upon the infinitely varied problems which confront our farmers in the several widely diverse climatic regions of the State.

It is only through the aid received here and there from associations, private parties, and sometimes from counties and communities, that we have been enabled to even remotely satisfy some of the most pressing demands for the investigation of questions involving wide interests, both commercial and agricultural, and too frequently such assistance stops short when solutions are just in sight but not yet fully established. Withal, it has been almost impossible for this station to engage to any great extent in the investigation of general questions which concern the entire arid region and agricultural science at large. We are so beset with local demands that little time or money remains for the direct researches of wider scope, which are considered by many as the main object of the Hatch Act, and which are only indirectly touched by the elaboration of local questions that now mainly occupy the time of our working staff.

Yet with the increase of interest in progressive agriculture, brought about by the farmers' institutes, now provided for by the State, the farming population calls more and more for experimental investigation of practical problems, for the solution of which the knowledge we possess of the peculiarities of the several climatic and soil areas of the State qualifies us much better than can possibly be the case with explorers sent out by the Department of Agriculture, who, being usually impressed with the conditions existing in the Eastern States, must first familiarize themselves with those existing here.

It therefore seems to us that the most direct and effective way to benefit agriculture in the several States, and especially in the State of California, would be to strengthen first of all the State agricultural experiment stations by a material increase in the appropriation for their maintenance, such as is proposed in your bill, which I earnestly hope will receive favorable action by Congress.

Very respectfully and truly, yours,

E. W. HILGARD, Director.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned, constituting the executive committee of the Allied Agricultural Organizations of Pennsylvania, are gratified to learn that a movement is on foot under your leadership to increase the annual appropriation by Congress to the agricultural experiment stations.

These stations were founded nearly seventeen years ago. Since then they have thoroughly established themselves in the confidence of the agricultural community, and as a consequence steadily increasing demands are being made on them in all directions by the farmers of the several States for information, the value of which is by no means restricted by State lines. We feel, therefore, that it is a wise use of public funds to increase this appropriation and can assure you that in this respect we speak for the farmers of this State, who will most highly appreciate and actively support your efforts in their behalf.

Very respectfully, yours,

Nathan C. Schaeffer, Chairman Department of Public Instruction; N. B. Critchfield, Department of Agriculture; J. T. Rothrock, Department of Forestry; Hiram Young, State Agricultural Society; Jason Sexton, State Board of Agriculture; Gabriel Hiester, State Horticultural Association; M. N. Clark, State Grange; D. M. Onmake, State Alliance; S. F. Barber, Pennsylvania Dairy Union; W. C. Norton, State Breeders' Association; W. F. Wagner, Pennsylvania Jersey Cattle Club; Norris G. Temple, State Poultry Association; J. P. Sharpless, Guernsey Breeders' Association; J. Aldus Herr, Jersey Cattle Club of Lancaster County; H. V. White, the Pennsylvania State College.

MY DEAR SIR: I have looked over your bill very carefully and approve of it. I do not know of any legislation that could be had in Congress that would be of more value than the passage of your bill, and if there is any way I can cooperate with you in the matter that will be of assistance, do not hesitate to ask me.

Very cordially, yours,

W. M. LIGGETT,

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS,
COLLEGE OF AGRICULTURE AND AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION,
Urbana, Ill., January 26, 1904.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your favor of recent date, inclosing copy of H. R. 8678, and asking the reasons that in our State particularly can be urged in its behalf.

Replying I would say, although we are in this State fortunate enough to have a total of $100,000 a year for investigation work, yet most of it is to be expended along definite lines, leaving many subjects entirely untouched simply because no funds are available that are of such general application as to be used for anything but for special purposes. Such an increase as is contemplated in this bill would enable us to undertake many lines of work not yet touched, because of the fact I have just now stated.

In order that you may see exactly what is meant, permit me to present the following schedule of our appropriations for investigation work, showing the lines to which they are confined:

Soil investigation	$25,000
Corn investigation	10,000
Live-stock investigation	25,000
Horticultural investigation	10,000
Dairy investigation	15,000

It will be noted that aside from corn the crop side is practically not represented. The same is true of certain other lines that might be mentioned.

Very truly, yours,

E. DAVENPORT, Director.

GEORGIA EXPERIMENT STATION,
Experiment, Ga., January 21, 1904.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I heartily approve of the bill to provide for an increase in the annual appropriation for the experiment stations, etc. I have previously seen a copy of it and carefully read it.

The reasons which lead me to approve this bill may be stated as follows: The Georgia Experiment Station, while nominally connected with the State College of Agriculture at Athens, is actually separated from the college by a distance of more than 100 miles. We are entirely dependent upon the original Hatch Act appropriation of $15,000. This appropriation is insufficient for the thorough equipment of the station for its work. We are able to have only five staff officers, when we could very usefully employ seven or eight if we had the money.

In addition, I may say that Georgia is one of the largest of the older States of the Union, and her agricultural conditions, owing to its geographical position, are varied, indeed. We ought to have two or three substations under the direction of the central station. We ought to have cooperative experiments conducted in different sections of the State. This we can not do with the limited appropriation now at our disposal.

We are not able to employ an expert entomologist or biologist, botanist or veterinarian, and several other professionals usually connected with experiment-station work. Even our chemist is only nominally so, as we are not able to pay a sufficient amount to justify the operation of a chemical laboratory at the station.

The salaries paid to the officers of the station are very moderate, the highest being only $2,000 (for the director), and no other salary is greater than $1,200 a year. This want of funds to properly compensate expert station workers has several times operated to our disadvantage in the loss of valuable men who were attracted to the Government work at Washington, or to some other richer stations North and East, by higher salaries.

An addition of $5,000 to our fund would mean very much indeed to us, while it would not amount to much at such stations as New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Wisconsin, South Carolina, Mississippi, etc., all of these stations having large appropriations from other sources than the Hatch fund. I wish to say that I very earnestly ask your approval of the bill when it comes to a vote.

I will add as an illustration that were this station enjoying a sufficient income from the Hatch Act or other sources, we would have long since established a substation in south Georgia for the development of sugar making, sugar-cane culture, and making of sirup.

Very truly, yours,

R. J. REDDING, Director.

EXPERIMENT STATION OF AGRICULTURAL AND MECHANICAL COLLEGE OF ALABAMA,
Auburn, Ala., January 22, 1904.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have read with much satisfaction H. R. 8678, which you kindly sent me.

Answering your inquiry as to reasons why this bill should pass, especially as regards this State, I would say we have practically every reason that could be advocated by any experiment station. Its passage should be especially helpful in Alabama in enabling us to bring about such a diversification of the agriculture of this State as to prepare our farmers either to grow better varieties of cotton and by improved methods when the boll weevil reaches us, as it doubtless will, or else be prepared to make a living from a number of new crops or new farm industries now practically unknown to most of our farmers.

An improvement in the use of the $3,000,000 worth of commercial fertilizers annually used in Alabama would be effected if we had increased funds for local fertilizer experiments, and it would take only an insignificant improvement in this respect to repay many times the cost which would be incurred under your bill.

Yours, very truly,

J. F. DUGGAN, Director.

MISSISSIPPI EXPERIMENT STATION,
Agricultural College, Miss., January 29, 1904.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I acknowledge receipt of your favor of January 18 inclosing a copy of House bill 8678, being a bill to provide for an increased annual appropriation for agricultural experiment stations. In reply I beg to say that should Congress see fit to increase the appropriations for experiment-station work that it would undoubtedly be of great value in this State. While we are enabled to do good with the present appropriation, still it is not sufficiently large to enable us to push the work as we would like to do and as would be best for the agricultural interests of the State. Necessarily we are compelled to pursue several lines of investigation, and the present appropriation gives rather limited means for any particular piece of work. With additional funds we could extend our present work with beef cattle so as to make it very much more efficient, as well as obtain important information with less delay. We could also extend our work on the soils of the State, which is desirable and for which the available funds at present are entirely inadequate for present demands.

I hardly know of anything that seemingly would be of more value to us than to be able to employ a good man to engage in plant breeding. Our funds are so limited that we are unable to engage in this work at all, and yet it is a very promising field for useful work in this State. What is said of plant breeding is also true of poultry. It is also a fact that an increased appropriation for this station would increase its efficiency and usefulness to a very much greater degree than would be indicated by the relative increase in the funds. I would like very much to see the bill be enacted into law, and I do not know of any way that more good could be done for the people of Mississippi.

Yours, very truly,

W. L. HUTCHINSON, Director.

TEXAS AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATIONS OF THE AGRICULTURAL AND MECHANICAL COLLEGE,
College Station, Tex., January 29, 1904.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ADAMS: I have learned with pleasure, through your letter of the 18th instant, that you are introducing a bill to increase the Federal appropriation to the State experiment stations. As you ask me for reasons why this bill would be particularly beneficial to us in our State, I do not hesitate to write you fully in regard to it. In the first place, the $15,000 which we receive is not at all adequate to conduct the many experiments demanded of us because of the extent and variety of the resources of our State. The State is immense in size, with vast interests associated with farming, and there is great variety of conditions prevailing over such a large territory. For instance, there is a section of the State given almost wholly to rice culture; then the sugar lands which make up the sugar plantations; the cotton country, and then the horticultural portion of the State, devoted to fruit growing and truck gardening.

Still farther west and north we have the great cattle country, while in the southwest the sheep industry has assumed vast proportions. Being a new State, all these industries originate new problems. For instance, within the last five years the rice industry has assumed enormous development, and with its growth follow questions on the kinds of soil suited for it and the nature of the waters that may be used for irrigation. These features come within the department of our chemist. The growth of the crop and the new usage of the by-products are also immense fields for study. We can take any single crop in this State—rice, cotton, sugar—and as a matter of fact there should be an experiment station devoted wholly to the problems which arise from them.

There are also sections of our State that are going heavily into the growing of alfalfa, and we have to wrestle with problems connected with that crop. Such points are becoming cattle and sheep feeding centers, and from this fact other questions arise. How best to use our cotton-seed by-products, and our rice by products, and the molasses from the sugar mills in conjunction with crops that are grown on the farm are questions that have yet to be determined. In cattle feeding, hog feeding, and sheep feeding we gain very little by the experience of the other and older stations, because they do not have the feeds which we grow here. The utilization of Texas feeds by Texas cattle from the range and sheep from the plains is worthy of a single experiment station. We are being gradually driven to the point, owing to the immensity of our State, of establishing stations in different portions of the State.

The State supports two now in a small degree, but the demand for these stations is such that more money is badly needed to establish them. One reason why Texas should be specially considered in the Federal appropriation is that she is the keystone to the South, and consequently questions that are solved here in nearly all matters of prime importance would apply generally to all the Southern States. Being a new country and a large one, with immense industrial activity, we are very badly in need of funds to do something of practical importance to the various features of agricultural work which are springing up in our State.

I wish to congratulate you on being the author of this bill, and if you think I could be of any assistance to you by going more into details and giving you hard facts, you only have to command me.

Yours, very truly,

JOHN A. CRAIG,
Dean and Director.

THE UNIVERSITY OF TENNESSEE,
Knoxville, January 21, 1904.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS, M. C., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 18th instant has just been received inclosing a copy of a bill providing for an increase in the Federal appropriation to the State experiment stations. I am very much pleased with the bill and hope it will be enacted into a law by the present Congress.

As reasons why the bill should be supported by the people of this State, permit me to suggest the following:

First, the station has never received but one appropriation from the State; its funds are practically limited to the original $15,000, which is totally inadequate to meet the demands now made upon it. For example, we are expected to employ competent experts along several lines of agricultural research and pay these men living salaries and conduct original investigations. When $8,000 or $10,000 of the station fund is used for salaries, there is certainly not much left for original research.

This station has no entomologist, no veterinarian, no zoologist, etc. We can not employ these men and develop these departments without additional funds. Work along these lines is of the utmost importance to the people of the State. For instance, we have the cattle-tick problem to contend with. Our trucking interests are very large, and we need an entomologist to study ways and means for the destruction of insect pests. The boll weevil seems to be headed this way, and will call for the attention of at least one competent expert. Poultry raising is a great interest in the State. Nothing has been done along this line by the station because of a lack of funds.

We have in this State a great variety of soils and a diversity of crops. An agricultural map of the State should be made, also a complete soil survey and cooperative experiments carried on in various points where special industries are of paramount interest. Examples of these are found in the cotton, tobacco, truck, and fruit growing regions. There is hardly a State in the Union where the agricultural problems presented for solution are more complex or numerous. Yet it is clearly recognized that the station has rendered the farmers of the State the best possible service under the circumstances.

The additions to the station funds as provided for in your bill would enable us to develop the lines of research suggested and to reach out and help the farmers in every section of the State and to make investigations worth thousands of dollars to our people, and, best of all, to carry out through cooperative experiments on various farms in each county the results of the investigations which have and will be made to the main station. For instance, the station ha developed several fine varieties of cereals, and is now striving to get them in the hands of leading farmers. This could be done almost immediately if a larger appropriation were available. Under the circumstances it will require several years. In the meantime the farmers are losing the benefits of the station work.

These are but a few of the examples of the many ways in which the experiment station, with the additional appropriation contemplated, would reach out and stimulate an interest in the agricultural industries of Tennessee.

Very respectfully,

ANDREW M. SOULE.

NEW HAMPSHIRE COLLEGE OF

Mr. H. C. ADAMS, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Allow me to thank you for your letter of January 18, inclosing a copy of House of Representatives bill No. 8678. I am much interested in this measure and hope that it will pass.

Since the establishment of the experiment stations in 1887, under the terms of the Hatch Act, great good has resulted to the agricultural interests of the several States through the experimental work conducted by the State stations. At the time of their establishment the $15,000 appropriated annually to each station was ample, considering the fact that the work at that time was not organized and that there were few men qualified to undertake the work of agricultural research in a scientific and practical way. During recent years there has been developed trained specialists in all lines of agricultural investigation, and to-day the State stations are much better prepared to do work on a high grade than they ever have been. The most pressing need of the State stations at this time is additional appropriations for strictly investigation work, as is provided for under the terms of your bill.

We all rejoice in the splendid appropriations which have been made by Congress to the United States Department of Agriculture and appreciate the work the Department is doing for the farmer. Their appropriations have been increased rapidly. I understand that during the current year the Department has at its disposal between four and five millions of dollars. In comparison with this large amount the State stations receive in the aggregate only $760,000 annually. It would seem that the State stations have been neglected to a considerable degree in this respect. It seems reasonable to suppose that a State station is better prepared to deal with the agricultural problems of the State than is a distant organization. The State station men are called to all parts of the State on various duties, and are familiar with the agricultural problems in the State and are interested in the solution of these problems.

Furthermore, the greater part of our experiment stations are connected with the State agricultural and mechanical colleges, and any expenditure of the Government money in experiment-station work, therefore, has a large educational value to the students who are in attendance at the college, and, besides, it gives employment to many of these students who are enabled to make a part of their college expenses by their work for the experiment station.

I think you will find that your bill will meet with popular approval among the farmers all over the country and with experiment-station workers. If I can be of service to you, please call upon me.

Yours, very truly,

W. D. GIBBS,
President of the College and Director of Experiment Station.

NEW JERSEY AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATIONS,
New Brunswick, N. J., January 20, 1904.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ADAMS: In our own State we could use to very great advantage any extra funds provided for in the bill, for while our State has been quite generous in the matter of State appropriations for experiment-station work, nevertheless we feel that the work of investigation should be increased mainly along the lines of soil investigation, both from the chemical and the bacteriological standpoint, and the lines of plant diseases and remedies, study of insects and their destruction, the introduction and development of crops for the dairy, etc.

In the matter of the study of soils, I may say that at our station I established a department of soil chemistry and bacteriology three years ago, and the investigations along this line are more promising than any that have been conducted, and the field is practically unlimited. We have accumulated very little definite knowledge along this line, and it seems most desirable that an increasing amount of funds should be at the disposal of the different stations for the investigation of this subject as it applies to the conditions in the individual States. Such investigations would, in some degree at least, counteract the effect of some investigations that have been reported, which, in the judgment of leading chemists, are not based upon scientific data. The subject of plant diseases and their remedies is a matter of the greatest importance. Thousands of dollars are lost annually in our State by diseases of potatoes, melons, tomatoes, and fruits, which could be prevented if proper study had been given of the causes and remedies for the same. The same is true in the matter of the insects. While we have been doing most excellent work in many States, still the funds are not sufficient to enable us to cover the subject as it might be if we secured the appropriation provided for in your bill.

I shall be glad at any time to give you further or more detailed data along this line, and to assist in any or every way in my power in the passage of your bill.

Thanking you for the opportunity afforded me for doing so, I remain,

Very truly, yours,

E. B. VOORHEES, Director.

AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION OF THE RHODE ISLAND COLLEGE OF
AGRICULTURE AND MECHANIC ARTS,
Kingston, R. I., January 25, 1904.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to yours of the 18th instant, concerning the bill introduced by you for the purpose of providing an increased appropriation for the agricultural experiment stations of the United States, I will say that it seems to me that no more opportune measure has been introduced in Congress for a long time.

So far as concerns the experiment station in this State, I believe that it is almost the universal opinion of the farmers of Rhode Island that it has been of tremendous benefit. Unfortunately, the amount of the appropriation at present is too small to permit of our covering the field in a satisfactory manner. We are working in three lines, namely, poultry experiments, horticultural experiments, and field experiments. I regret that the amount at disposal has not been sufficient to render it possible to do all the chemical work in connection with the field experiments which should be done. Furthermore, there are many important crops which are grown in the State which should be experimented with more fully than in the past, particularly for the purpose of finding out the best manures for use upon the soils of different sections of the State.

The number of experimental plats upon the experiment station grounds should be increased in order to answer the questions which our farmers are raising and for the purpose of determining the best system of manuring and other general procedure in the growing of our most important crops.

Regarding our poultry experiments, I will say that our chief line of work is in the study of problems relating to incubation and brooding and feeding young chicks, particularly in the winter months. This line of work will tax most of the means which we have at our disposal, though we are endeavoring to do a little work in connection with the "black-head" disease of turkeys. This disease has practically ruined the turkey industry of this State, and promises to work similar havoc in the near future in States which have been practically free from it in the past. It is our desire to undertake more extensive work in this line for the purpose of ascertaining, if possible, how this disease can be checked, controlled, or entirely eliminated. This work would be possible if the appropriation were increased, but under the present conditions only a limited amount of money is available.

Our great greenhouse and market-garden interests in this State are very important and require that more work should be done in the line of studying plant diseases and in conducting actual experiments. There should also be a study of the best manner of growing plants under glass. The various horticultural interests in the State have repeatedly attempted to assist us in this work by means of resolutions requesting the State to do more for these interests, but it has been impossible with the money at our disposal.

These are only a few of the possible lines of investigation, but I think I have named enough to show that the appropriation provided for in the bill which you have introduced can be used to the utmost advantage. I sincerely hope, for the good of the agricultural interests of the United States, that the measure will be passed.

Very respectfully, yours,

H. J. WHEELER.

OHIO AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION,
DEPARTMENT OF PLANT PHYSIOLOGY AND PATHOLOGY,
Wooster, Ohio, January 27, 1904.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I find that I have overlooked the request, which accompanied the copy of your bill increasing the appropriations for the experiment stations, that I should give the reasons which make such an increase necessary. These reasons are: (1) That as the work of agricultural research progresses, and the people become more acquainted with its possibilities, the demand for the help which it can give constantly increases. (2) That the character of the work is constantly becoming more complex and, therefore, more costly. The problems which were first attacked were the more simple ones, but as the solutions of these are attained we find that beyond them lie others of even greater importance, but whose solutions involves an indefinitely greater outlay in the apparatus required for exact research and in the men qualified to conduct such research.

With the growth of the work there has been a corresponding growth in the ability of our farmers to profit by it. Consequently the work which was sufficient and satisfactory fifteen years ago is now entirely out of date, and for it must be substituted work of a very much higher grade.

For these reasons the endowment for research which was abundant fifteen years ago is altogether inadequate at the present date.

We find the annual expenditures of the Ohio station have increased from $15,000 in 1888 to $45,000 in 1903, and we are to-day further from meeting the demands of our farmers than we were fifteen years ago. I do not mean by this we are spending the money less wisely to-day than before. On the contrary, I believe that, so far as this point is concerned, the station work meets greater approval now than ever before.

Yours, truly.

CHAS. E. THORNE.

THE SOUTH DAKOTA AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, EXPERIMENT STATION,
Brookings, S. Dak., January 22, 1904.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have your letter of January 18, inclosing copy of House bill 8678, or a bill for the purpose of increasing the annual appropriation now received by the different stations. I am delighted to know that you have decided to attempt to secure an additional appropriation for this work. We are heartily in favor of such an increase in the appropriation here, as we are hampered on all sides for funds. We are endeavoring to carry on six different departments with the $15,000. This sum could be spent in one department. Live stock is our principal industry here. We have diseases in this State affecting this industry, such as sheep scab and cattle mange, and if we were provided with funds we could try to show the people how to prevent them.

Our conditions are very different from those of any other State. The results obtained in feeding experiments in other climates are not applicable here. Practically nothing has been done to show the farmer the feeding value of our different grains, because we have had nothing to do it with. Five thousand dollars could be used in that department alone. Reports have it that the total sale of all products for the year ending June 30, 1903, from this State were $136,000,000. The same report claims that $47,000,000 of this was for live stock alone. To show the people at home how these diseases could be eradicated would be a benefit to the cattle industry of the United States, as a large per cent of our cattle are shipped into the older corn belt, where they are fed and then shipped to market. These, I think, are sufficient reasons why we should have a little more money from Congress. Trusting you will be successful in your effort, I remain,

Very truly,

JAMES W. WILSON.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS,

DEAR SIR: Your circular letter asking for ways in which this State will be especially benefited by an increase in the Federal appropriation to the State experiment stations has been brought before our station council. I assume that you prefer that specific lines of investigation be named rather than general statements.

(1) An important line of experimentation that has been developed but little in this State, for lack of funds, is that of plant breeding and improvement. This would undoubtedly be entered upon in a much more extended way if we had greater resources.

(2) In this State the question of diminishing returns in the way of crops is beginning to compel attention, and experiments in reference to maintaining soil fertility or renewing that already impaired are becoming a pressing need.

(3) Closely connected with this is the question of crop rotation, or the relation of crops to each other.

(4) Investigations concerning animal diseases are very expensive in many cases, and have been almost impossible thus far because of lack of funds. The large stock interests of the western half of this State make such investigations extremely important.

(5) Tests of field, orchard, and garden crops in a much more extended way are very desirable.

(6) We have not yet had means to make any investigations of the soils of the State. The need for this has not been great thus far, but the condition of agriculture is now such as to make investigations on this subject very desirable.

Other lines can doubtless be suggested, but in connection with the above I wish especially to point out that in a State of this size the results obtained at a single point are not of general application throughout the State, and were funds available we would, in all probability, conduct investigations at many different points, depending upon the subject. This would probably not take the form of establishing substations, but of sending our men to the various places at which it seemed advisable to make tests. For instance, in the origination of better varieties or the improvement of those already existing the work must be done for many regions in the State independently. The same is true of experiments in rotation, maintenance or restoration of soil fertility, etc. These experiments can not be conducted by farmers, but under our immediate supervision the assistance of representative farmers in various localities could doubtless be enlisted. It need scarcely be said that our entire force is heartily in favor of the bill which you have introduced.

Yours, truly,

J. T. WILLARD.

PURDUE UNIVERSITY AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION,
Lafayette, Ind., January 28, 1904.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS,
Committee on Agriculture,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are most heartily in sympathy with any movement in the direction of securing more funds for the stations. As you can see by referring to our annual report, which is just out of press, and a copy of which I am sending you under separate cover, the Indiana station is most desperately in need of more funds.

Very respectfully, yours,

ARTHUR GOSS, Director.

THE MONTANA AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION,
Bozeman, Mont., February 9, 1904.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I inclose herewith a statement of the needs for an increased appropriation for the experiment-station work in the State, prepared by a committee of the station staff. I might briefly list these points:

(1) The field of agriculture has broadened and the calls for help and the need for research very much increased the past ten to fifteen years, yet the funds of the stations have remained the same to a large extent. Much more funds are now needed and could be used to great advantage.

(2) In the arid West, particularly, we have practically to create a new agriculture because of the new and special problems of the country.

(3) We have arrived at a time when new and original lines of work are calling for attention. Thorough scientific work calls for a narrow field for the worker and better appliances for that work. This calls for more workers and larger and better equipment for the work.

(4) Many Western States comprise areas three to ten times the areas of Eastern States, and thus as great a difference in soil and climate, and often greater. Special problems in special districts should be studied in those districts at temporary or permanent substations. Their management and supervision call for additional help.

(5) We in the West are very distant from the center of agricultural and scientific thought and study. We must either buy this literature or have means to visit the libraries where it is to be found did we wish to keep abreast of the times.

(6) The Agricultural Department, of Washington, D. C., shows fully the benefits of increased appropriation. Imagine the condition of their work had their funds remained stationary for the past ten years. The Department has drawn to itself some of the best of the station workers. It is reaching out into the field of the State stations and attacking problems which, because of their great familiarity with the conditions, the State station could handle better and more cheaply did funds permit. Increased funds to the stations would permit of cooperation which would be mutually beneficial to both State and Federal experiment work.

(7) Experiments are conducted to answer local problems, but in their application the results have generally an interstate, frequently a national, and sometimes an international application. Our mailing list contains nearly as many names from outside the State as within the State, and moreover they go to all parts of the world. Thus, while serving the State we are also serving the nation in building up the greatest of the country's industries—agriculture.

Wishing you success in the matter, I am, very truly,

F. B. LINFIELD, Acting Director.

AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION
OF THE NORTH CAROLINA COLLEGE OF
AGRICULTURE AND MECHANIC ARTS,
Raleigh, February 18, 1904.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Long absence from the office in farmers' institute has prevented an earlier acknowledgment of your letter of January 18, regarding your bill for increasing the support of the agricultural experiment stations.

I am very much interested in this measure, and in its support I feel that I can not say more than that the experiment station has been the most effective means in this State for the advancement of our agriculture, which has made important strides within recent years. At the beginning experimental work was new. The field had to be explored and lines of work developed. The original appropriation was sufficient for this. Now that the work is well organized, demands are made on the stations for investigation in the various lines of agriculture beyond the means of the stations, and it is highly important that additional aid should be given the stations at this time to enlarge and prosecute new lines of work and to extend and carry out investigations now in progress.

Our board of agriculture, which is the board of control of the station, recognized this need for additional funds for the station in the resolution which I inclose, and which was passed at its last meeting.

I assure you of my high appreciation of your efforts in behalf of the stations and agricultural progress.

Very truly, yours,

B. W. KILGORE, Director.

THE CONNECTICUT AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION,
New Haven, Conn., February 8, 1904.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your note with reference to the bill providing for an increase of Federal appropriation to the agricultural stations, I think the reasons which can be urged in its behalf in this State are the same as those which can be urged everywhere. No one who was familiar with agricultural conditions here thirty years ago, and has watched the change, can fail to see in this State a great gain in the intelligence of our farmers, in their willingness to accept and put to practical use the teachings of science which bear particularly on their work, and in the effectiveness of their farming in consequence. Our farmers are necessarily most conservative; hence they are slow to take up with propositions of change in agricultural practice. The agricultural station has, however, won their confidence to a very large degree. That was the sine qua non—the first step. The station is now in a position to accomplish more in the interest of the farmer than ever before, if it has the means. Fruit raising, dairying, and tobacco growing in Connecticut have been almost revolutionized, chiefly as a result of the work done by agricultural stations in all parts of the country.

The station is fully organized, and the additional funds, if given, will be wholly used for increasing and diffusing agricultural knowledge. Certainly they are needed. The farmer is the "forgotten man." Food production, the vital thing for the nation, is regarded as a thing which may be left to the dull-witted, and the producer is a "mossback." But farming has got to be made scientific, as well as "practical," and the farmer has got to be as well equipped for his business as the financier, if the food production of this country is to keep pace with the demand for it.

I would like to call your attention to the fact that this State is not "lying down" on the General Government in this matter. Twelve years before the Hatch Act was passed our general assembly established an agricultural station, the first in the country, and to-day, in addition to the $15,000 received from the Hatch fund, the State itself appropriates yearly more than $19,000 for the uses of the State station.

Very respectfully, yours,

E. H. JENKINS.

MARYLAND AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION,
College Park, Prince George County, Md., February 5, 1904.

Hon. H. C. ADAMS, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have yours, with copy of bill to provide for an increased appropriation for the agricultural experiment stations. I am very much interested in this measure, and I believe that the amount which this appropriation would provide could be used to very great advantage to the people in our State. I feel confident that this amount could be used in the development of our corn, wheat, hay, and pasture lands, which would bring annually to our farmers 1,000 times the expense involved. We also could use a very considerable amount profitably in investigations, which would be of benefit to our large fruit and truck interests.

Very truly, yours,

H. J. PATTERSON, Director.

I have received numerous indorsements for this measure, and petitions are now on file for its passage by corn growers' associations, State horticultural societies, from the organizations of numerous experiment stations, from the board of regents of agricultural colleges, from the leading agricultural journals of the United States, from many granges, farmers' institutes, agricultural organizations, and from intelligent farmers all over the country who appreciate thoroughly the great public benefits which have come to the American farmer through the definite work of the experiment stations.

Every great statesman from the time of Washington when he delivered his message to Congress in 1796, in which he declared in favor of the establishment of a national board of agriculture to encourage investigation and experimentation, down to William McKinley, who was preeminently the friend of agriculture, and to the distinguished gentleman who now occupies the White House, and who has given his vigorous indorsement in characteristic manner to the work of agricultural education, has declared in favor of national aid for the development of our agricultural interests.

I do not ask the passage of this bill merely because there are so many farmers and they are so great a political force. I do not admire an agricultural demagogue or a man who flatters the farmer, tells him that he bears nearly all the burdens of the world and embodies all the virtues of the world, and who through this kind of talk seeks to make his own political fortunes. The farmer is no necessarily better than any other man, but he is as good as any other man when he is just as honest and just as industrious and just as intelligent. The business of farming itself confers no special dignity upon any man. The farmer is crowned with the dignity of labor when he carries into his work integrity, ambition, and good sense. There is dignity and honor in labor everywhere when it is properly performed. The man who pounds stone upon the street and does it as well as he can is upon the same roll of honor with the president of a great railway corporation who runs his business as well and as honestly as he knows how.

While the farmers have no monopoly of the virtues, the farm is still the breeding place of that physical and moral fiber which is needed not only upon the farm but in the centers of our political and business life.

The great majority of the men who have made splendid the business and political history of the United States were born in farm homes.

The interests of every class of men in this country, whether laboring men, professional men, business men, or capitalists, are closely connected with the agricultural interest. When agriculture languishes every interest feels a corresponding depression. When the farmers are doing well all business prospers. The nation can well afford to encourage by reasonable appropriations the development and distribution of sound agricultural knowledge which carries with it greater profits to the farmer's business. Not only this, but one of the problems which has been most seriously discussed among the farmers of this country—the thinking men who run farms—is, How shall we keep a reasonable proportion of the best boys on the farms? The attractions of the city have been too powerful. The professions have become overcrowded. The urban population has increased in far greater proportion than the farming population.

It has been the fashion for bright boys to leave the farm and go into the professions of medicine or law or into commercial pursuits. It would be a misfortune to have this movement entirely stopped. But it has carried thousands of boys who are well fitted for plowing the fields, the sowing of grain, the husking of corn, and the breeding of stock into law offices, where they have been as much out of place as a city-bred and trained lawyer would be milking cows. When farm life is made sufficiently attractive, the farm will hold a reasonable proportion of the talent that is born there. That life will be made attractive when the knowledge comes which makes it profitable and adds to its intellectual satisfactions.

This Government is not throwing a sop to the farmer when it provides for his education. It recognizes his value as a productive factor of the State. It is providing through knowledge for the enrichment of his mind, the increase in the value of his property, and though this method adding to the taxable value of the nation's property from which national revenues must come.

I am fortunate in being able to ask your approval of a bill which engenders no question of class, which stirs no religious feeling, which is not sectional in any sense, and upon which political parties can not divide. It means better work in southern agriculture. It means better utilization of the rocky soils of New England. It means a more rapid development of the garden of the Mississippi Valley. It means a more rapid improvement of the agriculture of the great Middle States. It means a more rapid reclamation and settlement of millions of acres of the arid lands of the West.

The annual revenues of this Government now amount to over $700,000,000. Over $200,000,000 go to the Army and Navy in a time of profound peace. We give $5,000,000 to the St. Louis exposition and lend that enterprise $4,500,000 more. We spend about $13,000,000 a year upon rivers and harbors for the benefit of the commerce and trade of the whole people.

We can well afford, even upon the eve of a Presidential election, when appropriations are carefully scrutinized, to expend the amount provided for in this bill for the development of our great agricultural interests.

We are yet a long way from knowing everything about farming in this country.

In fifty years England has doubled the average of her wheat production per acre, running it from 14 bushels per acre to 28 bushels per acre. A similar increase is possible in the United States. The experiment stations develop and popularize the knowledge which makes it possible.

It is claimed by many students of human affairs that the population of the world is outstripping the food production of the world. That danger is not serious, because it is entirely possible through the application to the farm of educated and trained intelligence to double the average production of the millions of acres now cultivated by the American farmer.

I trust that this House will give a unanimous vote that the agricultural experiment stations, which are the nurseries of profitable farming and the graveyards of farm fallacies and errors, shall be strengthened and their educational power materially increased.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, judging by the character of the speech delivered in the House by my amiable friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] some days ago, there is a likelihood that there will be much stress laid upon the record of individual candidates for the Presidency. For my own part I do not consider the record of a single individual, though holding the exalted position of President of the United States, as of such vital importance as the record of the party itself and the trend of events necessarily incident to the history and purposes of the party itself.

The Republican party can not be otherwise than the friend of labor. It has fought for free labor during its entire existence. It freed the slave; it furnished employment for labor; it lifted up the laboring man, and its last splendid achievement was when it transplanted labor from starvation, as it found it in 1897, and made it possible that it should attain the flourishing position it now occupies. But, catering to the taste of people to examine personal records to ascertain the acts of individuals, I shall furnish here to-day the record of the gentleman who will be the Republican candidate for President. It will furnish good reading for the campaign into which we are so rapidly moving. It will give our Democratic friends food for thought, and it will inspire the toiling man of the country with the pleasant consciousness that the old Republican party, the party of Lincoln, of Grant, of McKinley, of Hanna, is offering for the Presidency a man, a worthy successor to them all and who stands invincible in his record of fealty to the best interests of the laboring man of the United States.

LABOR RECORD OF THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

The most vital problem with which this country, and for that matter the whole civilized world, has to deal—

Said President Roosevelt in his first message to Congress—is the problem which has for one side the betterment of social conditions, moral and physical, in large cities and for another side the effort to deal with that tangle of far-reaching questions which we group together when we speak of "labor."

EPITOME OF THEODORE ROOSEVELT'S FAVORABLE ACTION ON LABOR LEGISLATION.

As member of assembly in New York he voted for bills—
Abolishing tenement-house cigar making in New York City.
Restricting child labor in factories and workshops.
Regulating the labor hours of minors and women in manufacturing establishments.
Safeguarding the lives and limbs of factory operatives.
Regulating wage rates of laborers employed by municipalities.
Making employees preferred creditors.
Providing for building mechanics' liens.
Prescribing the lien rights of working women.
Protecting mechanics and laborers engaged in sinking oil or gas wells.
Abolishing contract child labor in reformatory institutions.
Creating a commission to examine into the operation of the contract system of employing convicts.
Establishing the bureau of labor statistics.
To promote industrial peace.
For a 5-cent fare on the New York City elevated railroad.
Incorporating the New York City Free Circulating Library.
For free public baths in New York City.
As governor of New York he approved these measures:
Creating a tenement-house commission.
Regulating sweat-shop labor.
Empowering the factory inspector to enforce the scaffolding law.
Directing the factory inspector to enforce the act regulating labor hours on railroads.
Making the eight-hour and prevailing-rate-of-wages laws effective.
Amending the factory act—
(1) Protecting employees at work on buildings.
(2) Regulating the working time of female employees.
(3) Providing that stairways shall be properly lighted.
(4) Prohibiting the operation of dangerous machinery by children.
(5) Prohibiting women and minors working on polishing or buffing wheels.
(6) Providing for seats for waitresses in hotels and restaurants.
Shortening the working hours of drug clerks.
Increasing the salaries of New York City school-teachers.
Extending to other engineers the law licensing New York City engineers and making it a misdemeanor for violating the same.
Licensing stationary engineers in Buffalo.
Providing for the examination and registration of horseshoers in cities.
Registration of laborers for municipal employment.
Relating to air brakes on freight trains.
Providing means for the issuance of quarterly bulletins by the bureau of labor statistics.
In addition to the foregoing, while governor of New York he recommended legislation (which the legislature failed to pass) in regard to—
Employers' liability.
State control of employment offices.
State ownership of printing plant.
Devising means whereby free mechanics shall not be brought into competition with prison labor.
As President of the United States he has signed bills—
Renewing the Chinese-exclusion act and extending its provisions to the island territory of the United States.
Prohibiting the employment of Mongolian labor on irrigation works and providing that eight hours shall constitute a day's labor on such projects.

Abolishing slavery and involuntary servitude in the Philippine Islands, violation of the act being punishable by forfeiture of contracts and a fine of not less than $10,000.

Protecting the lives of employees in coal mines in Territories by regulating the amount of ventilation and providing that entries, etc., shall be kept well dampened with water to cause coal dust to settle.

Exempting from taxation in the District of Columbia household belongings to the value of $1,000, wearing apparel, libraries, schoolbooks, family portraits, and heirlooms.

Requiring proprietors of employment offices in the District of Columbia to pay a license tax of $10 per year.

Creating the Department of Commerce and Labor and making its head a Cabinet officer.

Improving the act relating to safety appliances on railways.

Increasing the restrictions upon the immigration of cheap foreign labor and prohibiting the landing of alien anarchists.

While the labor problem in a very broad sense is as old as the human race itself, its modern form is a creation of steam and machinery, which have replaced local production within the home for family needs with factory production for a general market. In the course of this evolution the ownership of the tools and other means of production passed from their actual users to those who understood the needs of the market and possessed the ability to assemble materials, organize the workers, and dispose of the product where it was wanted. Formerly each worker was both capitalist and laborer, and, therefore, himself controlled the conditions under which he worked. But when the worker lost the ownership of his tools he could no longer control the conditions of employment; and it is his struggle to regain such control and to gain a larger share of the joint product of capital and labor that constitutes the modern labor problem. This is the problem that President Roosevelt in his first message to Congress described as the most vital problem with which the country has to deal. Few statesmen of this or any other country have grasped that problem as firmly as has Mr. Roosevelt. His contributions to its solution may be found not only in his addresses and writings, but also in his actions as a public official.

Theodore Roosevelt ever will be remembered as an official whose interest in the weal of the plain people never diminished from the day that he commenced his public career as member of assembly of the State of New York up to the present time. The principles of justice that governed his course in advocating the enactment of labor and reform legislation when he took part in the legislative proceedings at Albany in 1882, 1883, and 1884 were unswervingly maintained while he was governor of New York in 1899 and 1900, and have been conscientiously adhered to during his incumbency as President of the United States. By comparing the first important event connected with his life work with one of more recent date it will be readily observed how unvarying have been his views on matters of moment affecting the general community.

The initial event referred to occurred more than twenty years ago, when, in the interest of the public health, as well as the wage-workers in the tobacco industry, he vigorously opposed the continuance of the sweating system in the manufacture of cigars in tenement houses. The courageous spirit that prompted his attitude in that affair was demonstrated again in 1902, when, owing to his timely intervention in the celebrated anthracite coal strike, peace was restored, a terrible calamity to the country was averted, and an adjustment of the dispute finally resulted through the decision of the commission appointed by him. Not a few problems have reached solution by reason of the wisdom displayed by Theodore Roosevelt and other advanced thinkers whose support he has had in his unremitting efforts to induce the State to pass laws looking to the melioration of social conditions, and by pursuing this evolutionary plan of creating wise and sound regulations to obviate glaring inequalities in the industrial system the State has checked a growing spirit of unrest.

Deeds speak for themselves, and the facts enumerated below respecting his position on questions involving the well-being of the great body of working people are matters of official record well worth close perusal and careful consideration by men of thought and action who have at heart the stability of our republican form of government.

AS MEMBER OF THE NEW YORK ASSEMBLY.

New York State has developed an extensive system of labor and reform legislation. The movement that eventually brought about the enactment of these laws commenced in the fore part of the eighties, and Theodore Roosevelt helped to lay its foundation, being among the few eminent publicists who cooperated in that early effort to place upon the statute books the numerous acts that have since proved to be of so much benefit to wage-workers.

In 1882 he entered public life as member of assembly, and he also served in that capacity in 1883 and 1884. A student of economics, he had familiarized himself with the various phases of the labor question, and he was firm in the belief that the abuses which at that time existed in many employments could be eradicated by suitable enactments. With this end in view, he cast his influence on the side of public-spirited citizens and trade-unionists who during that period undertook to solve some of the social problems through legislative measures calculated to correct prevalent evils. Sweat-shop labor was a subject that received considerable attention in those days, while the restriction of child labor, the regulation of working hours of minors and women, the protection of life and limb, prison labor under the contract system, the better security of mechanics and laborers employed in the building industry, and the promotion of industrial peace were topics that occasioned serious deliberation on the part of the men who interested themselves in the welfare of the masses.

It was not altogether popular then to espouse a cause designed to bring about radical changes in industrial conditions, and the spectacle of this young statesman, although born and reared amid surroundings of affluence and luxury, actively identifying himself with a movement in which the working people were vitally concerned won for him the commendation of not only all labor advocates and social reformers, but likewise of that large portion of the populace in whose behalf he so zealously labored. His strong personality and energetic attitude imparted to the effort a needed impetus, and the outcome surpassed the expectations of even the most sanguine of those who were associated in that undertaking to uplift their fellows. The excellent labor record of Assemblyman Roosevelt is quite fully presented in the succeeding paragraphs.

ABOLITION OF TENEMENT-HOUSE CIGAR FACTORIES.

The first important measure in which Assemblyman Roosevelt became interested was introduced in the legislature of 1882. Its purpose was to improve the public health in New York City by prohibiting the manufacture of cigars or the preparation of tobacco in any form in rooms or apartments of tenement houses. The bill was presented at the request of the cigar makers' unions in the State, and was also indorsed by the State Workingmen's Assembly. It was contended by the labor organizations, "first, that these tenement-house cigar factories are a public nuisance; second, that they are detrimental to the educational interests of the State; third, that they are demoralizing in their influence on the community; fourth, that they are an illegitimate interference with a legitimate trade."

In the assembly the bill was referred to the committee on cities, which gave a hearing on the subject, and as a result a subcommittee consisting of five assemblymen, Mr. Roosevelt being among the number, was selected to investigate the tenement-house cigar factories in New York City. Many of these house shops were found to be in a filthy and insanitary condition, and this inquiry so thoroughly convinced Theodore Roosevelt that the system was a menace to the public health that he became an enthusiastic supporter of the measure to abolish it. It, however, was held up by the cities committee, and, on a motion that that committee be discharged from further consideration of the bill, the same to be placed on general orders, he voted in the affirmative. While the motion was carried, the bill did not pass at the session of 1882, but early in 1883 it was again considered and passed by both houses. Assemblyman Roosevelt spoke and voted in its favor. In his remarks advocating the abolition of the tenement-house shop he declared:

I have visited these pest holes personally, and I can assure you if smokers could only see how these cigars are made we would not need any legislative action against this system at all.

The Cigar Makers' Official Journal, published by the Cigar Makers' International Union, in its issue for February, 1883, printed the following editorial comment under the caption "Condemned by the legislature:"

The representatives of the people, both in the assembly and in the senate, have decided by overwhelming majorities that tenement-house cigar factories are a public nuisance, dangerous to the sanitary, moral, educational, and economic welfare of the Commonwealth. So conclusive were the arguments and evidence brought forward by Assemblymen George Francis Roesch and Theodore Roosevelt that the opposition was completely routed and defeated. The working classes and cigar makers in particular owe a debt of gratitude to those assemblymen and senators who have successfully fought for a great sanitary reform. Their names will go down to posterity as the friends of labor, as the promoters of a great improvement in the sanitary condition of the working classes.

So deeply interested in the matter was Mr. Roosevelt that he invoked the governor to approve the measure. Referring to the argument before that official, the Cigar Makers' Official Journal for March, 1883, contained this statement:

Tuesday, March 8, was the day which the governor had assigned for hearing the arguments of the opponents as well as of the friends of the bill, which aims at the prohibition of the manufacture of cigars in tenement houses used for dwelling purposes. * * * Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, the representative of the brownstone district of New York, was the first speaker in favor of the bill. He said that his district was not influenced by any trades unions; * * * but this bill was an exception to the rule. During the last session of the legislature he was appointed on a committee to investigate the tenement-house cigar factories.

At the start he was opposed to the bill, but the investigation convinced him that it was a good one. The houses, with hardly a single exception, were in a most filthy condition. Children were crawling on stripped tobacco. Old men and women were crowded together in small, ill-ventilated rooms. He appealed to the governor to sign the bill. The representatives of the labor organizations, after a short deliberation, concluded not to speak on the subject, inasmuch as the whole ground had been ably covered and it was unwise to detain the governor any longer.

The bill was signed, but certain parts of the act were declared unconstitutional, and in 1884 a measure intended to meet the objections of the courts was introduced in the legislature. This was also favored by Mr. Roosevelt.

ABOLITION OF CONTRACT CHILD LABOR IN REFORMATORY INSTITUTIONS.

An important reform measure, which had the sanction of organized workers, was introduced in the assembly of 1882. It made it unlawful for the trustees or managers of any house of refuge, reformatory, or other correctional institution to contract, hire, or let the services or labor of children incarcerated in such institutions. Assemblyman Roosevelt voted in favor of the bill, and it subsequently became a law.

REGULATING WAGE RATES OF LABORERS EMPLOYED BY MUNICIPALITIES.

A bill was introduced in 1882 in the assembly to regulate the rate of wages in all cities of the State of over 150,000 inhabitants for laborers employed by or under municipal authorities. Mr. Roosevelt had always believed that the State and municipalities should be model employers by paying prevailing wage rates. He therefore favored this measure. A motion to recommit it to the committee on cities with instructions to strike out the enacting clause, thus killing it, met with his opposition, his vote being enrolled with those of thirty-three other assemblymen against the motion, which, nevertheless, was carried, fifty-six members voting in the affirmative.

SAFEGUARDING LIFE AND LIMB IN FACTORIES.

In 1882 there was a dearth of legislation relating to sanitation, safeguards against fire, and the guarding of machinery, hoistways, and elevators in manufacturing establishments. In that year the life-and-limb bill made its appearance in the legislature, being entitled "An act for the protection of working people and employees in the workshops and factories in the cities of this State." Mr. Roosevelt promptly joined the forces that sought the adoption of this salutary bill, which was also presented in 1883, when it again received his vote, and while cogent reasons for its enactment into law were advanced it did not then reach the statute books; but the thorough discussion of its meritorious features made a marked impression upon public opinion, arousing a sentiment that ultimately compelled the lawmaking powers to pass an act containing requirements that amply protected the lives and limbs of factory operatives.

FREE PUBLIC BATHS IN NEW YORK CITY.

Bills were introduced in the legislature in 1882 and 1883 for the construction and maintenance of free public baths in New York City. These conveniences were desired by the laboring people of that city, and consequently on each occasion Mr. Roosevelt's vote was recorded in favor of their erection.

ESTABLISHING THE BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS.

There was in 1883 a widespread agitation among workingmen for the establishment of a bureau of labor statistics in New York, and in that year a measure to create that department was presented in the legislature. Mr. Roosevelt was an ardent supporter of the bill. In due season it passed both houses and was signed by the governor. This law provided for the appointment of a commissioner, who was empowered to collect, assort, systematize, and present in annual reports to the legislature statistical details relating to all departments of labor, especially in relation to the commercial, industrial, and social condition of working people.

LIEN RIGHTS OF WORKING WOMEN.

For the further protection of female employees in New York City a bill was introduced at the 1883 session of the assembly. It provided for the enforcement of judgments obtained in any court by working women for work, labor, or services done, and Mr. Roosevelt's vote was registered in its favor.

5-CENT FARE ON THE NEW YORK CITY ELEVATED RAILROAD.

The people of New York City in 1883 took active steps to have the fare on the elevated railroad reduced from 10 cents to 5 cents. Commission trains were run at certain hours in the morning and evening, it was declared, "for the accommodation of the public and the laboring classes," upon which the fare was 5 cents, while during other portions of the day 10 cents was charged.

But the public wanted the lower rate to predominate at all hours, so a bill providing for the desirable reduction was drafted and introduced in the legislature. It passed the assembly and senate, Mr. Roosevelt voting with the majority in the former house. The governor, however, vetoed the measure, claiming that it was a violation of contract that was protected by the United States Constitution, which prohibited the passage of a law by any State impairing the obligation of contracts; and the executive also held that the State "must keep within the limits of law and good faith." Apparently moved by the popular demonstration for the proposed change in the fare, the elevated railroad management shortly afterwards voluntarily decreased it to 5 cents.

TO PROMOTE INDUSTRIAL PEACE.

A resolution that proved to be a prelude to the creation, a few years later, of the State board of mediation and arbitration was offered in the assembly of 1883. As it was the entering wedge to a plan to promote industrial peace, Mr. Roosevelt voted for its adoption. It directed the judiciary committee—

To examine and report upon the possible enactment of a practical and beneficial law, to be in the joint interests of capital and labor, and employees and employers, whereby the latter shall be required to give reasonable and timely notice of dismissals from service, except for moral or personal consequences, and of the reduction of wages, and the former a like timely and reasonable notice of any advance in wages and time for leaving work, the object and purpose of this inquiry being to prevent summary strikes from work without proper notice, and summary dismissal from work without a like notice, and to secure, if possible, such conferences and compromises as will establish friendly, just, and equitable relations to the advantage of both classes of citizens and to the people at large.

PROTECTION OF MECHANICS AND LABORERS ENGAGED IN SINKING OIL OR GAS WELLS.

During the legislative session of 1883 a bill was introduced in the assembly for the protection of mechanics and laborers. It was a lien measure to secure the wages of workmen employed in or about the sinking, drilling, or completing of any oil well, or any well sunk or drilled for oil or gas, or in the erection of any tank or other receptacle for oil, gas, or water. Mr. Roosevelt voted for its passage.

BUILDING MECHANICS' LIENS.

When the organized workers in the constructive industry succeeded in having submitted to the legislature of 1884 a mechanics' lien bill, the purpose of which was to prevent the loss of wages of men engaged in the construction or repair of buildings, they discovered a sincere adherent of their cause in Assemblyman Roosevelt. While they did not then succeed in carrying their project through, they were greatly encouraged by the support they received, and this inspired them to make another attempt in a subsequent year to secure legislation for the better security of mechanics and laborers who perform labor for building and other improvements on lands in New York State. Finally they attained their object.

INCORPORATING THE NEW YORK CITY FREE CIRCULATING LIBRARY.

With a view to giving the working people of New York City an opportunity to fully enjoy the advantages of such an institution, Mr. Roosevelt, in the assembly of 1883, voted to incorporate the New York Free Circulating Library.

FOR THE RESTRICTION OF CHILD LABOR.

In 1883 and 1884 the subject of child labor evoked considerable discussion in New York State. The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children had made futile attempts to induce legislative action to restrict it.

Humane physicians expressed the opinion that the strength for perfect physical development of children of tender years employed in factories was diverted from its legitimate ends, thereby producing in adult life, if these children were fortunate enough to be spared to maturity, an impairment of the physical and mental organization; that confinement in poorly ventilated workrooms in constrained positions was unhealthful, tended to make the system more susceptible to attacks of diseases, and lessened the chances to rally from ordinary disorders incident to childhood; that the fatigue of labor was directly injurious by preventing free bodily exercise in the fresh air, and indirectly affected the sanitary condition of the child by substituting unnatural labor for natural exercise, and that these conditions caused the whole moral tone to suffer.

Educators were convinced that children thus employed were deprived of an opportunity to acquire an elementary education, that the standard of intelligence among them was astonishingly low, and that the pernicious system was fatal to the mental growth of the rising generation. The bureau of labor statistics investigated the question and found that a large percentage of the children in the State "were compelled either by their parents or the force of circumstances to spend a large portion of their young lives in factories, mills, or tenements, where but slight, if any, attention seems to be paid to those safeguards which are conducive to good health. If the present system of child labor is to be permitted to continue, it should be the first duty of the State to provide precautionary and effective means to secure the enforcement of proper sanitary regulations in factories, mills, or tenements where children are employed or domiciled."

Organized labor strenuously protested against the continuance of child labor, and resolved to invoke the legislature to pass a law that would abolish it. The State Workingmen's Assembly, in annual session at Albany in 1884, adopted a bill which provided that—

No child under 14 years of age shall be employed in any factory or workshop where goods are manufactured from the raw material, that no child between the ages of 14 and 16 shall be so employed unless such child shall have attended within twelve months immediately preceding such employment some public day or night school or some well-recognized private school, such attendance to be for five days or evenings every week during a period of at least twenty consecutive weeks.

This measure also contained a section—

REGULATING THE LABOR HOURS OF MINORS AND FEMALES.

It provided that—

No minor or no female of whatever age shall be employed in any factory, workshop, or mill for a longer period than ten hours a day, and in no case shall the hours of labor exceed sixty in a week.

Provision was made for the appointment of a factory inspector to enforce the law, each violation being a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment in jail. This was introduced in the legislature of 1884, and Assemblyman Roosevelt ably supported it through its various stages. In 1883 he voted for a bill constructed on similar lines. Neither measure, however, was then incorporated in the State's code of laws, but the agitation thus begun in favor of this remedial legislation resulted in its passage in 1886.

MAKING EMPLOYEES PREFERRED CREDITORS.

Assemblyman Roosevelt voted for that beneficial act, passed in 1884, which made working people preferred creditors in case of insolvency of their employers. This law stipulated that in all assignments the wages or salaries actually owing to the employees of assignors at the time of the execution of the assignment shall be preferred before any other debt. In the event of the assets being insufficient to pay in full all the claims preferred they shall be applied to payment at the same pro rata to the amount of each such claim.

COMMISSION TO EXAMINE INTO THE OPERATION OF THE CONTRACT SYSTEM OF EMPLOYING CONVICTS.

Mr. Roosevelt voted for the bill, which became law in February, 1884, empowering the governor to appoint five persons to constitute a commission to examine into and report upon the practical operation of the contract system for the employment of convicts in State prisons, penitentiaries, and reformatories, as then required by law, and particularly as to the effect of such employment upon the community at large, upon prison management, and upon the discipline of prisoners, the commissioners to report their conclusions, with such recommendations as they deemed proper as to the best method of employing convict labor, to the legislature not later than March 1 of that year.

The commission was chosen on February 11, and as it had but sixteen days to inquire into the subject and report thereon was unable to accomplish the object for which it was created. An effort was made to continue its existence, and a bill was presented to amend the act so as to provide that the terms of the commissioners should continue until their report was made, at the earliest practical date consistent with the performance of their duties. Mr. Roosevelt voted for this proposition, but the measure was vetoed on the ground that it did not contemplate a report at that session of the legislature.

AS GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK.

While governor of New York, in 1899 and 1900, Theodore Roosevelt pursued the same consistent course in regard to the enactment of suitable labor legislation that he so persistently followed during his three years' career as member of assembly. Not only did he recommend the passage of new laws in the interest of the mass of the people, but he urged the necessity of amending existent labor statutes so as to make them more efficacious, and suggested the adoption of improved methods in order to insure their proper enforcement.

The development in extent and variety of industries has necessitated legislation in the interest of labor—

He wrote in his annual message to the legislature of 1899.

This legislation is not necessarily against the interest of capital; on the contrary, if wisely devised, it is for the benefit of both laborers and employers. We have very wisely passed many laws for the benefit of labor, in themselves good and for the time being sufficient, but experience has shown that the full benefit of these laws is not obtained, through the lack of proper means of enforcing them and the failure to make any one department responsible for their enforcement. In order that the desire of the people, definitely expressed in this wholesome legislation, shall be made effective, I recommend that the enforcement of the entire body of legislation relating to labor be placed under the board of factory inspectors. This would simplify the whole question of labor legislation and place the responsibility for its enforcement where it properly belongs and would also give the maximum efficiency of service with the minimum cost to the State. With a slight increase in the general force of factory inspectors this work can be done for the whole State and the object of the legislation be satisfactorily secured to the people.

ADDITIONAL FACTORY INSPECTORS RECOMMENDED AND PROVIDED.

Governor Roosevelt thereupon recommended "that the legislature provide for additional factory inspectors so as to bring the total number up to fifty." This suggestion was favorably considered by the legislature, and the number of deputy factory inspectors was increased from thirty-six to fifty.

EMPOWERING THE FACTORY INSPECTOR TO ENFORCE THE PROVISIONS OF THE SCAFFOLDING LAW.

In the same message Governor Roosevelt said:

Another important statute of this character relates to providing secure scaffolding in the erection of new buildings. The law on this subject is all that could be desired, but its enforcement is left to the city police, and as a matter of fact practically no provision is made for carrying it into effect. In New York City, where this law is most needed, police officers are unacquainted with the character and requirements of the law. Most of them, indeed, are not aware that the enforcement of this law is any part of their duty.

This recommendation resulted in the passage of an amendment to section 19 of the labor law, relating to the inspection of scaffolding, or slings, hangers, blocks, pulleys, stays, braces, ladders, irons, or ropes of any swinging or stationary scaffolding used in the construction, alteration, repairing, painting, cleaning, or pointing of buildings within the limits of a city, transferring the power of enforcing its provisions from the municipal police authorities to the factory inspector.

DIRECTING THE FACTORY INSPECTOR TO ENFORCE THE ACT REGULATING HOURS OF LABOR ON RAILROADS.

The message of Governor Roosevelt in 1899 also contained the following suggestion:

The law regulating the hours of labor on surface railroads is also an excellent provision against the tendency to work the men an almost unlimited number of hours. The enforcement of this law is left to the railroad commissioners. As they have no active force to use for such a purpose the law fails by default, except when individual citizens undertake the prosecutions. The employee himself will rarely or never complain for fear of being discharged.

In accordance with this recommendation authority to enforce the sections of the act relative to the hours of labor on steam, street, surface, and elevated railroads was conferred upon the factory inspector.

AN EIGHT-HOUR DAY AT PREVAILING RATES OF WAGES.

The law requiring an eight-hour day and a prevailing rate of wages for State employees—

Said Governor Roosevelt in his 1899 message to the legislature—is not intrusted to any authority for enforcement. If this law is to remain on the statute books it should be enforced, and therefore the legislature should make it the particular business of somebody to enforce it.

Conformably with the wishes of the executive, the factory-inspection department was vested with the power to enforce this act, which was further amended so as to provide that—

Each contract to which the State or a municipal corporation is a party which may involve the employment of laborers, workmen, or mechanics shall contain a stipulation that no laborer, workman, or mechanic in the employ of the contractor, subcontractor, or other person doing or contracting to do the whole or a part of the work contemplated by the contractor, shall be permitted or required to work more than eight hours in any one calendar day, except in cases of extraordinary emergency caused by fire, flood, or danger to life or property.

Each contract for such public work hereafter made shall contain a provision that the same shall be void and of no effect unless the person or corporation making or performing the same shall comply with the provisions of this section, and no such person or corporation shall be entitled to receive any sum, nor shall any officer, agent or employee of the State or a municipal corporation pay the same or authorize its payment from the funds under his charge or control to any such person or corporation for work done upon any contract which in its form or manner of performance violates the provision of this section.

UNECONOMIC, UNWHOLESOME, AND UNAMERICAN SWEAT-SHOP SYSTEM.

Governor Roosevelt's opinion concerning the evils of sweat-shop labor, that he formed while member of assembly as a result of his searching inquiry into the unhealthful tenement-house system of manufacturing cigars, did not undergo a change during the seventeen years that intervened between 1882, when the investigation was made, and 1899. In truth his views on the subject in the latter year, when he urged the legislature to adopt radical measures to suppress the harmful system, were even more pronounced than those to which he gave utterance while serving as an assemblyman. These were his ideas in 1899, as expressed in his annual message:

Another very important phase of this subject is the sweat-shop system, which is practically the conversion of the poorest class of living apartments into unwholesome pest-creating and crime-breeding workshops. Laws have been enacted by the legislature to suppress this vile phase of industrial life in our large cities by prohibiting the use of dwellings for the purposes of manufacture. Although the law is quite explicit and the intention of the legislature obvious, great difficulty has been experienced in its effective enforcement. It is everywhere agreed that this tenement-house or sweat-shop system is degrading to the unfortunate individuals engaged in it and to the social and moral life of the community in which it exists. How to enforce the law on this subject has perplexed the statesmen of other countries and States as well as our own.

The most effective and uninquisitive means yet devised for accomplishing this end is that recently adopted by Massachusetts, viz, providing that buildings used for manufacturing purposes must have a permit or license, such license or permit to be granted only on conditions that the appointment of the building fulfill the requirements of the law for manufacturing purposes. These permits or licenses ought to be granted by the board of factory inspectors, who should be held responsible for the proper inspection of the buildings and the enforcement of the law.

There are several reasons why this simple method would be effective. It would at once classify buildings used for manufacturing purposes, as a building so used without a permit would be violating the law. It would prevent much friction, because all requirements of the law would have to be fulfilled before the building was used. This would be a great advantage in the erection of new buildings, as proper conveniences, including accessible fire escapes, guarded elevators, and other appointments would be required and easily furnished when new buildings were being erected or when old ones were being changed for manufacturing purposes.

Nor does this involve any radical innovation. It is simply applying the recognized principle upon which boards of health now everywhere act in requiring that the plans for erecting new buildings or alterations of old ones must be submitted to the building and health department and a certificate of approval granted before the building can be erected, alterations made, or the premises occupied. Legitimate manufacturers will not object to this, because they are desirous of furnishing safe and wholesome appointments for their employees. Only those who desire to evade the law and disregard the common demands of sanitation, domestic decency, and wholesome industrial methods will object, and it is these the law desires to reach.

I submit this to the serious consideration of the legislature, and suggest that an amendment to the law embodying this idea be adopted, to the end that the uneconomic, unwholesome, and un-American sweat-shop system shall disappear from our industrial life.

Though the governor's ideas were not embodied in their entirety in the law that ensued, it contained the essential features recommended by him. Its provisions made it unlawful to manufacture, alter, repair, or finish articles of clothing, feathers, artificial flowers, cigarettes, cigars, or umbrellas in a room or apartment in any tenement or dwelling house, or in a building situated in the rear of a tenement or dwelling house, without a license from the factory-inspection department.

Before any such license is granted—an inspection of the room, apartment, or building sought to be licensed must be made by the factory inspector. If the factory inspector ascertain that such room, apartment, or building is in a clean and proper sanitary condition * * * he shall grant a license permitting the use of such room, apartment, or building for the purpose of manufacturing, altering, repairing, or finishing such articles.

Each license shall state the maximum number of persons who may be employed in the room or rooms to which such license relates. The number of persons to be so employed shall be determined by the number of cubic feet of air space contained in each room or apartment mentioned in such license, allowing not less than 250 cubic feet for each person employed between the hours of 6 o'clock in the morning and 6 o'clock in the evening, and * * * not less than 400 cubic feet for each person employed therein between the hours of 6 o'clock in the evening and 6 o'clock in the morning. Such license must be framed and posted in a conspicuous place in each room or apartment to which it relates. It may be revoked by the factory inspector if the health of the community or of the employees requires it or if it appears that the rooms or apartments * * * are not in a healthy and proper sanitary condition.

Every room or apartment in which any of the articles named * * * are manufactured, altered, repaired, or finished shall be kept in a clean and sanitary condition and shall be subject to inspection and examination by the factory inspector for the purpose of ascertaining whether said garments or articles, or any part or parts thereof, are clean and free from vermin and every matter of an infectious or contagious nature. No person shall hire, employ, or contract with * * * any person not holding a license therefor to manufacture, alter, repair, or finish any of the articles named. * * *

Persons contracting for the manufacturing, altering, repairing, or finishing of any of the articles mentioned, * * * or giving out material for which they or any part of are to be manufactured, altered, repaired, or finished, shall keep a register of the names and addresses plainly written in English of the persons to whom such articles or materials are given. * * * Such register shall be subject to inspection by the factory inspector and a copy thereof furnished on his demand.

Articles prepared contrary to the provisions of this act "shall not be sold or exposed for sale by any person. The factory inspector shall conspicuously affix to any such article found to be unlawfully manufactured, altered, repaired, or finished a label containing the words 'tenement made.' * * * The factory inspector shall notify the person owning or alleging to own such article that he has so labeled it. No person except the factory inspector shall remove or deface any tag or label so affixed. If the factory inspector finds evidence of disease present in a workshop or in a room or apartment in a tenement or dwelling house, or in any room or apartment of a building in the rear of a tenement or dwelling house in which any of the articles named * * * are manufactured, altered, repaired, or finished, or in process thereof, he shall affix to such articles the label prescribed * * * and immediately report to the local board of health, who shall disinfect such article if necessary, and thereupon remove such label. If the factory inspector finds that infectious or contagious diseases exist in "tenement workshops," or that goods used therein are unfit for use he shall report to the local board of health, and such board shall issue such orders as the public health may require. Such board may condemn and destroy all such infected article or articles manufactured or in the process of manufacture under unclean or unhealthful conditions." Owners, lessees, or agents of tenements "shall not permit the use thereof for the manufacture, repair, alteration, or finishing of any of the articles mentioned in this article contrary to its provisions. If a room or apartment * * * be so unlawfully used, the factory inspector shall serve a notice thereof upon such owner, lessee, or agent. Unless such owner, lessee, or agent shall cause such unlawful manufacture to be discontinued within thirty days after the service of such notice, or within fifteen days thereafter institutes and faithfully prosecutes proceedings for the dispossession of the occupant * * * who unlawfully manufactures, repairs, alters, or finishes such articles * * * he shall be deemed guilty of a violation of this article."

The law has worked admirably. From the time that it went into effect—September 1, 1899—according to the records of the New York bureau of factory inspection, up to September 30, 1903, the date of the issuance of the last annual report of that bureau, the efficiency of the act in interfering with sweat shops was fully illustrated by the fact that altogether 10,439 licenses were refused to applicants because of the insanitary condition of their living rooms or of other parts of the buildings, while 3,814 licenses were revoked for similar reasons. These latter house shops doubtless would now be in operation were it not for this law and the strict manner of its execution. In the time above mentioned there were 1,901 instances where goods were tagged in tenement workrooms wherein the law had been violated, and a large number of prosecutions and convictions have resulted from its enforcement. At the close of last September there were in New York State 30,890 licensed work places, which have undergone at least one critical inspection each year.

AMENDMENTS TO THE FACTORY ACT.

The following amendments to the factory act were approved by Governor Roosevelt in 1899:

Protecting employees at work on buildings.—When hoisting apparatus is used within a building in course of construction, contractors or owners shall cause the shafts or openings in each floor to be inclosed by a barrier at least 8 feet in height; and if a building be five stories or more in height, no lumber nor timber shall be hoisted on the outside of such building.

Regulating working time of females.—No female shall be employed in a factory before 6 a. m. and after 9 p. m., nor be required to work more than sixty hours per week.

Stairways to be properly lighted.—Stairways leading to workrooms shall be properly lighted, such lights to be independent of the motive power of a factory.

Prohibiting the operation of dangerous machinery by children.—Children under 16 years of age shall not be permitted to operate or assist in operating dangerous machines of any kind.

Women and male minors not permitted to work on polishing or buffing wheels.—No male child under 18 years of age nor any female shall be employed in operating polishing or buffing wheels.

Boiler inspection.—Directing the factory inspector to inspect boilers in factories in localities where no local laws prevail on the subject.

MECHANICS' LIENS.

During the legislative session of 1899 Governor Roosevelt affixed his signature to two measures amending the lien law. One of these amendatory acts provided that a lien for labor done shall continue for three months, unless an order be made by a court of record to continue it for a period not exceeding six months, upon the application of a lienor, and said court may grant a new order continuing the lien in each succeeding six months if in its discretion it shall be deemed just and equitable. This amendment was "declared to be a remedial statute, and is to be construed liberally to secure the beneficial interests and purposes thereof."

The other amendment included the mining of cement stone and the quarrying or cutting of limestone in the provision relating to liens for labor performed in quarrying, dressing, and cutting stone.

QUARTERLY LABOR BULLETINS.

To enable the bureau of labor statistics to properly disseminate the results of its investigations, Governor Roosevelt in 1899 approved a measure which provided the means for the compiling and publishing of quarterly bulletins by that bureau.

OTHER LABOR LEGISLATION APPROVED IN 1899.

Other labor legislation approved by Governor Roosevelt in 1899 was as follows:

Registration of laborers for municipal employment.—This was an amendment to the civil-service law, and stipulated that vacancies in the labor class in cities, which embrace unskilled laborers and such skilled laborers as are not included in the competitive or noncompetitive class, shall be filled by appointment from lists of applicants registered by municipal commissions, preference in employment from such lists to be given according to date of application.

Licensing of stationary engineers in Buffalo.—Prohibiting any person not duly licensed under such regulations as the Buffalo common council may prescribe from running any steam stationary engine. A marine engineer holding a United States license, on presenting the same to an examiner appointed for the purpose, shall be given a written examination, and if found qualified shall be granted a stationary engineer's license, but such marine engineer must be a resident of that city for three years before making such application, and is required to be a citizen of the United States.

Examination and registration of horseshoers.—Amending the law so as to apply its provisions to all cities of the State instead of to those of the first and second classes, as formerly. This article provides for a board of examiners, consisting of a veterinarian, two master horseshoers, and two journeymen horseshoers, who shall hold sessions in the several cities for the purpose of examining applicants desiring to practice as master or journeymen horseshoers. A person is not qualified to take such examination unless he has served an apprenticeship at horseshoing for at least three years. If he is shown to be qualified, the board shall issue to him a certificate stating his name and residence, the date of examination, when and where his apprenticeship was served, and that he is qualified to practice his trade.

TENEMENT-HOUSE REFORM.

Tenement-house conditions in the congested districts of New York City had become so dreadful that Governor Roosevelt felt impelled in 1900 to appeal to the legislature to take action toward remedying the evil effects of the system and in the interest of the dwellers in the dark and poorly ventilated rooms of these houses, in which the health of the occupants was also menaced by foul cellars, airshafts, and courts, arising from the accumulation of filth. He dwelt as follows upon the subject in his annual message:

I urge that the legislature give particular attention to the need of reform in the laws governing the tenement houses. The tenement-house commission of 1894 declared that, in its opinion, the tenement-house laws needed to be revised as often as once in five years, and I am confident that the improvements in building materials and construction of tenements and the advance in sanitary legislation all demand further modification of existing laws. Probably the best course to follow would be to appoint a commission to present a revised code of tenement-house laws.

As a consequence of the foregoing recommendation a bill to create a tenement-house commission was introduced, and so necessary was immediate legislative interference deemed by the governor that he sent to the legislature the following emergency message recommending the passage of the measure:

There is before you a measure for the establishment of a tenement-house commission to look into the whole subject of the proper construction of tenement houses in the congested districts of our great cities of the first class. I earnestly hope that this bill may be enacted into law. It is probable that there is not and has not been before your body a measure of more real importance to the welfare of those who are least able to protect themselves and whom we should especially guard from the effects of their own helplessness and from the rapacity of those who would prey upon them.

There was held this year in New York a tenement-house exhibition, showing by maps and models the dreadful conditions which we are now striving to remedy, and the shape that the remedy shall take. One of the most striking features at this exhibit was the series of charts which showed the way in which disease, crime, and pauperism increased almost in geometrical proportion as the conditions of tenement-house life became worse—that is, as to overcrowding are added the evils of want of air, of light, of cleanliness, of comfort; in short, of all the decencies of life. These decencies are of course indispensable if good citizenship is to be made possible. The tenement house, in its worse shape, is a festering sore in the civilization of our great cities. We can not be excused if we fail to cut out this ulcer, and our failure will be terribly avenged, for by its presence it inevitably poisons the whole body, politic and social. At present in New York the conditions are in some respects worse, not better, than they were a few years ago, because now the authorities permit the erection of huge buildings, which, though less disreputable in appearance than the old tenement houses, are, because of their immense mass and inferior light and air shafts, worse from a hygienic standpoint.

Two classes of people are interested in perpetrating the present infamous conditions, viz, the class that owns the tenement houses and the class that builds them. The best owners and the best builders do not desire to perpetuate these conditions, but it is imperative to protect them from the competition of their less conscientious rivals.

Against this concrete and mercenary hostility to the needed reform we can marshal only the general sentiment for decent and cleanly living and for fair play to all our citizens. Too often the sufferer himself is dumb either because he can not express himself or because he does not know what remedy to advocate. In his interest, and in the interest of all our people, above all in the interest ot the State, whose standard of citizenship in the future is partly dependent upon the housing of children in the tenement-house districts of the present, we should see to the improvement of the conditions which now make the congested districts of our great cities a blot on our civilization. Great good was accomplished by the tenement-house commission appointed under a similar bill a few years ago. This good is now in part being nullified, and a new commission is urgently needed.

The bill passed, and Governor Roosevelt appointed representative citizens on the commission, which included sociologists, philanthropists, architects, builders, real estate owners and agents, a prominent labor leader in the building trades, and men who had been connected with the New York City health, building, and fire departments. The commission's report, which was submitted in 1901, accompanied by a bill proposing important changes in the methods of tenement-house construction, was a valuable document covering all sides of the housing problem. It reported that the worst feature of the New York tenement house was lack of air and light, which was directly responsible for the undue prevalence of tuberculosis, medical experts having testified that the number of deaths from that disease reached 8,000 annually and that one-third of these lives might be saved by providing a type of tenement house with sufficient light and ventilation. Another constant source of danger was the narrow air shaft, which acted as a flue in the spread of tenement-house fires and contagious diseases; and as most of the bedroom windows opened upon these air shafts, it was impossible to preserve privacy in a family which occupied rooms opposite those of another family.

Professional vice was found to exist in many tenements, being largely due to the irresponsibility of landlords. The findings of the commission impressed practical legislators, who succeeded in having the major part of their recommendations enacted into law. This act provides for the establishment of a tenement-house department in New York City, to which shall be submitted all plans for tenement houses, and whose approval must be obtained before such buildings can be occupied after completion, and also requires the appointment of a large corps of inspectors so that existing dwellings may be kept under surveillance.

The law diminishes the proportion of ground to be built over, and by thus increasing the unoccupied space on lots enlarges the amount of light and air that reaches dwellers, abolishes narrow air shafts, requires open courts, provides that rooms must open either upon an inner or outer court or upon the street or a yard (this also applying to public hallways); that in existing dwellings wooden panels in doors must be replaced with glass, or a suitable window shall be placed at the end of the hall leading to the outer air; that lights shall be kept burning all night upon the first and second floors of public hallways, and from sunset to 10 p. m. upon other floors; that there shall be a separate water-closet for each family; that courts, cellars, halls, and stairways shall be maintained free of rubbish and filth; prescribes how fire escapes shall be constructed and where they shall be located; stipulates that every disorderly woman residing in a tenement is to be treated as a vagrant and upon conviction committed to jail for a period of not more than six months, and any tenement house that shelters such disorderly person is liable to a penalty of $1,000, which becomes a lien upon the house and lot.

Besides structural changes in numerous old buildings, making them more suitable for human habitation, hundreds of new style tenements have been constructed under the act, and from their occupants' view point these new houses have proved entirely satisfactory, insuring for the first time to many tenants a sufficiency of air and light as well as sanitary conveniences. When it is considered that in a single year the tenement-house department made 269,691 inspections and recorded 138,270 violations of the statute, it is quite evident that the act has accomplished all that its promoters claimed for it, for these systematic inspections have produced decided improvements in housing conditions, resulting in the betterment of sanitary arrangements, thereby lessening the amount of sickness, and causing a decrease in the city's death rate. Another important outcome of the rigid enforcement of the tenement-house law has been the suppression of professional vice in these dwelling places.

SHORTENING THE WORKING HOURS OF DRUG CLERKS.

Steadfast in his purpose to give some relief to overworked drug clerks, Governor Roosevelt in 1900 called the attention of the legislature to the matter in the words following:

Owing to defects in the drug clerks' bill presented last year I was unable to sign it. I am, however, in hearty sympathy with the objects sought in the bill. I trust that a satisfactory bill may be presented this year and shall be glad to give such a bill my approval.

Upon this recommendation the senate and assembly passed "an act for the regulation of the working hours of pharmacists and drug clerks in cities of 1,000,000 or more inhabitants," and it received the governor's approval.

Under its provisions pharmacists or drug clerks shall not be required nor permitted to work more than seventy hours per week; that—

Nothing in this section shall prohibit them working six hours overtime during any week, for the purpose of making a shorter succeeding week: Provided, however, That the aggregate number of hours in any such two weeks shall not exceed one hundred and thirty-six hours. The working hours per day shall be consecutive, allowing one hour for each meal. The hours shall be so arranged that an employee shall be entitled to and shall receive at least one full day off in two consecutive weeks. No proprietor of any drug store shall require or permit any clerk to sleep in any room or apartment in or connected with such store which does not comply with the sanitary regulations of the local board of health.

Failure to comply with the provisions of the act is deemed a misdemeanor.

SEATS FOR WAITRESSES IN HOTELS AND RESTAURANTS.

Approval was given by Governor Roosevelt in 1900 to a measure which required every person employing waitresses in a hotel or restaurant to "provide and maintain suitable seats for the use of such female employees, and permit the use thereof by such employees to such an extent as may be reasonable for the preservation of their health." To the factory inspector was delegated the power to enforce the provisions of this act.

AIR BRAKES ON FREIGHT TRAINS.

An amendatory act, signed by Governor Roosevelt in 1900, made it unlawful on and after January 1, 1901—

For any railroad or other company to haul or permit to be hauled or used on its line or lines within this State any freight train that has not a sufficient number of cars in it so equipped with continuous power or air brakes that the engineer or the locomotive drawing such train can control its speed without requiring brakemen to use the common hand brake for that purpose. * * * Any railroad or other company hauling or permitting to be hauled on its line or lines any freight train in violation of the provisions of this act shall be liable to a penalty of $100 for each and every violation, to be recovered in an action to be brought by the attorney-general in the name of the people, * * * and it shall be the duty of the board of railroad commissioners of the State to notify the attorney-general of all such violations coming to its notice.

EXTENDING TO OTHER ENGINEERS THE PROVISIONS OF THE LAW LICENSING NEW YORK CITY STATIONARY ENGINEERS—A MISDEMEANOR FOR VIOLATING THE ACT.

In 1890 Governor Roosevelt gave his consent to two amendments to the act relative to the inspection of steam boilers and licenses of stationary engineers in New York City. The first of these, which was chapter 461, provided that "any person who has served as a marine or locomotive engineer or fireman to a locomotive engineer for a period of five years, and shall have been a resident of the State of New York for a period of two years," shall be eligible for examination for a license to act as a stationary engineer.

Chapter 709 was the other amendment, which made it a misdemeanor for "any person or persons violating any provision of this section or of any of its subdivisions."

INCREASING THE SALARIES OF NEW YORK CITY PUBLIC SCHOOL TEACHERS.

So deep was the interest manifested by the New York City public school teachers in the bill to regulate and increase their salaries that on March 14, 1900, Governor Roosevelt sent to the legislature a message certifying to the necessity of the immediate passage of the measure. It met with the approval of both houses and was signed by the governor, who filed with the act a memorandum pointing out that—

Its general purpose is admirable, and the best educators—the men most interested in seeing the public schools of the greater New York put upon a thoroughly efficient basis— * * * most earnestly favor the measure.

The law gave the department of education power to adopt by-laws to establish a uniform schedule of salaries for the teaching staff throughout all the boroughs and prescribed an equal annual increment of salary. It provided that a kindergartner or female teacher of a girls' class other than those teaching grades of the last two years in elementary schools shall, after sixteen years of service, receive not less than $1,240 per annum, and that a female teacher of a girls' class of the grades of the last two years shall, after fifteen years of service, receive not less than $1,320 per annum; that a female teacher of a girls' graduating class, female first assistant, or female vice-principal shall, after ten years of service, receive not less than $1,440 per annum; that a female teacher of a boys' or mixed class shall receive not less than $60 per annum more than a female teacher of a girls' class of corresponding grade and of years of service, and that a female teacher in elementary schools shall receive not less than $600 per annum, nor shall her annual increment be less than $40; that a male teacher of a class of the grades of the last two years shall, after twelve years' service, receive not less than $2,160 per annum; that a male teacher of a graduating class, male first assistant, or male vice-principal shall, after ten years' service, receive not less than $2,400 per year; that a male teacher shall receive not less than $900 a year, nor shall his annual increment be less than $105.

AMENDMENTS TO THE LIEN LAW.

Two amendments to the lien law were approved by Governor Roosevelt in 1900. The first related to building loan contracts, and provided that the same—either with or without the sale of land, and any modification thereof must be in writing and duly acknowledged, and within ten days after its execution be filed in the office of the clerk of the county in which any part of the land is situated, and the same shall not be filed in the register's office of any county.

The second amendment was in regard "to the sale of property retaken by the vender under a contract of conditional sale." This sentence was added to section 116:

Unless such articles are sold within thirty days after the expiration of such period, the vender or his successor in interest may recover of the vender the amount paid on such articles by such vendee or his successor in interest under the contract for the conditional sale thereof.

MUNICIPAL OWNERSHIP OF RAPID-TRANSIT RAILWAYS.

There is now before your body a measure looking toward the securing of rapid transit for the city of New York. I deem it of very great importance that a scheme providing for rapid transit in the city should be passed at the earliest practicable moment. But it is even more important that this scheme should be one which will work for the ultimate benefit of the city. It does not seem to me wise that a franchise of this nature should be given in perpetuity. It would, of course, be best to have it owned by the municipality, although I would point out to the advocates of municipal ownership that it is doubly incumbent upon them to take the most efficient means of rebuking municipal corruption, and of insisting upon a high standard of continuous fidelity to duty among municipal employees. Only if the government of the municipality is honest will it be possible ever to justify fully the workings of municipal ownership.

These sentiments were expressed by Governor Roosevelt in a special message to the legislature, and in 1900 that body passed an amendatory measure, which received the governor's signature, extending the system of municipal construction of rapid-transit railways to any city of over 1,000,000 inhabitants formed by the consolidation of one or more cities and other territory. This amended act also made it lawful for the board of rapid transit railroad commissioners to locate the route of a railroad by tunnel under any river or waters, thus making possible the present extension of the rapid-transit system from the borough of Manhattan, New York City, under the East River to and through a large part of the borough of Brooklyn. The project will, when completed, afford considerable relief to people in the latter borough who live long distances from the centers of commerce and industry, carrying them to and from their homes, far removed from the densely crowded portions of the city, in comfort and in much less time than under the existing inadequate method of conveyance, besides encouraging many who now reside in the congested districts to seek dwelling places in less densely settled sections near the Brooklyn terminal of the new railway.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE WORKINGMAN—PERSONAL EFFORT THE FIRST REQUISITE OF SUCCESS.

The most extended discussion of the condition and interests of workingmen that Mr. Roosevelt has offered since he became President is contained in his address at the New York State Fair on Labor Day, 1903, which is printed elsewhere in this pamphlet. To appreciate his attitude one must read the entire address as well as the following quotations from other addresses and public papers.

Personal effort and the homely, old-fashioned virtues are the first requisites of order and progress in every community. Thus in an address at Kansas City, Mo., May 1, 1903, the President said:

No device that the wit of man can produce, no form of law, no form of association or organization among ourselves, can supply the lack of fundamental virtues, the presence of which has meant a great nation, the absence of which has meant the downfall of any nation since the world began. No smartness, no mere cleverness unaccompanied by the sense of moral responsibility, no governmental scheme, will ever supply the place of adherence to certain fundamental precepts put forth in the Bible and embodied consciously or unconsciously in the code of morals of every great and successful nation from antiquity to modern times. Always in any government, among any people, there are certain forces for evil which take many shapes, but which are rooted in the same base and evil characteristics of the human soul, in the evil of arrogance, in the evil of jealousy, of envy, of hatred, and to some people the appeal is made to yield to one set of evil forces, to some it is made to yield to another set, and the result is equally bad in such case.

The vice of arrogance, the vice of hate, and brutal indifference on the part of those with wealth to those who have none is a shameful and dreadful vice. It is not one whit worse than the vice of rancorous envy, of hatred, and jealousy on the part of those who are not well off for those who are better off. The man who by either practice or precept seeks to give to any man or to withhold from any man any advantage in war, or socially, or in the working of society, or in business because of his wealth or because of his poverty is false to the traditions of this Republic. We do not have to face the tremendous problems with which you of the years from '61 to '65 were brought face to face, but we have problems of our own.

THE PRESIDENT AND TRADES-UNIONISM

While intelligence and character still count as essential elements of success in individuals, there remains room for associated action in large enterprises where the individual is swallowed up in the multitude and personal contact of employer and employee is no longer possible. One of 5,000 wage-workers employed in a factory could never hope to induce the employers to reduce his hours of work from fourteen or sixteen to ten a day, but if all of the 5,000 workmen unite in such a request they may accomplish their object and affect a change so momentous in the lives of workingmen. The fact is that in large-scale production the workman is at a hopeless disadvantage in making an individual bargain with the employer. His only salvation lies in joining his fellow-workmen and making a collective bargain with the employer regarding wages and the conditions under which they shall work. In forming a union and choosing their officers and representatives the workmen are simply following the example of capitalists, who form a corporation and delegate their powers to directors or trustees.

THE NECESSITY OF TRADES UNIONS.

This fact is fully recognized by President Roosevelt in common with the political economists and other leaders of thought at the present time. Thus in his address at Sioux Falls, S. Dak., April 6, 1903, he declared that "much can be done by organization, combination—union among the wage-workers," and went on to explain the change that has come about in modern industry, as follows:

The wage-workers in our cities, like the capitalists in our cities, face totally changed conditions. The development of machinery and the extraordinary change in business conditions have rendered the employment of capital and of persons in large aggregations not merely profitable but often necessary for success, and have specialized the labor of the wage-worker at the same time that they have brought great aggregations of wage-workers together. More and more in our great industrial centers men have come to realize that they can not live as independently of one another as in the old days was the case everywhere and as is now the case in the country districts. Of course, fundamentally, each man will yet find that the chief factor in determining his success or failure in life is the sum of his own individual qualities. He can not afford to lose his individual limitation—his individual will and power, but he can best use that power if for certain objects he unites with his fellows.

Similarly, in his first message to Congress, in 1901, the President declared that "very great good has been and will be accomplished by associations of wage-workers when managed with forethought, and when they combine insistence upon their own rights with law-abiding respect for the rights of others. The display of these qualities in such bodies is a duty to the nation no less than to the associations themselves."

In his second message to Congress, in the year 1902, President Roosevelt elaborated this thought as follows:

This is an era of federation and combination. Exactly as business men find they must often work through corporations, and as it is a constant tendency of these corporations to grow larger, so it is often necessary for laboring men to work in federations, and these have become important factors of modern industrial life. Both kinds of federation, capitalistic and labor, can do much good, and as a necessary corollary they can both do evil.

Opposition to each kind of organization should take the form of opposition to whatever is bad in the conduct of any given corporation or union, not of attacks upon corporations as such nor upon unions as such, for some of the most far-reaching beneficent work for our people has been accomplished through both corporations and unions. Each must refrain from arbitrary or tyrannous interference with the rights of others. Organized capital and organized labor alike should remember that in the long run the interest of each must be brought into harmony with the interest of the general public, and the conduct of each must conform to the fundamental rules of obedience to the law of individual freedom and of justice and fair dealing toward all. Each should remember that in addition to power it must strive after the realization of healthy, lofty, and generous ideals. Every employer, every wage-worker, must be guaranteed his liberty and his right to do as he likes with his property or his labor so long as he does not infringe upon the rights of others.

It is of the highest importance that employer and employee alike should endeavor to appreciate each the view point of the other and the sure disaster that will come upon both in the long run if either grows to take as habitual an attitude of sour hostility and distrust toward the other. Few people deserve better of the country than those representatives both of capital and labor, and there are many such who work continually to bring about a good understanding of this kind, based upon wisdom and upon broad and kindly sympathy between employers and employed. Above all, we need to remember that any kind of class animosity in the political world is, if possible, even more wicked, even more destructive to national welfare, than sectional, race, or religious animosity. We can get good government only on condition that we keep true to the principles upon which this nation was founded, and judge each man, not as a part of a class, but upon his individual merits. All that we have a right to ask of any man, rich or poor, whatever his creed, his occupation, his birthplace, or his residence, is that he shall act well and honorably by his neighbor and by his country. We are neither for the rich man as such nor for the poor man as such; we are for the upright man, rich or poor. So far as the constitutional powers of the National Government touch these matters of general and vital moment to the nation, they should be exercised in conformity with the principles above set forth.

Developing the same thought, President Roosevelt, in his address at Kansas City, Mo., May 1, 1903, said:

In our complex relations of employer and employee, of one class with another class, of one section with another section, we can work out a really successful result only if those brought together make an honest effort each to understand his neighbor's viewpoint, and then an honest effort while working for his own interest to avoid working to the detriment of his neighbor. That is so obvious a truth that it is trite, but we need to act on it just the same. We need to act upon it, above all, in our industrial relations one with another. You are not going to make any new commandments at this stage which will supply the place of the old ones; the truths that were true at the foot of Mount Sinai are true now; the truths that were true when the Golden Rule was promulgated are true now.

Each man must work for himself. If he does not, there is no use of anyone working for him. Each man must work for himself, and each man must endeavor to do his best to get ahead for his own sake, for his wife and children, for those dependent upon him; but each man must work for himself with the full recognition of his duty to his neighbor or in the end he will bring disaster not merely to his neighbor, but to himself also. A wrong done is just as much a wrong if it is done by the little man against the big man as by the big man against the little man. It is just as much wrong if done by the capitalist to the laborer as by the laborer to the capitalist, and the man is no real friend of his country, no real friend of any set of people in the country, if he appeals to those people only from the standpoint of asking them to see that they get their full share and omits to ask them to remember to do full justice to others also. In the long run the wage-worker and capitalist will go down in common ruin if each does not honestly try to get on with and do justice to the other.

ELECTED TO HONORARY MEMBERSHIP BY THE BROTHERHOOD OF LOCOMOTIVE FIREMEN.

In September, 1902, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, assembled in annual convention at Chattanooga, Tenn., conferred upon President Roosevelt the degree of grand honorary membership, as indicated in the following report of the proceedings:

John F. McNorrell, of Columbus, Ohio, one of the grand officers, and a Democratic member of the legislature, moved that the degree of grand honorary membership be conferred upon President Roosevelt. The motion was referred to the committee on constitution and by-laws, whose recommendation was unanimous that the motion be adopted. The report of the committee was adopted by a unanimous rising vote amid great cheers.

The President thanked the convention for the compliment paid him, and Grand Master Sargent then gave him a pass which admits him to all meetings of the Brotherhood.

The President, in addressing the convention, declared that "organization is one of the laws of our social and economic development at this time. I believe emphatically in organized labor."

UNION LABOR IN GOVERNMENT WORK.

In his first message to Congress, in 1901, President Roosevelt recommended that "provision be made to render the enforcement of the eight-hour law easy and certain," and also that the Government should provide in its contracts that all work for it should be done under "fair" conditions.

By this expression it is understood that the President meant that no contract should be given or no contractor employed by the Government who would not agree to pay the union scale of wages; in other words, no contractor should, in any way, be allowed to obtain a contract from the Government by lessening the price paid the employees for their labor to a point less than the "fair" or union scale of wages or by working more than the usual number of hours per day which had been fixed for the trade.

While thus favoring the union standard of wages and hours in Government work the President recognizes the illegality of any discrimination for or against members of a union. Thus in the case of William A. Miller, who complained that he was removed from his position of assistant foreman in the Government Printing Office, in violation of the civil-service law, because he had been expelled from Local Union No. 4, of the International Brotherhood of Bookbinders, the President ordered Miller's reinstatement and explained the rule governing public employment in the following communication to Secretary Cortelyou, in whose charge the President placed the investigation:

OYSTER BAY, N. Y., July 18, 1903.

MY DEAR SECRETARY CORTELYOU: In accordance with the letter of the Civil-Service Commission of July 6, the Public Printer will reinstate Mr. W. A. Miller in his position. Meanwhile I will withhold my final decision of the whole case until I have received the report of the investigation on Miller's second communication, which you notify me has been begun to-day, July 13.

On the face of the papers presented, Miller would appear to have been removed in violation of law. There is no objection to the employees of the Government Printing Office constituting themselves into a union if they so desire, but no rules or resolutions of that union can be permitted to override the laws of the United States, which it is my sworn duty to enforce.

Please communicate a copy of this letter to the Public Printer for his information and that of his subordinates.

Very truly, yours, THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

HON. GEORGE B. CORTELYOU,
Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

OYSTER BAY, N. Y., July 14, 1903.

MY DEAR MR. CORTELYOU: In connection with my letter of yesterday, I call attention to this judgment and award by the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission to its report to me of March 18 last:

"It is adjudged and awarded that no person shall be refused employment or in any way discriminated against on account of membership or nonmembership to any labor organization, and that there shall be no discrimination against or interference with any employee who is not a member of any labor organization by members of such organization."

I heartily approve of this award and judgment by the Commission appointed by me, which itself included a member of a labor union. This Commission was dealing with labor organizations working for private employers. It is, of course, mere elementary decency to require that all the Government Departments shall be handled in accordance with the principle thus clearly and fearlessly enunciated.

Please furnish a copy of this letter both to Mr. Palmer and to the Civil Service Commission for their guidance.

Sincerely, yours, THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

HON. GEORGE B. CORTELYOU,
Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. Palmer, the Public Printer, on Wednesday, July 16, notified Mr. Miller that he had been reinstated and might report for duty any day.

On September 29, 1903, the President gave a hearing to members of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor on the subject of pending labor legislation, at which he announced his final decision in the Miller case and at the same time explained his preference for the "union shop" in private employment. The president of the American Federation of Labor in an address, issued on the succeeding day, to organized labor of America thus described President Roosevelt's attitude:

Replying to statements on the subject, President Roosevelt set forth that in his decision he had nothing in mind but a strict compliance with Federal, including civil service, law and that he recognized a difference between employment by the Government, circumscribed by those laws, and any other form of employment, and that his decision in the Miller case should not be understood to have any other effect or influence than affecting direct employment by the Government in accordance therewith. He furthermore made plain that in any form of employment excepting that so circumscribed he believed the full employment of union men was preferable either to non-union or open shops.

Following is the official account of the hearing:

SEPTEMBER 29, 1903.

Pursuant to the request of Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, the President granted an interview this evening to the following members of the executive council of that body: Mr. Samuel Gompers, Mr. James Duncan, Mr. John Mitchell, Mr. James O'Connell, and Mr. Frank Morrison, at which various subjects of legislation in the interests of labor, as well as Executive action, were discussed. Concerning the case of William A. Miller, the President made the following statement:

"I thank you and your committee for your courtesy, and I appreciate the opportunity to meet with you. It will always be a pleasure to see you or any representatives of your organizations or of your federation as a whole.

"As regards the Miller case, I have little to add to what I have already said. In dealing with it I ask you to remember that I am dealing purely with the relation of the Government to its employees. I must govern my action by the laws of the land, which I am sworn to administer and which differentiate any case in which the Government of the United States is a party from all other cases whatsoever. These laws are enacted for the benefit of the whole people, and can not and must not be construed as permitting discrimination against some of the people. I am President of all the people of the United States, without regard to creed, color, birthplace, occupation, or social condition. My aim is to do equal and exact justice as among them all. In the employment and dismissal of men in the Government service I can no more recognize the fact that a man does or does not belong to a union, as being for or against him, than I can recognize the fact that he is a Protestant or a Catholic, a Jew or a Gentile, as being for or against him.

"In the communications sent me by various labor organizations protesting against the retention of Miller in the Government Printing Office the grounds alleged are twofold: First, that he is a nonunion man; second, that he is not personally fit. The question of his personal fitness is one to be settled in the routine of administrative detail, and can not be allowed to conflict with or to complicate the larger question of governmental discrimination for or against him or any other man because he is or is not a member of a union. This is the only question now before me for decision, and as to this my decision is final."

In the foregoing statement of policy President Roosevelt merely reiterated his well-known conviction that the law must be administered with absolutely no discrimination. Thus, in his address at Butte, Mont., May 27, 1903, he declared that—

The law is no respecter of persons. The law is to be administered neither for the rich man nor for the poor man as such. It is to be administered for every man, rich or poor, if he is an honest and law-abiding citizen, and it is to be invoked against any man, rich or poor, who violates it, without regard to which end of the social scale he may stand, without regard to whether his offense takes the form of greed and cunning or the form of physical violence. In either case, if he violates the law, the law is to be invoked against him, and in so invoking it I have the right to challenge the support of all good citizens and to demand the acquiescence of every good man. I hope I shall have it; but, once for all, I wish it understood that even if I did not have it, I would enforce the law anyhow.

CUNNING AS WELL AS FORCE MUST BE SHACKLED.

In his recognition of unsocial and illegal action through cunning, President Roosevelt differs from those critics of workingmen who see crime in every act of intimidation or physical violence that occurs in the course of a strike or lockout, but fail to recognize the lawlessness of the men who obtain special privileges from legislatures and municipal councils or evade the payment of their just taxes. Thus, in an address at the Buffalo Independent Club, May 5, 1899, Governor Roosevelt declared that—

The rich man who gets a privilege through the legislature by bribery and corruption for any corporation is committing an offense against the community which it is possible may some day have to be condoned in blood and destruction, not by him, not by his sons, but by you and your sons.

And while the lawlessness of greed and cunning may lead to anarchy as surely as lawless physical violence, "it is far more difficult to deal with, but the effort to deal with it must be steadily made," as the President said in his Sioux Falls address, April 6, 1903.

But while fearlessly pointing out the lawless acts committed by a few rich men and by a few poor men, President Roosevelt does not join in the lamentations of those who despair of government by the people. On the contrary, he deprecates the fostering of hostility between classes. Speaking at Kansas City, Mo., May 1, 1903, of the wonderful industrial growth of the country under the leadership of able business men, he said:

Let us think carefully before by any act of folly on our part we destroy what has thus so marvelously been built up. It is easy enough to pull down. It is not so easy to rebuild or replace, and let us take serious thought from the history of the republics of old and avoid the rocks on which they foundered, and the chief rock, the chief danger in the path of the older republics, of the republics of antiquity and the republics of the middle ages, the chief danger came from the growth and encouragement of anything in the nature of fostered hostility. It will be an evil day for us when we let ourselves be persuaded to try to make this a government especially designed to help any one class save as that class includes its proportion of honest, thrifty, hard-working, decent-behaving citizens.

And it will be only a less evil day when any considerable portion of our people fail to remember that the object of this Government is to do justice, not to favor the rich man as such nor to discriminate against him as such; not to favor the poor man as such nor to discriminate against him as such, but to favor every man, rich or poor, if he is honest and behaves himself toward the State and his neighbors.

And, further, at Butte, Mont., May 27, 1903, he said:

This is not and never shall be a Government of a plutocracy; it is not and never shall be a Government by a mob. It is, as it has been and as it will be, a Government in which every honest man, every decent man, be he employer or employed, wage-worker, mechanic, banker, farmer, lawyer, be he who he may, if he acts squarely and fairly, if he does his duty by his neighbor and the State, receives the full protection of the law and is given the amplest chance to exercise the ability there is within him, alone or in combination with his fellows, as he desires.

THE POLICY OF STATE INTERVENTION.

While wage-workers have greatly improved their condition by uniting in fraternal organizations like trade unions, experience shows that such cooperation is not adequate to remove all the faults inherent in modern industrial relations. To stop child labor and regulate the work of women in the factories, for example, has always been regarded as the duty of the entire community and not the peculiar function of trade unions. The fact is that the very existence of trade unions depends upon the prevalence of a relatively high standard of life, which can only be secured by the action of the people through their constituted representatives.

Thus there is no cooperation among the garment makers of the sweat shops until government regulation and inspection have aided them in rising out of the degradation of their former homes in foreign countries and the slums of our cities. State intervention is therefore called for on the principle of equalizing opportunities. It does not abolish competition, which still remains the fundamental condition of social progress, but it raises competition to a higher level. Employer may still freely compete with employer in providing attractive commodities and in reducing their cost by inventing or introducing improved machinery and methods of production, but no employer may undersell his rival by using cheap child labor or otherwise exploiting the weakness or ignorance of the poor. The law thus favors the humane employer by protecting him from the competition of the inhumane employer. In President Roosevelt's own words:

PRINCIPLES OF STATE INTERFERENCE.

It is not possible empirically to declare when the interference of the State should be deemed legitimate and illegitimate. The line of demarcation between unhealthy overinterference and unhealthy lack of regulation is not always well defined and shifts with the change in our industrial needs. Most certainly we should never invoke the interference of the State or nation unless it is absolutely necessary, but it is equally true that where confident of its necessity we should not on academic grounds refuse it. Wise factory laws, laws to forbid the employment of child labor and to safeguard the employees against the effects of culpable negligence by the employer, are necessary not merely in the interest of the wage-worker, but in the interest of the honest and humane employer, who should not be penalized for his honesty and humanity by being exposed to unchecked competition with an unscrupulous rival.

In considering any proposed legislation in favor of wage-workers or others, the criterion should be the welfare of the entire community rather than the benefit of any class, as the President said in his Labor Day address at Syracuse:

Legislation to be permanently good for any class must also be good for the nation as a whole, and legislation which does injustice to any class is certain to work harm to the nation.

And, further, at Butte, Mont., in May, 1903:

The most unsafe adviser to follow is the man who would advise us to do wrong in order that we may benefit by it. That man is never a safe man to follow, but is always the most dangerous of guides. The man who seeks to persuade any of us that our advantage comes in wronging or oppressing another can be depended upon, if opportunity comes, to do wrong to us in his own interest just as he has endeavored to make us in our supposed interest do wrong to others.

THE AMERICAN STANDARD OF LIVING.

Under the American form of government the bulk of the legislation for the protection of wage-workers must be the work of the individual Commonwealths, and when he was governor of New York State Mr. Roosevelt, as has been already indicated, took an active part in promoting such legislation. But the Federal Government can accomplish a great deal for the maintenance of the relatively high standard of comfort that prevails in the United States by excluding the products of cheap foreign labor and also shutting out workmen from lower civilizations who are incapable of rising to the American standard of living. Such competition may be prevented by wise tariff and immigration laws, and on these questions the President expressed himself strongly in his first message to the Fifty-seventh Congress, under the date of December 3, 1901, in the following language:

With the sole exception of the farming interest no one matter is of such vital moment to our whole people as the welfare of the wage-workers. If the farmer and the wage-worker are well off it is absolutely certain that all others will be well off too. It is therefore a matter for hearty congratulation that wages on the whole are higher to-day in the United States than ever before in our history, and far higher than in any other country. The standard of living is also higher than ever before. Every effort of legislator and administrator should be to secure the permanency of this condition of things and its improvement wherever possible. Not only must our labor be protected by the tariff, but it should also be protected as far as possible from the presence in this country of any laborers brought over by contract or of those who, coming freely, yet repressent a standard of living so depressed that they can undersell our men in the labor market and drag them to a lower level. I regard it as necessary, with this end in view, to reenact immediately the law excluding Chinese laborers, and to strengthen it wherever necessary in order to make its enforcement entirely effective.

Our present immigration laws are unsatisfactory. We need every honest and efficient immigrant fitted to become an American citizen, every immigrant who comes here to stay, who brings here a strong body, a stout heart, a good head, and a resolute purpose to do his duty well in every way and to bring up his children as law-abiding and God-fearing members of the community. But there should be a comprehensive law enacted, with the object of working a threefold improvement over our present system. First, we should aim to exclude absolutely not only all persons who are known to be believers in anarchistic principles or members of anarchistic societies, but also all persons who are of a low moral tendency or of unsavory reputation. This means that we should require a more thorough system of inspection abroad and a more rigid system of examination at our immigration ports, the former being especially necessary.

The second object of a proper immigration law ought to be to secure by a careful and not merely perfunctory educational test some intelligent capacity to appreciate American institutions and act sanely as American citizens. This would not keep out all anarchists, for many of them belong to the intelligent criminal class. But it would do what is also in point—that is, tend to decrease the sum of ignorance, so potent in producing the envy, suspicion, malignant passion, and hatred of order, out of which anarchistic sentiment inevitably springs. Finally, all persons should be excluded who are below a certain standard of economic fitness to enter our industrial field as competitors with American labor. There should be proper proof of personal capacity to earn an American living, and enough money to insure a decent start under American conditions. This would stop the influx of cheap labor and the resulting competition which gives rise to so much of bitterness in American industrial life, and it would dry up the springs of the pestilential social conditions in our great cities, where anarchistic organizations have their greatest possibility of growth.

Both the educational and economic tests in a wise immigration law should be designed to protect and elevate the general body politic and social. A very close supervision should be exercised over the steamship companies which mainly bring over the immigrants, and they should be held to a strict accountability for any infraction of the law.

CHINESE-EXCLUSION LAW RENEWED AND EXTENDED TO THE ISLAND TERRITORY.

Acting upon these recommendations, Congress renewed the Chinese-exclusion law and extended it to the island territory, where the system of contract labor had previously existed. This act prohibits the immigration of Chinese laborers from such island territory to the mainland of the United States, and from one portion of said island territory to another portion, but permits their transit from one island to another island of the same group.

A MORE STRINGENT IMMIGRATION LAW.

Congress also enacted, and President Roosevelt approved, a more stringent immigration law, the important amendments being as follows:

(1) Levying a duty of $2 (an increase of $1) for each and every passenger not a citizen of the United States or of the Dominion of Canada, the Republic of Cuba, or of the Republic of Mexico who shall come by vessel from any foreign country to any port within the United States, or by any railway or any other mode of transportation from foreign contiguous territory to the United States.

(2) Excluding from admission epileptics, and persons who have been insane within five years previous, and persons who have had two or more attacks of insanity at any time previously; anarchists or persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all government or of all forms of law or the assassination of public officials.

(3) Providing that skilled labor may be imported if labor of like kind unemployed can not be found in this country.

(4) Any person who shall bring into or land in the United States, or who shall attempt, by himself or through another, to bring into or land here any alien not duly admitted by an immigrant inspector, or not lawfully entitled to enter, shall be liable to punishment by a fine not exceeding $1,000 for each alien so landed or attempted to be landed or by imprisonment for a term not less than three months nor more than two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

(5) Each manifest shall be verified by the signature and the oath or affirmation of the master or commanding officer of a vessel or the first or second below him in command, taken before an immigration officer at the port of arrival, to the effect that he has caused the surgeon of said vessel sailing therewith to make a physical and oral examination of each alien.

(6) Any alien who shall come into the United States in violation of law, or who shall be found a public charge therein, from causes existing prior to landing, shall be deported to the country whence he came at any time within two years after arrival at the expense, including one-half of the cost of inland transportation to the port of deportation, of the person bringing such alien into the United States, or, if that can not be done, then at the expense of the immigrant fund. In case the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall be satisfied that an alien shall be found in the United States in violation of law, he shall cause such alien, within the period of three years after landing, to be taken into custody and returned to the country whence he came, at the expense, including one-half of the cost of inland transportation to the port of deportation, of the person bringing such alien to this country, or, if that can not be so done, at the expense of the immigrant fund, and neglect or refusal on the part of the masters, agents, owners, or consignees of vessels to comply with the order of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to take on board, guard safely, and return to the country whence he came, shall be punished by the imposition of penalties prescribed by law.

(7) The Commissioner-General of Immigration, under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, shall prescribe rules for the entry and inspection of aliens along the borders of Canada and Mexico, so as not to unnecessarily delay, impede, or annoy passengers in ordinary travel between the United States and those two countries.

The President has caused the provisions of the act to be so carefully and vigorously enforced by improved methods of administration under Commissioner-General of Immigration Frank P. Sargent, the former grand master of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, that many hundreds of diseased and unfit foreigners seeking entrance to the United States have been deported to their former places of residence.

PUBLIC EMPLOYMENT.

The Government is itself a large employer of labor, and by the force of its example exerts a great influence upon other employers. President Roosevelt in his message to Congress has recommended legislation to establish the eight-hour day and "fair" wages on all public work, whether done by the Government itself or by contractors for the Government. Thus his first message to Congress in 1901 contained the following recommendations:

The National Government should demand the highest quality of service from its employees, and in return it should be a good employer. If possible, legislation should be passed in connection with the interstate commerce law which will render effective the efforts of different States to do away with the competition of convict contract labor in the open labor market. So far as practicable under the conditions of Government work provision should be made to render the enforcement of the eight-hour law easy and certain. In all industries carried on directly or indirectly for the United States Government women and children should be protected from excessive hours of labor, from night work, and from work under unsanitary conditions.

The Government should provide in its contracts that all work should be done under "fair" conditions, and, in addition to setting a high standard, should uphold it by proper inspection, extending, if necessary, to the subcontractors. The Government should forbid all night work for women and children, as well as excessive overtime. For the District of Columbia a good factory law should be passed, and as a powerful indirect aid to such laws, provision should be made to turn the inhabited alleys, the existence of which is a reproach to our capital city, into minor streets, where the inhabitants can live under conditions favorable to health and morals.

PROHIBITING THE EMPLOYMENT OF MONGOLIANS ON IRRIGATION WORKS AND APPLYING THE EIGHT-HOUR LAW TO SUCH PROJECTS.

On June 17, 1902, President Roosevelt approved a measure authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be let contracts for the construction, where practicable, of irrigation works. The act provides that eight hours shall be a day's labor on such projects and prohibits the employment of Mongolians thereon.

ABOLISHING SLAVERY IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

President Roosevelt, on July 1, 1902, approved a bill which provided that "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist" in the Philippine Islands.

The government of the islands is empowered to "grant franchises, privileges, and concessions, including the authority to exercise the right of eminent domain for the construction and operation of works of public utility and service." It is "unlawful for any corporation organized under this act, or for any person, company, or corporation receiving any grant, franchise, or concession from the government of said islands to use, employ, or contract for the labor of persons claimed or alleged to be held in involuntary servitude; and any person, company, or corporation so violating the provisions of this act shall forfeit all charters, grants, franchises, and concessions for doing business in said islands, and in addition shall be deemed guilty of an offense and shall be punished by a fine of not less than $10,000."

MINE REGULATIONS IN TERRITORIES.

Through an amendatory act of Congress, signed by President Roosevelt on July 1, 1902, mine regulations in Territories have been greatly improved. These changes have bettered the sanitary condition of mines, thus insuring the preservation of the health of miners and other employees, besides affording additional protection to life and limb. The amended law requires that—

The owners or managers of every coal mine shall provide an adequate amount of ventilation of not less than 315 cubic feet of pure air per second, or 5,000 cubic feet per minute, for every fifty men at work in said mine, and in like proportion for a greater number, which air shall, by proper appliances or machinery, be forced through such mine to the face of each and every working place, so as to dilute and render harmless and expel therefrom the noxious or poisonous gases. Whenever it is practicable to do so, the entries, rooms, and all openings being operated in coal mines shall be kept well dampened with water to cause the coal dust to settle, and that when water is not obtainable at reasonable cost for this purpose, accumulations of dust shall be taken out of the mine and shall not be deposited in way places in the mine where it would be again distributed in the atmosphere by the ventilating currents.

It is also provided that—

Owners, lessees, operators of, or any other person having the control or management of any coal shaft, drift, slope, or pit in the Indian Territory, employing twenty or more miners to work in the same, shall employ shot firers to fire the shots therein. Said shots shall not be fired to exceed one per day: at 12 o'clock noon in cases where the miners work but half a day, and at 5 o'clock in the evening when the mine is working three-quarters or full time, and they shall not be fired until after all miners and other employees working in said shafts, drifts, slopes, or pits shall be out of same. The violation of this act shall constitute a misdemeanor, and any person convicted of such violation shall pay a fine of not exceeding $500.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR.

President Roosevelt gave his approval on February 14, 1903, to the Congressional bill creating the Department of Commerce and Labor and providing for the appointment by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, of a Secretary of Commerce and Labor, a Cabinet officer. The province and duty of the Department is to foster, promote, and develop the labor interests, the foreign and domestic commerce, the mining, manufacturing, shipping, and fishery industries, and the transportation facilities of the United States; and to this end it is vested with jurisdiction and control of several existing departments, bureaus, offices, and branches of the public service, specified in the statute.

A MODEL LABOR CODE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

While there are not many wage-workers in the District of Columbia to call for legal protection, President Roosevelt realizes that if Congress should enact a good labor code for the District it would be a model for the States and Territories, and, accordingly, in his second message to Congress he renewed his recommendations in favor of such legislation in the following language:

The District of Columbia is the only part of our territory in which the National Government exercises local or municipal functions, and where in consequence the Government has a free hand in reference to certain types of social and economic legislation which must be essentially local or municipal in character. The Government should see to it, for instance, that the hygienic and sanitary legislation affecting Washington is of a high character.

The evils of slum dwellings, whether in the shape of crowded and congested tenement-house districts or of the back-alley type, should never be permitted to grow up in Washington. The city should be a model in every respect for all the cities of the country. The charitable and correctional systems of the District should receive consideration at the hands of Congress to the end that they may embody the results of the most advanced thought in these fields. Moreover, while Washington is not a great industrial city, there is some industrialism here, and our labor legislation, while it would not be important in itself, might be made a model for the rest of the nation. We should pass, for instance, a wise employers' liability act for the District of Columbia, and we need such an act in our navy-yards. Railroad companies in the District ought to be required by law to block their frogs.

LICENSING EMPLOYMENT OFFICES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

When he was governor of New York, Mr. Roosevelt called the attention of the legislature to the fact that "abuses have occurred in connection with the employment offices in the larger cities, which are now allowed to violate the law with impunity, the power of punishment lying with the local authorities." He therefore recommended the enactment of legislation requiring the keeper of any employment office to procure a license on the payment of a substantial fee, thus restricting the business to responsible parties and keeping it under the control of the State administration. As President, to insure Government supervision of employment agencies in the District of Columbia, he, on July 1, 1902, approved a measure which provides that "proprietors or owners of intelligence offices, information bureaus, registries, or employment offices, by whatsoever named called, shall pay a license tax of $10 per annum."

EXEMPTING FROM TAXATION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA HOUSEHOLD EFFECTS TO THE VALUE OF $1,000, WEARING APPAREL, LIBRARIES, BOOKS, ETC.

According to a bill to which President Roosevelt affixed his signature on July 1, 1902, the following personal property is exempt from taxation in the District of Columbia: Household and other belongings, not held for sale, to the value of $1,000, owned by the occupant of any dwelling house or other place of abode in which such household and other belongings may be located; also, libraries, schoolbooks, wearing apparel, articles of personal adornment, all family portraits, and heirlooms.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY LAW.

President Roosevelt has always expressed himself in favor of employers' liability laws under which workingmen suffering injury through the negligence of the employer or his agents might recover compensation for his injuries. While governor of New York he recommended the enactment of such a law, and in the preceding paragraph he recommended similar legislation for the protection of workmen employed in the Government navy-yards, as well as for the District of Columbia, and in fact wherever the jurisdiction of the United States is supreme. Many accidents would never occur if the employer had to compensate employees injured without fault of their own, as is required in most European countries.

SAFETY-APPLIANCE LAWS.

Another way in which workingmen may be protected from accidents is by requiring the employer to safeguard machinery. Federal legislation along this line has been restricted to transportation companies engaged in interstate commerce.

On March 2, 1893, the safety-appliance law, or the "car-coupler bill," as it is sometimes called, was passed by Congress. The main purpose of this legislation was protection for the lives and limbs of railway employees, and it has proved vastly beneficial to this class of wage-workers. The reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission show that in 1893, the year in which the law was passed, the casualties to railway employees, due to coupling and uncoupling cars, numbered 11,710 (433 deaths and 11,277 injuries), while in 1902, the first full year of the law's operation, the casualties numbered but 2,256 (143 deaths and 2,113 injuries), a decrease of more than 9,000 in the annual number of casualties of this character, notwithstanding that in 1902 there were over 20,000 more men at risk than there were in 1893.

The adoption of these appliances has also been of much benefit to the railroads, independently of their effect in adding to the safety of life and limb. Had it not been for the general adoption of automatic couplers and air brakes on freight trains it would have been impossible for the railroads during recent years to have met the wonderfully increased demands of traffic, as they have been met by the use of vastly heavier and more powerful locomotives, more capacious cars, and longer and infinitely heavier trains—trains that certainly could not have been safely handled with the appliances in general use when the law was enacted.

However, as has been the case with almost all laws of this character, experience disclosed certain defects in the law and showed that it was impossible to obtain the full benefit contemplated by the framers of the law without the enactment of certain amendments which were proposed. The President took a most active interest in this matter, calling attention to it in his message to Congress under date of December 2, 1902, as follows:

> The safety-appliance law for the better protection of the lives and limbs of railway employees, which was passed in 1893, went into full effect on August 1, 1901. It has resulted in averting thousands of casualties. Experience shows, however, the necessity of additional legislation to perfect this law. A bill to provide for this passed the Senate at the last session. It is to be hoped that some such measure may now be enacted into law.

The President rendered invaluable assistance in furthering the passage of the amended law, which finally passed both Houses of Congress and received the President's approval on March 2, 1903.

The necessity for this legislation had become imperative owing to a decision of the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit, which held:

(1) That the law did not require that locomotives or their tenders should be equipped with automatic couplers.

(2) That a car, having completed an interstate journey and laying over at a local point for the purpose of renewing or starting upon another interstate journey, was not in use in interstate traffic while so laying over, and in any event an empty car could not be considered as being used in interstate traffic.

(3) That if cars were equipped with automatic couplers which would couple automatically with other couplers of the same kind or type, the law had been complied with, that it was not necessary that cars should be equipped with couplers that would couple automatically with another make of coupler which might be adopted by another road.

The decision defeated the main purpose of the law—the establishment of uniformity and interchangeability of couplers all over the country.

The amended law removes all ambiguity concerning the points covered by the decision of the circuit court of appeals and cures the defects which Judge Sanborn deduced from the wording of the original law, besides adding other important provisions calculated to increase the safety of employees.

The original act applied to cars and trains used in moving interstate traffic, while the amended act applies to any common carrier engaged in interstate commerce by railroad in the Territories and the District of Columbia, its language being as follows:

> And shall apply in all cases, whether or not the couplers brought together are of the same kind, make, or type, and the provisions and requirements hereof and of said acts relating to train brakes, automatic couplers, grab irons, and the height of drawbars, shall be held to apply to all trains, locomotives, tenders, cars, and similar vehicles used on any railroad engaged in interstate commerce, and in the Territories and the District of Columbia, and to all other locomotives, cars, and similar vehicles used in connection therewith, excepting those trains, cars, and locomotives exempted by the provisions of section 6 of said act of March 2, 1893, as amended by the act of April 1, 1896, or which are used upon street railways.

It will thus be seen that under the amended law it is not necessary that a particular car or train be used in interstate commerce to bring it under the provisions of the law, but merely that the road itself be engaged in handling interstate traffic. Locomotives, tenders, snowplows, caboose cars, and all similar vehicles are also brought under the operation of the law. The law also requires that all trains on roads engaged in interstate commerce shall have at least 50 per cent of the cars in each train equipped with power or train brakes, and such brakes shall be used and operated by the engineer of the locomotive hauling such train, and the Interstate Commerce Commission may increase this minimum percentage on any road from time to time, after full hearing, as the circumstances and conditions of traffic may seem to require, the object being to do away with the necessity for men to traverse the tops of rapidly moving trains in all sorts of weather for the purpose of controlling their speed by means of the hand brakes.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE COAL STRIKE OF 1902.

The President has frequently emphasized the need of more sympathy between employers and employees and deprecated the cultivation of class feeling with its resulting antagonisms.

Very much of our effort in reference to labor matters—

He said at Sioux Falls in April, 1903—> should be by every device and expedient to try to secure a constantly better understanding between employer and employee. Everything possible should be done to increase the sympathy and fellow-feeling between them, and every chance taken to allow each to look at all questions, especially at questions in dispute, somewhat through the other's eyes.

> If met with a sincere desire to act fairly by one another, and if there is, furthermore, power by each to appreciate the other's standpoint, the chance for trouble is minimized. I suppose every thinking man rejoices when by mediation or arbitration it proves possible to settle troubles in time to avert the suffering and bitterness caused by strikes. Moreover, a conciliation committee can do best work when the trouble is in its beginning, or at least has not come to a head. When the break has actually occurred, damage has been done, and each side feels sore and angry, and it is difficult to get them together, difficult to make either forget its own wrongs and remember the rights of the other. If possible, the effort of conciliation or mediation or arbitration should be made in the earlier stages, and should be marked by the wish on the part of both sides to try to come to a common agreement, which each shall think in the interest of the other as well as of itself.
> When we deal with such a subject we are fortunate in having before us an admirable object lesson in the work that has just been closed by the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission. This was the commission which was appointed last fall, at the time when the coal strike in the anthracite regions threatened our nation with a disaster second to none which has befallen us since the days of the civil war. Their report was made just before the Senate adjourned at the special session, and no Government document of recent years marks a more important piece of work better done, and there is none which teaches sounder social morality to our people. The commission consisted of seven as good men as were to be found in the country, representing the bench, the church, the Army, the professions, the employers, and the employed. They acted as a unit and the report which they unanimously signed is a masterpiece of sound common sense and of sound doctrine on the very questions with which our people should most deeply concern themselves. The immediate effect of this commission's appointment and action was of vast and incalculable benefit to the nation, but the ultimate effect will be even better if capitalists, wage-worker, and lawmaker alike will take to heart and act upon the lessons set forth in the report they have made.

The appointment of this commission, which resulted in the termination of the great coal strike of 1902, is perhaps President Roosevelt's most widely known and generally appreciated contribution toward the improvement of industrial relations. When the efforts of all other peacemakers had come to naught and the coal famine remained unbroken at the near approach of winter, Mr. Roosevelt, as a representative American citizen, pleaded with the operators and miners to terminate their dispute and resume the mining of coal. Public opinion supported his action so strongly that both sides to the dispute agreed to resume work and leave to a commission to be appointed by the President the determination of the conditions of employment concerning which they had been unable to agree. The President's commission not only adjusted the dispute in the coal regions, but in so doing formulated principles of very general application to the organization of industry at the present time. The immediate effect of the commission's appointment was, as the President has himself stated, "of vast and incalculable benefit to the nation, but the ultimate effect will be even better if capitalist, wage-worker, and lawmaker alike will take to heart and act upon the lessons set forth in the report" of the commission. The coal industry is typical of all the great industries of to-day that are organized on the principle of large-scale production, and its treatment of the labor problem is therefore highly illuminative.

ORIGIN OF THE STRIKE.

Under the influence of a vast stream of immigration of Poles, Hungarians, and Slavs into the coal regions during the last two or three decades wages had steadily declined. The American miners saw their own standard of living threatened by the lower standards brought from central Europe unless they could induce these newcomers to unite with them in an effort to put an end to the incessant underbidding for employment. In 1897 they brought their organization, the United Mine Workers, to such a state of perfection that it dominated the labor situation in the bituminous regions and met the employers' associations on an equality in the annual settlement of the terms of employment. In 1899 the organization spread to the anthracite regions and the next year was able to secure a 10 per cent advance in wages, after a comparatively short strike that was supported as heartily by the miners outside the union as by the minority at that time in the union.

As a consequence of this triumph a vast majority of the miners joined the organization, which thereupon sought to represent the miners in making terms with the employers' agents at annual conferences such as were held with the bituminous operators. The denial of this request by the officers of the mining corporations nearly brought on another strike in 1901, and when early in 1902 a similar request, accompanied with a demand for an advance in wages, etc., was once more denied, industrial peace could no longer be preserved. The operators even refused the union's offer to submit its demands to the arbitration of the National Civic Federation or other arbitrators, and a week later a delegate convention of the anthracite mine workers voted to continue the strike ordered on May 12. In obedience to this decision, says the commission, "nearly the entire body of mine workers, which numbers about 147,000, abandoned their employment and remained idle until the strike was called off by another convention," that is, until October 23, 1902.

ACTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

With the progress of summer and the failure of all mediatory efforts to adjust the differences between the miners and the operators the scarcity of fuel made itself felt. Many factories that were dependent upon anthracite had to shut down, throwing large numbers of working people out of employment, and the famine prices at which coal was sold almost prohibited its use for domestic purposes by the poorer families. As cold weather approached the President felt himself virtually compelled to act in order to avert unexampled distress throughout all eastern communities that depended upon anthracite coal for domestic heating purposes. On October 1 he telegraphed an invitation to the presidents of the five coal railroad companies, a prominent individual operator, and the president of the miners' organization to confer with him "in regard to the failure of the coal supply, which had become a matter of vital concern to the whole nation." To these seven persons, who met the President at the White House on October 3, Mr. Roosevelt said:

I wish to call your attention to the fact that there are three parties affected by the situation in the anthracite trade—the operators, the miners, and the general public. I speak for neither the operators nor the miners, but for the general public. The questions at issue which led to the situation affect immediately the parties concerned—the operators and the miners—but the situation itself vitally affects the public. As long as there seemed to be a reasonable hope that these matters could be adjusted between the parties, it did not seem proper to me to intervene in any way. I disclaim any right or duty to intervene in this way upon legal grounds or upon any official relation that I bear to the situation, but the urgency and the terrible nature of the catastrophe impending over a large portion of our people in the shape of a winter fuel famine impel me, after much anxious thought, to believe that my duty requires me to use whatever influence I personally can to bring to an end a situation which has become literally intolerable. I wish to emphasize the character of the situation and to say that its gravity is such that I am constrained urgently to insist that each one of you realize the heavy burden of responsibility upon him.

We are upon the threshold of winter, with an already existing coal famine, the future terrors of which we can hardly yet appreciate. The evil possibilities are so far-reaching, so appalling, that it seems to me that you are not only justified in sinking, but required to sink for the time being, any tenacity as to your respective claims in the matter at issue between you. In my judgment the situation imperatively requires that you meet upon the common plane of the necessities of the public. With all the earnestness there is in me, I ask that there be an immediate resumption of operations in the coal mines in some such way as will without a day's unnecessary delay meet the crying needs of the people.

I do not invite a discussion of your respective claims and positions. I appeal to your patriotism, to the spirit that sinks personal considerations and makes individual sacrifices for the general good.

At the conclusion of the President's remarks Mr. Mitchell replied as follows:

Mr. President, I am much impressed with what you say. I am impressed with the gravity of the situation. We feel that we are not responsible for this terrible state of affairs. We are willing to meet the gentlemen representing the coal operators to try to adjust our differences among ourselves. If we can not adjust them that way, Mr. President, we are willing that you shall name a tribunal who shall determine the issues that have resulted in this strike; and if the gentlemen representing the operators will accept the award or decision of such a tribunal, the miners will willingly accept it, even if it is against their claims.

The PRESIDENT. Before considering what ought to be done I think it only just to both of you—both sides—and desirable from my standpoint, that you should have time to consider what I have stated as to the reasons for my getting you together, and I shall trespass so far upon your good nature as to ask that this interview cease now and that you come back at 3 o'clock. I should like you to think over what I have stated, not to decide now, but give it careful thought and return at 3 o'clock.

The conference then adjourned until 3 o'clock.

The President then put an end to the interview and asked both parties to think over what he had stated and return in the afternoon. Upon reassembling the operators made long statements of their side of the case; but in reply to the President's inquiry whether they would accept Mr. Mitchell's proposition they answered "No." In response to a further question from the President they stated that they would have no dealings whatever with Mr. Mitchell looking toward a settlement of the question at issue and that they had no other proposition to make, save what was contained in the statement of Mr. Baer, which, in effect, was that if any man chose to resume work and had a difficulty with his employer, both should leave the settlement of the question to the judge of the court of common pleas of the district in which the mine was located.

In view of the growing public demand for the resumption of coal mining, however, the operators reconsidered their refusal to arbitrate their dispute with the miners, and a few days later proposed that it be settled by a commission of five, to be appointed by the President, and to be composed of an officer of the Army or Navy, an expert mining engineer, a United States circuit court judge from Pennsylvania, a sociologist, and a man who had been in the coal business. As the last-mentioned member would come from the ranks of the employers, the miners naturally demanded a modification of the operators' proposition, which should allow them a representative on the Commission.

When the Commission was appointed on October 16 it therefore consisted of six members, and by the subsequent addition of the United States Commissioner of Labor its final composition was as follows: Brig. Gen. John M. Wilson; Edward M. Parker, of the United States Geological Survey; Judge George Gray, of the United States circuit court of the eastern district of Pennsylvania; Bishop John L. Spalding, of the Catholic Church; Thomas H. Watkins, a retired coal operator; Edgar E. Clark, chief of the Order of Railway Conductors, and Hon. Carroll D. Wright. On October 21 a convention of the miners voted to submit all the questions at issue to this Commission and to resume work on October 23. The presidents of the anthracite-coal roads agreed to abide by the decision of the Commission, and in the course of its proceedings the leading independent operators and the nonunion miners also became parties to the arbitration agreement, so that the board's awards, when announced on March 18, 1903, covered virtually the entire anthracite mining industry.

All through their investigations and deliberations the conviction has grown upon the commissioners that if they could evoke and confirm a more genuine spirit of good will, a more conciliatory disposition in the operators and their employees in their relations toward one another, they would do a better and a more lasting work than any which mere rulings, however wise or just, may accomplish. Fairness, forbearance, and good will are the prerequisites of peace and harmonious cooperation in all the social and economic relations of men. The interests of employer and employees are reciprocal. The success of industrial processes is the result of their cooperation, and their attitude toward one another, therefore, should be that of friends, not that of foes; and since those who depend for a livelihood on the labor of their hands bear the heavier burdens and have less opportunity to upbuild their higher being, the men of position and education, for whom they labor, should lead them not more in virtue of their greater ability and capital than in virtue of their greater loving-kindness.

Where production is controlled despotically by capital there may be a seeming prosperity, but the qualities which give sacredness and worth to life are enfeebled or destroyed. In the absence of a trustful and conciliatory disposition the strife between capital and labor can not be composed by laws and contrivances. The causes from which it springs are as deep as man's nature, and nothing that is powerless to illumine the mind and touch the heart can reach the fountain head of the evil. So long as employers and employees continue to look on one another as opponents and antagonists so long shall their relations be unsatisfactory and strained, requiring but a slight thing to provoke the open warfare which is called a strike.

It is in this spirit the commission has made its investigation and submits its report and award, and it is in this spirit the award must be received by all the parties to the submission if it is to have the effect desired by them and by all good citizens.

THE INCREASE OF WAGES.

The four demands of the miners were for an increase of 20 per cent in the piece rates paid to contract miners, the rates to be based on weight of the coal instead of the carload, a reduction of 20 per cent (from ten to eight hours a day) in the hours of labor of workmen employed by the day, and the recognition of the union by the establishment of a joint trade agreement between the representatives of employers and employed. The commission compromised on the matter of wages by awarding an increase of 10 per cent, with additional increases under a sliding-scale system when the market price of coal rose above the existing level; a reduction in hours from ten to nine; the establishment of a joint board of conciliation, representing employers and employed, to decide disputed questions during the life of the award (to March 31, 1906). The advance in wage rates took effect November 1, 1902.

The commission found great difficulty in ascertaining the actual earnings of miners, owing to their irregular employment. It estimated the average annual income of the most highly paid class of employees—the contract miners or skilled hewers of coal—to be about $560. This was in 1901, "a year of unusual activity in the anthracite field," as the commission states. The average number of days throughout the region on which the collieries started was about 260, and the miners worked about 236 days, which is much more ample employment than they had in other years. Even so their daily earnings (for 313 week days in the year) average only $1.80, which is not a large wage when compared with other skilled trades; and when the fearful hazards of their employment, exceeding even those of railroad men, are considered, such earnings seem quite modest. The miners also had little difficulty in proving that the 10 per cent increase won in 1900 had not improved their condition, since the cost of living had correspondingly increased since 1900.

Several merchants testified that the price of necessaries of life in the anthracite region had increased more than 20 per cent between 1900 and 1902, while the official statistics of the United States Department of Labor revealed an increase of 10 per cent in the price of food consumed by the average workingman's family. In view of all the circumstances, the commission awarded a 10 per cent increase in piece rates, to take effect November 1, 1902. Such rates are to be the minimum, and are to be increased with every increase in the price of coal above $4.50 a ton at tide water, at the rate of 1 per cent for each 5 cents per ton. While the base price is seldom likely to be exceeded, the sliding scale will give to the miners something like two-fifths of the advantage of an increase should the operators attempt to gouge the public, and is thus a protection to consumers as well as miners.

The increase in rates granted to contract miners will be shared by them with the laborers whom they hire to load their coal, paying therefor about 35 per cent of their gross receipts.

The laborers' earnings were estimated to be slightly more than 60 per cent of those of the real miners, or $350, in 1901. The commission also decided that the laborers should be paid directly by the company, instead of by the miners, the amount of their earnings as reported by the miners.

The miners and their laborers constitute about two-fifths of the mine workers, the remaining 60 per cent being men and boys employed chiefly in and about the breakers by the week, day, or hour, and commonly designated as "company men." In their case also the commission found that rates of wages were of little significance owing to irregular employment; thus, in 1901, the average number of days on which the breakers started was 258, but the average number of hours per start was only 7.6.

As the men are paid for a ten-hour day, they averaged only 196 full days in the year. The significance of the 10 per cent reduction in hours now appears, it being equivalent to an advance of 11⅛ per cent in wages. Thus the "company man" who received $1.50 per day really worked for 15 cents an hour on the old basis of the ten-hour day. On the new basis of the nine-hour day the wage of $1.50 a day means 16⅔ cents an hour, and yearly earnings will increase proportionately. The justice of this 11⅛ per cent increase will be appreciated when it is stated that the average earnings of adult men were under $400[a] in 1901, a year of exceptionally ample employment. Thus, in 1901 the average number of ten-hour days of employment was 196, as compared with 149 in 1897 and 148 in 1898.

The commission found it impracticable to establish a system whereby miners should be paid by the ton rather than by the car, but provided that the operators should permit miners to employ check weighmen to watch the weighing and docking of coal in their interest.

RECOGNITION OF THE UNION.

Notwithstanding the importance of the wage question, the really fundamental point at issue was the recognition of the right of collective bargaining—that is, the right of the workingmen to combine, and choose representatives to make an annual bargain or contract with the company officials (the representatives of the stockholders or employers) concerning the conditions of employment, as is the practice in the bituminous trade, on the great railway systems, and in large-scale manufacturing. While denying in terms the miners' demand for "the incorporation in an agreement between the United Mine Workers and the anthracite coal companies of the wages which shall be paid and the conditions of employment which shall obtain, together with satisfactory methods for the adjustment of grievances," the commission in effect sustained the miners by upholding the principle of collective bargaining and by establishing a joint board of arbitration, on which the representatives of the employees must inevitably be officers of the union.

The fundamental doctrine of trade unionism is supported by the commission in the following words:

> In the days when the employer had but few employees, personal acquaintance and direct contact of the employer and the employee resulted in mutual knowledge of the surrounding conditions and the desires of each. The development of the employers into large corporations has rendered such personal contact and acquaintance between the responsible employer and the individual employee no longer possible in the old sense. The tendency toward peace and good-fellowship which grows out of personal acquaintance or direct contact should not, however, be lost through this evolution to greater combinations. There seems to be no medium through which to preserve it so natural and efficient as that of an organization of employees governed by rules which represent the will of a properly constituted majority of its members and officered by members selected for that purpose, and in whom authority to administer the rules and affairs of the union and its members is vested.
> The men employed in a certain line of work or branch of industry have similar feelings, aspirations, and convictions, the natural outgrowth of their common work and common trend or application of mind. The union, representing their community of interests, is the logical result of their community of thought. It encourages calm and intelligent consideration of matters of common interest. In the absence of a union the extremist gets a ready hearing for incendiary appeals to prejudice or passion when a grievance, real or fancied, of a general nature presents itself for consideration.
> The claim of the worker that he has the same right to join with his fellows in forming an organization through which to be represented that the stockholder of the corporation has to join others in forming the corporation and to be represented by the directors and other officers seems to be thoroughly well founded not only in ethics, but under economic considerations. Some employers say to their employees: "We do not object to your joining the union, but we will not recognize your union nor deal with it as representing you." If the union is to be rendered impotent and its usefulness is to be nullified by refusing to permit it to perform the functions for which it is created and for which alone it exists, permission to join it may well be considered as a privilege of doubtful value.
> Trades unionism is rapidly becoming a matter of business, and that employer who fails to give the same careful attention to the question of his relation to his labor or his employees which he gives to the other factors which enter into the conduct of his business makes a mistake which sooner or later he will be obliged to correct. In this as in other things it is much better to start right than to make mistakes in starting, which necessitate returning to correct them. Experience shows that the more full the recognition given to a trades union the more businesslike and responsible it becomes. Through dealing with business men in business matters its more intelligent, conservative, and responsible members come to the front and gain general control and direction of its affairs. If the energy of the employer is directed to discouragement and repression of the union, he need not be surprised if the more radically inclined members are the ones most frequently heard.
> The commission agrees that a plan under which all questions of difference between the employer and his employees shall first be considered in conference between the employer or his official representative and a committee chosen by his employees from their own ranks is most likely to produce satisfactory results and harmonious relations, and at such conference the employees should have the right to call to their assistance such representatives or agents as they may choose, and to have them recognized as such.

But the commission also points out the obligations of union men, thus:

> In order to be entitled to such recognition the labor organization or union must give the same recognition to the rights of the employer and of others which it demands for itself and for its members. The worker has the right to quit or to strike in conjunction with his fellows, when by so doing he does not violate a contract made by or for him. He has neither right nor license to destroy or to damage the property of the employer; neither has he any right or license to intimidate or to use violence against the man who chooses to exercise his right to work, nor to interfere with those who do not feel that the union offers the best method for adjusting grievances.
> The union must not undertake to assume or to interfere with the management of the business of the employer. It should strive to make membership in it so valuable as to attract all who are eligible; but in its efforts to build itself up it must not lose sight of the fact that those who may think differently have certain rights guaranteed them by our free government. However irritating it may be to see a man enjoy benefits to the securing of which he refuses to contribute, either morally or physically or financially, the fact that he has a right to dispose of his personal services as he chooses can not be ignored. The nonunion man assumes the whole responsibility which results from his being such, but his right and privilege of being a nonunion man are sanctioned in law and morals.

The commission declares that—

> The rights and privileges of nonunion men are as sacred to them as the rights and privileges of unionists. The contention that a majority of the employees in an industry, by voluntarily associating themselves in a union, acquire authority over those who do not so associate themselves is untenable. Those who voluntarily associate themselves believe that in their efforts to improve conditions they are working as much in the interest of the unorganized as in their own, and out of this grows the contention that when a nonunion man works during a strike he violates the rights and privileges of those associated in efforts to better the general condition and in aspirations to a higher standard of living.
> The nonunion man, who does not believe that the union can accomplish these things, insists with equal sincerity that the union destroys his efforts to secure a better standard of living, and interferes with his aspirations for improvement. The fallacy of such argument lies in the use of the analogy of State government, under which the minority acquiesces in the rule of the majority, but government is the result of organic law, within the scope of which no other government can assume authority to control the minority. In all acts of government the minority takes part, and when it is defeated the government becomes the agency of all, not simply of the majority.
> It should be remembered that the trade union is a voluntary social organization, and, like any other organization, is subordinate to the laws of the land and can not make rules or regulations in controvention thereof. Yet it at times seeks to set itself up as a separate and distinct governing agency and to control those who have refused to join its ranks and to consent to its government, and to deny to them the personal liberties which are guaranteed to every citizen by the Constitution and laws of the land. The analogy, therefore, is unsound and does not apply.
> Abraham Lincoln said: "No man is good enough to govern another man without that other's consent." This is as true in trade unions as elsewhere, and not until those who fail to recognize this truth abandon the narrow attitude toward nonunion men and follow the suggestion made above—that is, to make their work and their membership so valuable and attractive that all who are eligible to membership will come under their rule—will they secure that firm and constant sympathy of the public which their general purposes seem to demand.

The commission stated its belief that with certain changes in its constitution the mine-workers' organization would merit recognition by the employers. At present the boys in the union constitute about 20 per cent of the membership, and the presence of this immature element might readily lead to trouble by carrying a vote for a strike when the more conservative and experienced members might be opposed to it. The commission also believes that instead of a majority vote there should be required at least a two-thirds vote of all the delegates in a convention in order to begin a strike. Finally, the commission expresses a hope that—

[a] The only average presented by the commission is one for 35,851 men and boys, namely, $377.76, but the detailed statistics seem to justify the foregoing estimate.

When under the award the parties have faithfully obeyed its terms and thus learned to deal with each other, a trade agreement between operators and an anthracite mine workers' organization may commend itself to both sides. We believe this, especially when it is considered that in other directions and in other industries such agreements have been made and adhered to for terms of years, completely avoiding strikes and labor controversies generally. Of course here and there in the bituminous regions these agreements may not have worked with perfect satisfaction to both parties, and in some districts they have been abandoned after a brief trial. But, on the whole, the experience under them in this country and in England testifies to their great usefulness in preserving peace and harmony.

Meanwhile, during the life of the award, disputes arising between employers and employees are to be adjusted by a permanent joint committee or board of conciliation composed of three representatives of the operators and the same number of representatives of the miners. When this committee is unable to decide any question submitted, such question is to be referred to an umpire appointed by a judge of the United States circuit court. As the miners' representatives in each of the three districts are to be selected by the union whenever its membership comprises a majority of the mine workers in that district, the award is tantamount to the recognition of the union during the three years of its life.

THE RIGHT TO STRIKE AND THE RIGHT TO WORK.

Having thus vindicated the principles of unionism, the commission ruled that no operator should discriminate against union men in the matter of employment. It likewise ruled that union men should not discriminate against or interfere with nonunionists, pointing out that such discrimination on the part of either employer or employed constitutes a serious menace to the discipline of the miner, which, on account of the hazardous nature of the work, should be as nearly perfect as possible.

The right to strike the commission firmly upholds, but this does not include the right to persecute men who choose to work.

A strike set on foot with the view to the accomplishment of its purpose by intimidation or violence exercised against those who choose to remain at work violates the law from the beginning. Where, however, the strike itself is separable from the illegal violence and intimidation which in many cases accompany it, the legal liability for such violence and intimidation rests alone upon the individuals who commit the act, and those who aid, encourage, and abet them. Though no illegality of purpose is imputable to those inaugurating a strike, its existence, if it involve large numbers of men in a single community, tends of itself to produce disorder and lawlessness.

As has been said, the idle and vicious, who are in no way connected with the purpose or object of the strike, often unite with the less orderly of the strikers themselves in creating the deplorable scenes of violence and terror which have all too often characterized the otherwise laudable efforts of organized labor to improve its conditions. Surely this tendency to disorder and violation of law imposes upon the organization which begins and conducts a movement of such importance a grave responsibility. It has, by its voluntary act, created dangers, and should therefore be vigilant in averting them. It has, by the concerted action of many, aroused passions which, uncontrolled, threaten the public peace. It therefore owes society the duty of exerting its power to check and confine these passions within the bounds of reason and law. Such organizations should be the powerful coadjutors of government in maintaining the peace and upholding the law. Only so can they deserve and attain the respect due to good citizenship, and only so can they accomplish the beneficent ends which for the most part they are created to attain.

A labor or other organization whose purpose can only be accomplished by the violation of law and order of society has no right to exist.

The right to remain at work where others have ceased to work, or to engage anew in work which others have abandoned, is part of the personal liberty of a citizen that can never be surrendered, and every infringement thereof merits, and should receive, the stern denouncement of the law. All government implies restraint, and it is not less, but more, necessary in self-governed communities than in others to compel restraint of the passions of men which make for disorder and lawlessness. Our language is the language of a free people, and fails to furnish any form of speech by which the right of a citizen to work when he pleases, for whom he pleases, and on what terms he pleases can be successfully denied. The common sense of our people as well as the common law forbids that this right should be assailed with impunity. It is vain to say that the man who remains at work while others cease to work or takes the place of one who has abandoned his work helps to defeat the aspirations of men who seek to obtain better recompense for their labor and better conditions of life. Approval of the object of a strike or persuasion that its purpose is high and noble can not sanction an attempt to destroy the right of others to a different opinion in this respect, or to interfere with their conduct in choosing to work upon what terms and at what time and for whom it may please them so to do.

The commission censured both operators and miners for the disorder, violence, and lawlessness that accompanied the strike and culminated in three murders. It deprecated the employment by the mining companies of coal and iron policemen as militating against the very purpose for which they are employed—that of preserving peace and protecting property—while as a body they were men of good character, the commission found that there was a sufficient number of bad characters to discredit the efforts of the whole body. On the other hand, the strikers had permitted intimidation, riot, and bloodshed; men who chose to be employed or who remained at work were assailed and threatened, and they and their families terrorized and intimidated. While "the leaders of the union, and notably its president, condemned all violence and exhorted their followers to sobriety and moderation * * * the subordinate local organizations and their leaders were not so amenable to such counsels as to prevent the regrettable occurrences. It is in the power of a minority of the less responsible men and boys, together with the idle and vicious, unless properly restrained, to destroy the peace and order of any community, and absence of protection and of active resistance on the part of the better element means encouragement and license to this class."

BOYCOTTING AND BLACKLISTING.

The commission also condemned the practice of blacklisting and certain kinds of boycotting. It distinguished between a "primary" and a "secondary" boycott. The former "consists merely in the voluntary abstention of one or many persons from social or business relations with one whom they dislike. This might amount to a conspiracy at law if the ingredient of malicious purpose and concerted action to accomplish it were present," although the law on this point is uncertain. But when there is "a concerted purpose of a number of persons not only to abstain themselves from such intercourse, but to render the life of the victim miserable by persuading and intimidating others so to refrain, such purpose is a malicious one, and the concerted attempt to accomplish it is a conspiracy at common law, and merits and should receive the punishment due to such a crime."

Examples of such secondary boycotts are not wanting in the record of the case before the commission. A young schoolmistress of intelligence, character, and attainments was so boycotted and her dismissal from employment compelled for no other reason than that a brother, not living in her immediate family, chose to work contrary to the wishes and will of the striking miners. In several instances tradesmen were threatened with a boycott; that is, that all connected with the strikers would withhold from them their custom, and persuade others to do so, if they continued to furnish the necessaries of life to the families of certain workmen who had come under the ban of the displeasure of the striking organizations.

This was carrying the boycott to an extent which was condemned by Mr. Mitchell, president of the United Mine Workers of America, in his testimony before the commission, and which certainly deserves the reprobation of all thoughtful and law-abiding citizens:

Closely allied to the boycott is the blacklist, by which employers of labor sometimes prevent the employment by others of men whom they have discharged. In other words, it is a combination among employers not to employ workmen discharged by any of the members of said combination. This system is as reprehensible and as cruel as the boycott, and should be frowned down by all humane men. Wherever it is practiced to the extent of being founded upon an agreement or concerted action, it, too, comes within the definition of the crime of conspiracy, and as such should be punished. There is also a civil remedy open to one who suffers from having been blacklisted, in an action against those who are a party to it, to recover damages compensatory of the injury received.

COMPULSORY INVESTIGATION.

The commission discussed various plans of adjusting great industrial disputes and pronounced against compulsory arbitration. It does not—believe that in the United States such a system would meet with general approval or with success. Apart from the apparent lack of constitutional power to enact laws providing for compulsory arbitration, our industries are too vast and too complicated for the practical application of such a system.

We do believe, however, that the State and Federal Governments should provide the machinery for what may be called the compulsory investigation of controversies when they arise. The States can do this, whatever the nature of the controversy. The Federal Government can resort to some such measure when difficulties arise by reason of which the transportation of the United States mails, the operations, civil or military, of the Government of the United States, or the free and regular movement of commerce among the several States and with foreign nations are interrupted or directly affected or are threatened with being interrupted or affected.

The commission trusts that when the time during which its awards are to remain in force shall have elapsed, the relations of operator and employee will have so far improved as to make impossible such a condition as existed throughout the country in consequence of the strike in the anthracite region. Nevertheless the public has the right, when controversies like that of last year cause it serious loss and suffering, to know all the facts, and so be able to fix the responsibility. In order to do this power must be given the authorized representatives of the people to act for them by conducting a thorough investigation into all the matters involved in the controversy. This, of course, applies only to those cases where great public interests are at stake. It should not apply to petty difficulties or local strikes.

The chief benefit to be derived from the suggestion herein made lies in placing the real facts and the responsibility for such condition authoritatively before the people, that public opinion may crystallize and make its power felt. Could such a commission as that suggested have been brought to existence in June last, we believe that the coal famine might have been averted; certainly the suffering and deprivation might have been greatly mitigated.

THE PRESIDENT AND PROPERTY RIGHTS.

President Roosevelt's successful intervention in the coal strike met with the almost unanimous approval of the people, irrespective of their political affiliations. It was not until the commission's award had been made, and thought of the great disturbance nearly banished from the minds of the people, that criticism of his conduct, arising out of the resentment of the coal mine presidents and the desire to make political capital, began to appear, based on the allegation that his interference amounted to a modification of property rights. But the criticism was hushed almost as soon as it appeared by the declaration of Judge Gray, a member of the political party opposed to the President, that "the President's action, so far from interfering with or infringing upon property rights, tended to conserve them." Judge Gray's statement, which appeared in a New York City newspaper September 1, 1903, was as follows:

I have no hesitation in saying that the President of the United States was confronted in October, 1902, by the existence of a crisis more grave and threatening than any that had occurred since the civil war. I mean that the cessation of mining in the anthracite coal country, brought about by the dispute between the miners and those who controlled the greatest natural monopoly in this country and perhaps in the world, had brought upon more than one-half of the American people a condition of deprivation of one of the necessaries of life, and the probable continuance of the dispute threatened not only the comfort and health, but the safety and good order of the nation. He was without legal or constitutional power to interfere, but his position as President of the United States gave him an influence, a leadership, as first citizen of the Republic, that enabled him to appeal to the patriotism and good sense of the parties to the controversy and to place upon them the moral coercion of public opinion to agree to an arbitrament of the strike then existing and threatening consequences so direful to the whole country. He acted promptly and courageously, and in so doing averted the dangers to which I have alluded.

So far from interfering or infringing upon property rights, the President's action tended to conserve them. The peculiar situation as regards the anthracite coal interest was that they controlled a natural monopoly of a product necessary to the comfort and to the very life of a large portion of the people. A prolonged deprivation of the enjoyment of this necessary of life would have tended to precipitate an attack upon these property rights of which you speak, for, after all, it is vain to deny that this property, so peculiar in its conditions, and which is properly spoken of as "a natural monopoly," is affected with a public interest.

I do not think that any President ever acted more wisely, courageously, or promptly in a national crisis. Mr. Roosevelt deserves unstinted praise for what he did.

EXTRACTS FROM THEODORE ROOSEVELT'S PUBLIC PAPERS AND ADDRESSES.

Under this caption are included extracts from the messages of Theodore Roosevelt while governor of New York and as President of the United States, besides excerpts from his most important addresses on the rostrum. These public papers and speeches cover a wide range of industrial subjects, and are replete with valuable suggestions as well as progressive ideas, extending through the gamut of economic thought. They stamp him as a man of broad views, one whose honesty, temerity, and activity in human affairs for the good of all make him worthy of the confidence and support of every right-thinking citizen.

IMPOSSIBLE TO OVERESTIMATE THE AMOUNT OF GOOD ACCOMPLISHED THROUGH ORGANIZED LABOR.

It must always be a peculiar privilege for any thoughtful public man to address a body of men predominantly composed of wage-workers, for the foundation of our whole social structure rests upon the material and moral well-being, the intelligence, the foresight, the sanity, the sense of duty, and the wholesome patriotism of the wage-worker. This is doubly the case now, for in addition to each man's individual action you have learned the great lesson of acting in combination. It would be impossible to overestimate the far-reaching influences of and, on the whole, the amount of good done through your associations. * * * In our cities, or where men congregate in masses, it is often necessary to work in combination—that is, through associations—and here it is that we can see the great good conferred by labor organizations, by trade unions. (Speech on September 3, 1900, at the Chicago Labor Day picnic.)

NECESSITY FOR LABOR UNIONS.

The most vital problem with which this country, and for that matter the whole civilized world, has to deal is the problem which has for one side the betterment of social conditions, moral and physical, in large cities, and for another side the effort to deal with that tangle of far-reaching questions which we group together when we speak of "labor." The chief factor in the success of each man—wage-worker, farmer, and capitalist alike—must ever be the sum total of his own individual qualities and abilities. Second only to this comes the power of acting in combination or association with others. Very great good has been and will be accomplished by associations or unions of wage-workers, when managed with forethought and when they combine insistence upon their own rights with law-abiding respect for the rights of others. The display of these qualities in such bodies is a duty to the nation no less than to the associations themselves. Finally, there must also be, in many cases, action by the Government in order to safeguard the rights and interests of all. Under our Constitution there is much more scope for such action by the State and the municipality than by the nation. But on points such as those touched on above the National Government can act. (Message to the Fifty-seventh Congress, in 1901.)

MUCH CAN BE DONE BY TRADE UNIONS AND SIMILAR ORGANIZATIONS.

Before us loom industrial problems, vast in their importance and their complexity. The last half century has been one of extraordinary social and industrial development. The changes have been far-reaching, some of them for good and some of them for evil. It is not given to the wisest of us to see into the future with absolute clearness. No man can be certain that he has found the entire solution of this infinitely great and intricate problem, and yet each man of us, if he would do his duty, must strive manfully, so far as in him lies, to help bring about that solution.

It is not as yet possible to say what shall be the exact limit of influence allowed the State or what limit shall be set to that right of individual initiative so dear to the hearts of the American people. All we can say is that the need has been shown on the one hand for action by the people in their collective capacity through the State in many matters; that in other matters much can be done by associations of different groups of individuals, as in trade unions and similar organizations, and that in other matters it remains now as true as ever that final success will be for the man who trusts in the struggle only to his cool head, his brave heart, and his strong right arm. These are spheres in which a comparatively free field must be given to individual initiative. (Chicago Labor Day speech, September 3, 1900.)

VITAL IMPORTANCE OF ASSOCIATION.

The more a healthy American sees of one's fellow-Americans the greater grows his conviction that our chief troubles come from mutual misunderstanding—from failure to appreciate one another's point of view. In other words, the great need is fellow-feeling—sympathy, brotherhood—and all this mutually comes by association. It is therefore of vital importance that there should be such association. (At Chicago Labor Day picnic, Sept. 3, 1900.)

MEN SHOULD STRIVE FOR THEIR BETTERMENT AND STAND FOR THEIR RIGHTS.

Many qualities are needed in order that we can contribute our mite toward the upward movement of the world—the quality of self-abnegation, and yet combined with it the quality which will refuse to submit to injustice. I want to preach the two qualities going hand in hand. I do not want a man to fail to try to strive for his own betterment; I do not want him to be quick to yield to injustice, but I want him to stand for his rights. (Address before the Railroad Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association at Topeka, Kans., May 1, 1903.)

ELEVATION OF LABOR.

Bills have come to me this winter that were not what I wanted them to be, but I felt that they were steps in the right direction and I approved them. I found out, and you must find out, that if you are going to accomplish things you must yield something of your own wishes to the wishes of others, else you will get nowhere. Take the labor law for instance. That had much that was crude in it and many things that were good. I believe we should, as fast as we can, elevate labor. Don't applaud what is a self-evident fact, gentlemen. Everybody believes that we should help our fellow-men, and I have tried to find out since I have been in public life how our fellow-countrymen could best be helped. I have found that there is a kind of help which is no help at all and some which offers a temporary benefit. But, because the labor law contained some bad features along with its good ones, should I have vetoed it? That bill in its basis is all right. (Address to the City Club, New York City, May 9, 1899.)

RAILROAD MEN MAKE GOOD SOLDIERS AND CITIZENS.

All kinds of honorable work entitle those following them to honor. For the last few weeks and for the next few every minute and every hour my safety depends upon how the railroad men do their work. Naturally, I take a peculiar interest in them. But we must take the same interest in all men who do their work well. If a man does his duty he is a good citizen and we should be proud of him. Just let me say one word especially to the railroad men. I recollect the last time I ever met General Sherman he told me that if he had to raise an army composed purely of one class he would take railroad men, because they developed four or five qualities that counted more than anything else—qualities of taking risks, of irregular hours (so that to be up at night does not strike them with horror), of accepting responsibility, and yet of obeying orders and obeying them at once, not wondering whether to turn the switch then or later, but turning it then, and in consequence the men have had that training which will make good soldiers, and when you make a really good soldier you will make a good citizen. We can not all be railroad men, but we can all be good citizens and show the same type of quality. (Address at Truckee, Cal., May 19, 1903.)

RAILROAD EMPLOYEES POSSESS CHARACTER AND QUALITIES OF COURAGE AND HARDIHOOD.

In our present advanced civilization we have to pay certain penalties for what we have obtained. Among the penalties is the fact that in very many occupations there is so little demand upon nerve, hardihood, and endurance that there is a tendency to unhealthy softening of fiber and relaxation of fiber, and such being the case I think it is a fortunate thing for our people as a whole that there should be certain occupations, prominent among them railroading, in which the man has to show the very qualities of courage, of hardihood, of willingness to face danger, the cultivation of the power of instantaneous decision under difficulties, and the other qualities which go to make up the virile side of a man's character. * * *

I greet this audience, this great body of delegates, with peculiar pleasure, because they are men who embody, and embody by the very fact of their presence here, the essential sets of qualities of which I have been speaking. They embody the capacity for self-help with the desire mutually to help one the other. You have got several qualities I like. You have got sound bodies. Your profession is not one that can be carried on, at least in some of its branches, very favorably without the sound body. You have got sound minds, and that is better than sound bodies, and, finally, the fact that you are here, the fact that you have done what you have done, shows that you have that which counts for more than body, for more than mind—character. Character—that is what tells in the long run, character—which is compounded of many different qualities; in the first place perseverance, resolution, refusal to be daunted. (Address before the railroad branch of the Young Men's Christian Association at Topeka, Kans., May 1, 1903.)

PROTECTION TO THE AMERICAN WORKINGMAN IN HIS STANDARD OF WAGES AND LIVING.

The one consideration which never must be omitted in a tariff change is the imperative need of preserving the American standard of living for the American workingman. The tariff rate must never fall below that which will protect the American workingman by allowing for the difference between the general labor cost here and abroad, so as to at least equalize the conditions arising from the difference in the standard of labor here and abroad, a difference which it should be our aim to foster, in so far as it represents the needs of better educated, better paid, better fed, and better clothed workingmen of a higher type than any to be found in a foreign country.

At all hazards, and no matter what else is sought for or accomplished by changes of the tariff, the American workingman must be protected in his standard of wages—that is, in his standard of living—and must be secured the fullest opportunity of employment. Our laws should in no event afford advantage to foreign industries over American industries. They should in no event do less than equalize the difference in conditions at home and abroad. The general tariff policy to which, without regard to changes in detail, I believe this country to be irrevocably committed is fundamentally based upon ample recognition of the difference in labor cost here and abroad; in other words, the recognition of the need for full development of the intelligence, the comfort, the high standard of civilized living, and the inventive genius of the American workingman as compared to the workingman of any other country in the world. (Address at Logansport, Ind., September 22, 1902.)

INCREASED PROSPERITY OF THE WORKINGMAN AND THE FARMER.

In speaking on Labor Day at the annual fair of the New York State Agricultural Association it is natural to keep especially in mind the two bodies who compose the major ty of our people and upon whose welfare depends the welfare of the entire State. If circumstances are such that thrift, energy, industry, and forethought enable the farmer—the tiller of the soil—on the one hand and the wage-worker on the other to keep themselves, their wives, and their children in reasonable comfort, then the State is well off, and we can be assured that the other classes in the community will likewise prosper. On the other hand, if there is in the long run a lack in prosperity among the two classes named, then all other prosperity is sure to be more seeming than real.

It has been our profound good fortune as a nation that hitherto, disregarding exceptional periods of depression and the normal and inevitable fluctuations, there has been on the whole from the beginning of our Government to the present day a progressive betterment alike in the condition of the tiller of the soil and in the condition of the man who by his manual skill and labor supports himself and his family and endeavors to bring up his children so they may be at least as well off as and if possible better off than he himself has been. There are, of course, exceptions; but as a whole the standard of living among the farmers of our country has risen from generation to generation, and the wealth represented on the farms has steadily increased, while the wages of labor have likewise risen, both as regards the actual money paid and as regards the purchasing power which that money represents.

Side by side with this increase in the prosperity of the wage-worker and the tiller of the soil has gone on a great increase in the prosperity among the business men and among certain classes of professional men, and the prosperity of these men has been partly the cause and partly the consequence of the prosperity of farmer and wage-worker. It can not be too often repeated that in this country, in the long run, we all of us tend to go up or go down together. If the average of well-being is high, it means that the average wage-worker, the average farmer, and the average business man are all alike well off. If the average shrinks, there is not one of these classes which will not feel the shrinkage.

Of course there are always some men who are not affected by good times, just as there are some men who are not affected by bad times; but speaking broadly, it is true that if prosperity comes all of us tend to share more or less therein, and that if adversity comes each of us, to a greater or less extent, feels the tension. Unfortunately, in this world the innocent frequently find themselves obliged to pay some of the penalty for the misdeeds of the guilty, and so, if hard times come, whether they be due to our own fault or to our misfortune, whether they be due to some burst of speculative frenzy that has caused a portion of the business world to lose its head—a loss which no legislation can possibly supply—or whether they be due to any lack of wisdom in a portion of the world of labor, in each case the trouble, once started, is felt more or less in every walk of life. (Labor Day speech at Syracuse, N. Y., September 7, 1903.)

CARRY AMERICAN GOODS IN AMERICAN-BUILT SHIPS.

Shipping lines, if established to the principal countries with which we have dealings, would be of political as well as commercial benefit. From every standpoint it is unwise for the United States to continue to rely upon the ships of competing nations for the distribution of our goods. It should be made advantageous to carry American goods in American-built ships. (Message to Congress, December 3, 1901.)

AMERICAN WAGE-WORKERS TAKE KEEN PRIDE IN THEIR WORK AND WISH TO TURN OUT A PERFECT JOB.

American wage-workers work with their heads as well as their hands. Moreover, they take a keen pride in what they are doing, so that, independent of the reward, they wish to turn out a perfect job. This is the great secret of our success in competition with the labor of foreign countries. (Message to Congress, December 3, 1901.)

MAKING THE EIGHT-HOUR LAW OPERATIVE.

This bill carries out the recommendation made in my message to the legislature that the eight-hour law should be so amended as to make it effective. It will work on the whole an undoubted improvement. * * * The need of the passage of this law is evident. There is at present and has long been on the statute books an eight-hour law, but it is so easy of evasion that it has been largely inoperative. It is always detrimental to the best interests of the State to have a law on the statute books which pretends to do something and does not do it, and this of course is especially the case where it is highly important that the nominal end sought to be attained really should be attained. The general tendency toward an eight-hour working day has undoubtedly been healthful. * * * The permission to work overtime for additional compensation has resulted in such widespread evasion and nullification of the purposes of the law, especially among contractors, that it is wise to take it away in most cases. (Memorandum filed May 12, 1899, with approved assembly bill regulating labor hours on public work in New York State.)

WISE LABOR LEGISLATION IS OF MORE REAL BENEFIT TO THE COMMUNITY THAN ANY OTHER KIND OF LAW.

On no subject is it more important to have wise and sound legislation than where the interests of labor are concerned. When such legislation is good it probably accomplishes more real benefit to the community than can be accomplished by any other kind of law, but crude and hasty labor legislation either wholly fails to accomplish anything—being so drawn as to be ineffective—or else works harm instead of good to the very people supposed to be benefited. (Message to New York assembly, April 3, 1899.)

LEGISLATION TO SHIELD THE INTERESTS OF WAGE-WORKERS.

It is not only highly desirable, but necessary, that there should be legislation which shall carefully shield the interests of wage-workers and which shall discriminate in favor of the honest and humane employer by removing the disadvantage under which he stands when compared with unscrupulous competitors who have no conscience and will do right only under fear of punishment. (Address on "National Duties" at Minnesota State Fair, Minneapolis, September 2, 1901.)

AS MUCH THE STATE'S DUTY TO PROTECT THE WEAKER WAGE-WORKERS FROM OPPRESSION AS TO PROTECT HELPLESS INVESTORS FROM FRAUD.

During the past year very valuable labor measures have been enacted into laws, and they are well enforced. * * * Additional legislation will undoubtedly from time to time become necessary, but many vitally needed laws have already been put upon the statute books. As experience shows their defects these will be remedied. A stringent eight-hour labor law has been enacted. This is working well as a whole. In nothing do we need to exercise cooler judgment than in labor legislation. Such legislation is absolutely necessary, alike from the humanitarian and the industrial standpoints, and it is as much our duty to protect the weaker wage-workers from oppression as to protect helpless investors from fraud. (Annual message to the New York legislature January 3, 1900.)

LABOR LAWS HAVE WORKED WELL.

How far we shall go in regulating the hours of labor or the liabilities of employers is a matter of expediency, and each case must be determined on its own merits, exactly as it is a matter of expediency to determine what so-called "public utilities" the community shall itself own and what ones it shall leave to private or corporate ownership, securing to itself merely the right to regulate. Sometimes one course is expedient, sometimes the other. In my own State during the last half dozen years we have made a number of notable strides in labor legislation, and with a very few exceptions the laws have worked well. (Chicago Labor Day address, September 3, 1900.)

EFFECTIVE LEGISLATION AGAINST SWEAT SHOPS.

The Costello bill does not go as far as I should like to see it go, but it does not take an enormous stride in advance, representing the first really effective bit of legislation against the sweat shops which has been enacted in this State. It is in line with and to a large extent carries out one of the suggestions in my message to the legislature upon which I dwelt with particular emphasis. (Message to the New York assembly, April 3, 1899.)

The factory-inspection department of New York deals chiefly, of course, with conditions in great cities. One very important phase of its work during the last two years has been the enforcement of the antisweat-shop law, which is primarily designed to do away with the tenement-house factory. The conditions of life in some of the congested tenement-house districts, notably in New York City, had become such as to demand action by the State. As with other reforms, in order to make it stable and permanent it had to be gradual. It proceeded by evolution, not revolution. But progress has been steady, and wherever needed it has been radical. Much remains to be done, but the condition of the dwellers in the congested districts has been markedly improved, to the great benefit not only of themselves but of the whole community. (Address at Chicago Labor Day picnic, September 3, 1900.)

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

The liability of employers to their employees is now recognized in the laws of most of the great industrial communities of the world. While employers ought not to be burdened to such an extent as to endanger ordinary business transactions, yet the State should, so far as possible, protect those employees engaged in dangerous occupations, and should see that every reasonable provision is taken to guard their rights. (Annual message to the New York legislature, January 3, 1900.)

CHEAPNESS SECURED UNDER THE PADRONE SYSTEM IS OBTAINED AT THE SACRIFICE OF GOOD CITIZENSHIP.

It is even more important to reach contractors who do the State work than to reach the public servants of the State proper. Cheapness secured by the employment of gangs of men under the padrone system is cheapness for which the State pays altogether too dearly, for it is obtained at the cost of the sacrifice of good citizenship. It is therefore just that the ordinary employee of the State and of contractors who do State work should work for but eight hours and should receive a rate of wages not less than that paid for other labor of the same kind where the structure is to be put up, this not interfering with the purchase of a finished product. (Memorandum filed May 12, 1899, with approved assembly bill regulating hours of labor on public work in New York State.)

THE STATE'S LABOR DEPARTMENTS SHOULD RECEIVE PROMPT AND CORDIAL COOPERATION IN EVERY ATTEMPT TO FULFILL THEIR RESPECTIVE DUTIES.

The bureau of labor statistics, the board of mediation and arbitration, and the factory inspectors' department must be brought to the highest standard of efficiency and usefulness. The work of these departments—to report the actual conditions of labor, to seek to establish harmonious relations between labor and capital, and to enforce such labor legislation as have met with the approval of the people of the State—is of supreme importance. The efficiency of their service concerns not only those immediately affected, but also the entire public, and they should receive our prompt and cordial cooperation in every attempt to fulfill their respective duties. (Annual message to the New York legislature, January 2, 1899.)

LABOR STATISTICS OF VITAL CONCERN TO ALL LEADING LABOR INTERESTS.

The bureau of labor statistics in collecting the material for its reports has received valuable aid from manufacturers and officers of labor organizations. The reports of the department must be practical, strictly accurate in all statements of fact, and based on investigations conducted in accordance with modern scientific methods. (Message to the New York Legislature, January 2, 1899.)

The experiment of publishing a quarterly bulletin by the bureau of labor statistics has worked excellently, and the bulletin should be continued and improved. (Message to the New York legislature, January 3, 1900.)

The bureau of labor statistics (of New York) has done more than merely gather the statistics, for by keeping in close touch with all the leading labor interests it has kept them informed on countless matters that were really of vital concern to them. Incidentally one pleasing feature of the work of this bureau has been the steady upward tendency shown during the last four years, both in amount of wages received and in the quantity and steadiness of employment. (Chicago Labor Day speech, September 3, 1900.)

STATE CONTROL OF EMPLOYMENT OFFICES.

Abuses have occurred in connection with the employment offices in the larger cities, which are now allowed to violate the law with impunity, the power of punishment lying with the local authorities. It would be well to require the keeper of any employment office to procure a license from the State, as in Minnesota and other States. This license should be granted on the payment of a substantial fee, and the business would thus be restricted to responsible parties and kept under the control of the State administration. (Annual message to the New York legislature, January 3, 1900.)

STATE OWNERSHIP OF PRINTING PLANT.

It may well be considered by you whether by the passage of an act establishing a State printing bureau, equipped with every modern device, the cost to the State of its printing might not be reduced. This item has become a large one in the State expenditure, and a trial of State ownership, if found to be economical, I would advise. (Message to the New York legislature, January 3, 1900.)

THE STATE SHOULD BE AN EXEMPLARY EMPLOYER.

It is wise for the State to set a good example as an employer of labor, both as to the number of hours of labor exacted and as to paying a just and reasonable wage. (Memorandum filed on May 12, 1899, with approved bill regulating working hours on public work in New York State.)

In New York * * * we determined that as an employer of labor the State should set a good example to other employers. We do not permit the people's money to be squandered or to tolerate any work that is not the best. But we think that while rigidly insisting upon good work we should see that there is fair play in return. Accordingly we have adopted an eight-hour law for the State employees and for all contractors who do State work, and we have also adopted a law requiring that the fair market rate of wages shall be given. I am glad to say that both measures have so far, on the whole, worked well. * * * The practical experiment of working men for eight hours has been advantageous to the State. Poor work is always dear, whether poorly paid or not, and good work is always well worth having, and as a mere question of expediency, aside, even, from the question of humanity, we find that we can obtain the best work by paying fair wages and permitting the work to go only for a reasonable time. (Address at the Chicago Labor Day picnic, September 3, 1900.)

FREE MECHANICS MUST NOT BE BROUGHT INTO COMPETITION WITH PRISON LABOR.

A recent decision of the court of appeals has decided unconstitutional the law which provides that there shall be a mark on prison-made goods indicating that they are such. This matter should receive the attention of the legislature in order that some means may be devised whereby the free mechanic shall not be brought into competition with prison labor. (Annual message to the New York legislature, January 2, 1899.)

IN LABOR DISPUTES MEDIATION IS PREFERABLE TO ARBITRATION.

In various trades the relations between labor and capital have frequently been adjusted to the advantage of both by conferences between intelligent employers and reasonable workingmen. Such mutual understanding is in the highest degree desirable. It promotes industrial peace and general prosperity. Where disturbance exists, and before it has gone too far, the board of mediation and arbitration should seek to secure a fair settlement of the difficulties and a reestablishment of harmonious relations. It should also constantly endeavor to promote the extension of intelligent methods of settlement of labor disputes, so that, through the recognition by each party of the just rights of the other, strikes and lockouts may yield to wiser and more peaceful measures. (Message to the New York legislature, January 2, 1899.)

The work of mediation—that is, of settling the dispute before it has reached an acute stage—is even more important and successful than that of arbitration proper, after the strike is once on. This being so, it would be well to enact legislation which would compel parties to labor disputes to notify the board [of mediation and arbitration] of impending trouble or of strikes and lockouts. (Message to New York legislature, January 3, 1900.)

Where possible, it is always better to mediate before the strike begins than to try to arbitrate when the fight is on and both sides have grown stubborn and bitter. (Labor Day speech on September 3, 1900, at Chicago.)

ANTHRACITE COAL STRIKE COMMISSION ANXIOUS TO SEE RIGHT AND JUSTICE PREVAIL.

Our complex industrial civilization has not only been productive of much benefit, but has also brought us face to face with many puzzling problems—problems that are puzzling partly because there are men that are wicked, partly because there are good men who are foolish or shortsighted. There are many such to-day—the problems of labor and capital, the problems which we group together rather vaguely when we speak of the problems of the trusts, the problems affecting the farmers on the one hand, the railroads on the other. It would not be possible in any one place to deal with the particular shapes which these problems take at that time and in that place. And yet there are certain general rules which can be laid down for dealing with all of them, and those rules are the immutable rules of justice, of sanity, of courage, of common sense.

Six months ago it fell to my lot to appoint a commission to investigate into and conclude about matters connected with the great and menacing strike in the anthracite coal fields of Pennsylvania. On that Commission I appointed representatives of the church, of the bench, of the Army, representative of the capitalists of the region, and a representative of organized labor. They published a report, which was not only of the utmost moment because of dealing with the great and vital problem with which they were appointed to deal, but also in its conclusion initiating certain general rules in so clear and masterful a fashion that I wish most earnestly it could receive the broadest circulation as a tract wherever there exists or threatens to exist trouble in any way akin to that with which those commissioners dealt. All of them unanimously signed that report—all of them, as American citizens, anxious to see right and justice prevail. (Address at Omaha, Nebr., April 27, 1903.)

A GET-TOGETHER POLICY WILL TEND TO SOLVE INDUSTRIAL AND OTHER PROBLEMS.

Capital and wage-worker alike should honestly endeavor each to look at any matter from the other's standpoint, with a freedom on the one hand from the contemptible arrogance which looks upon the man of less means, and on the other from the no less contemptible envy, jealousy, and rancor which hates another because he is better off. Each quality is the complement of the other, the supplement of the other, and in point of baseness there is not the weight of a finger to choose between them. Look at the report signed by the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission, look at it in the spirit in which they wrote it, and if you can only make yourselves, make the community, approach the problems of the day in the spirit that those men, your fellows, showed in approaching the great problem of yesterday, any problem or problems will be solved. (Address at Omaha, Nebr., April 27, 1903.)

I have a great deal of faith in the average American citizen. I think he is a pretty good fellow, and I think he can generally get on with the other average American citizen if he will only know it. If he does not know it, but makes him a monster in his mind, then he will not get on with him. But if he will take the trouble to know him and realize that he is a being just like himself, with the same instincts, not all of them good, the same desire to overcome those that are not good, the same purposes, the same tendencies and shortcomings, the same desires for good, the same need of striving against evil; if he will realize all that, and if you can get the two together, with an honest desire each to try not only to help himself, but to help the other, most all our problems will be solved. (Speech at Topeka, Kans., May 1, 1903.)

TO HAVE THE SAME INTERESTS, NEEDS, AND ASPIRATIONS EVERY AMERICAN SHOULD UNDERSTAND AND WORK WITH HIS FELLOW-CITIZENS.

The first time I ever labored alongside of and got thrown into intimate companionship with men who were mighty men of their hand was in the cattle country of the Northwest. I soon grew to have an immense liking and respect for my associates, and as I knew them, and did not know similar workers in other parts of the country, it seemed to me then the ranch owner was a great deal better than any eastern business man, and that the cow puncher stood on a corresponding altitude compared to any of his brethren in the East.

Well, after a little while I got thrown into close relations with the farmers, and it did not take long before I had moved them up alongside of my beloved cowmen, and made up my mind that they really formed the backbone of the land. Then, because of certain circumstances, I was thrown into intimate contact with railroad men, and I gradually came to the conclusion that these railroad men were about the finest citizens there were anywhere around. Then, in the course of some official work, I was thrown into close contact with a number of the carpenters, blacksmiths, and men in the building trades—that is, skilled mechanics of a high order—and it was not long before I had them on the same pedestal with the others.

By that time it began to dawn on me that the difference was not in the men, but in my own point of view, and that if any man is thrown into close contact with any large body of our fellow-citizens it is apt to be the man's own fault if he does not grow to feel for them a very hearty regard and, moreover, grow to understand that on the great questions that lie at the root of human well-being he and they feel alike.

Our prime need as a nation is that every American should understand and work with his fellow-citizens, getting into touch with them, so that by actual contact he may learn that fundamentally he and they have the same interests, needs, and aspirations. (Labor Day address at Chicago, September 3, 1900.)

THE MASS OF AMERICANS DO NOT WANT CHARITY, BUT DESIRE TO HOLD THEIR OWN IN THE WORLD.

It ought not to be necessary for me to warn you against mere sentimentality, against the philanthropy and charity which are not merely insufficient, but harmful. It is eminently desirable that we should none of us be hard-hearted, but it is no less desirable that we should not be soft-headed. I really do not know which quality is most productive of evil to mankind in the long run, hardness of heart or softness of head. Naked charity is not what we permanently want. There are, of course, certain classes, such as young children, widows with large families, or crippled or very aged people, or even strong men temporarily crushed by stunning misfortune, on whose behalf we may have to make a frank and direct appeal to charity, and who can be the recipients of it without any loss of self-respect. But taking us as a whole, taking the mass of Americans, we do not want charity, we do not want sentimentality, we merely want to learn how to act both individually and together in such fashion as to enable us to hold our own in the world, to do good to others according to the measure of our opportunities, and to receive good from others in ways which will not entail on our part any loss of self-respect. (Address before the Young Men's Christian Association, Carnegie Hall, New York City, December 30, 1900.)

NO ROOM FOR THE WILLFULLY IDLE.

Throughout our history the success of the home-maker has been but another name for the upbuilding of the nation. The men who with ax in the forests and pick in the mountains and plow on the prairies pushed to completion the dominion of our people over the American wilderness have given the definite shape to our nation. They have shown the qualities of daring, endurance, and far-sightedness, of eager desire for victory and stubborn refusal to accept defeat, which go to make up the essential manliness of the American character. Above all, they have recognized in practical form the fundamental law of success in American life, the law of worthy work, the law of high, resolute endeavor. We have but little room among our people for the timid, the irresolute, and the idle; and it is no less true that there is scant room in the world at large for the nation with mighty thews that dares not to be great.

Sometimes we hear those who do not work spoken of with envy. Surely the willfully idle need arouse in the breast of a healthy man no emotion stronger than that of contempt, at the outside no emotion stronger than angry contempt. The feeling of envy would have in it an admission of inferiority on our part, to which the men who know not the sterner joys of life are not entitled. Poverty is a bitter thing, but it is not as bitter as the existence of restless vacuity and physical, moral, and intellectual flabbiness, to which those doom themselves who elect to spend all their years in that vainest of all vain pursuits—the pursuit of mere pleasure as a sufficient end in itself. The work may be done in a thousand different ways, with the brain or with the hands, in the study, the field, or the workshop. If it is honest work, honestly done and well worth doing, that is all we have a right to ask. (Address at Minneapolis, September 2, 1901.)

A POUND OF CONSTRUCTION IS WORTH A TON OF DESTRUCTION.

It ought to be no less unnecessary to say that any man who tries to solve the great problems that confront us by an appeal to anger and passion, to ignorance and folly, to malice and envy, is not, and never can be, aught but an enemy of the very people he professes to befriend. In the words of Lowell, it is far safer to adopt "all men up" than "some men down" for a motto. Speaking broadly, we can not, in the long run, benefit one man by the downfall of another. Our energies can, as a rule, be employed to more better advantage in uplifting some than in pulling down others. Of course there must sometimes be pulling down, too. We have no business to blink at evils, and where it is necessary that the knife should be used, let it be used unsparingly, but let it be used intelligently. When there is need of a drastic remedy, apply it, but do not apply it in the mere spirit of hate. Normally, a pound of construction is worth a ton of destruction. (Address to the Young Men's Christian Association, in New York City, December 30, 1900.)

SPURN THE LEADERSHIP OF THOSE WHO SEEK TO EXCITE CLASS ANTAGONISM.

People show themselves just as unfit for liberty whether they submit to anarchy or to tyranny, and class government, whether it be the government of a plutocracy or the government of a mob, is equally incompatible with the principles established in the days of Washington and perpetuated in the days of Lincoln. * * *

The reason why our future is assured lies in the fact that our people are genuinely skilled in and fitted for self-government, and therefore will spurn the leadership of those who seek to excite this ferocious and foolish class antagonism. The average American knows not only that he himself intends to do about what is right, but that his average fellow-countryman has the same intention and the same power to make his intention effective. He knows, whether he be business man, professional man, farmer, mechanic, employer, or wage-worker, that the welfare of each of these men is bound up with the welfare of all the others, that each neighbor to the other is actuated by the same hopes and fears, has fundamentally the same ideals, and that all alike have much the same virtues and the same faults.

Our average fellow-citizen is a sane and healthy man who believes in decency and has a wholesome mind. He therefore feels an equal scorn alike for the man of wealth guilty of the mean and base spirit of arrogance toward those who are less well off, and for the man of small means who in his turn either feels or seeks to excite in others the feeling of mean and base envy for those who are better off. The two feelings, envy and arrogance, are but opposite sides of the same shield, but different developments of the same spirit. Fundamentally, the unscrupulous rich man who seeks to exploit and oppress those who are less well off is in spirit not opposed to, but identical with, the unscrupulous poor man who desires to plunder and oppress those who are better off. The courtier and the demagogue are but developments of the same type under different conditions, each manifesting the same servile spirit, the same desire to rise by pandering to base passions, though one panders to power in the shape of a single man and the other to power in the shape of a multitude. So likewise the man who wishes to rise by wronging others must by right be contrasted, not with the man who likewise wishes to do wrong, though to a different set of people, but with the man who wishes to do justice to all people and to wrong none.

The line of cleavage between good and bad citizenship lies not between the man of wealth who acts squarely by his fellows and the man who seeks each day's wage by that day's work, wronging no one and doing his duty to his neighbor; nor yet does this line of cleavage divide the unscrupulous wealthy man who exploits others in his own interests from the demagogue or from the sullen and envious being who wishes to attack all men of property, whether they do well or ill. On the contrary, the line of cleavage between good citizenship and bad citizenship separates the rich man who does well from the rich man who does ill, the poor man of good conduct from the poor man of bad conduct. This line of cleavage lies at right angles to any such arbitrary line of division as that separating one class from another, one locality from another, or men with a certain degree of property from those of a less degree of property.

The good citizen is the man who, whatever his wealth or his poverty, strives manfully to do his duty to himself, to his family, to his neighbor, to the State; who is incapable of the baseness which manifests itself either in arrogance or in envy, but who while demanding justice for himself is no less scrupulous to do justice to others. It is because the average American citizen, rich or poor, is of just this type that we have cause for our profound faith in the future of the Republic.

Ours is a government of liberty, by, through, and under the law. Lawlessness and connivance at lawbreaking, whether the lawbreaking take the form of a crime of greed and cunning or of a crime of violence, are destructive not only of order, but of the true liberties which can only come through order. If alive to their true interests, rich and poor alike will set their faces like flint against the spirit which seeks personal advantage by overriding the laws, without regard to whether this spirit shows itself in the form of bodily violence by one set of men or in the form of vulpine cunning by another set of men. (Speech at New York State Fair, at Syracuse, on Labor Day, September 7, 1903.)

ONE LAW ONLY, ALIKE FOR THE RICH AND THE POOR.

Let the watchwords of all our people be the old familiar watchwords of honesty, decency, fair dealing, and common sense. The qualities denoted by these words are essential to all of us, as we deal with the complex industrial problems of to-day, the problems affecting not merely the accumulation but even more, the wise distribution of wealth. We ask no man's permission when we require him to obey the law, neither the permission of the poor man nor yet of the rich man. Least of all can the man of great wealth afford to break the law, even for his own financial advantage, for the law is his prop and support, and it is both foolish and profoundly unpatriotic for him to fail in giving hearty support to those who show that there is in very fact one law and one law only, alike for the rich and the poor, for the great and the small.

Men sincerely interested in the due protection of property and men sincerely interested in seeing that the just rights of labor are guaranteed, should alike remember not only that in the long run neither the capitalist nor the wage-worker can be helped in healthy fashion save by helping the other, but also that to require either side to obey the law and do its full duty toward the community is emphatically to that side's real interest.

There is no worse enemy of the wage-worker than the man who condones mob violence in any shape, or who preaches class hatred, and surely the slightest acquaintance with our industrial history should teach even the most shortsighted that the times of most suffering for our people as a whole, the times when business is stagnant and capital suffers from shrinkage and gets no return from its investments are exactly the times of hardship and want and grim disaster among the poor. If all the existing instrumentalities of wealth could be abolished, the first and severest suffering would come among those of us who are least well off at present. The wage-worker is well off only when the rest of the country is well off, and he can best contribute to his general well-being by showing sanity and a firm purpose to do justice to others.

In his turn the capitalist, who is really a conservative, the man who has forethought as well as patriotism, should heartily welcome every effort, legislative or otherwise, which has for its object to secure fair dealing by capital, corporate or individual, toward the public and toward the employee. Such laws as the franchise-tax law in this State, which the court of appeals recently unanimously decided constitutional—such a law as that passed by Congress last year for the purpose of establishing a Department of Commerce and Labor, under which there should be a bureau to oversee and secure publicity from the great corporations which do an interstate business—such a law as that passed at the same time for the regulation of the great highways of commerce, so as to keep these roads clear on fair terms to all producers in getting their goods to market—these laws are in the interest not merely of the people as a whole, but of the propertied classes. For in no way is the stability of property better assured than by making it patent to our people that property bears its proper share of the burdens of the State, that property is handled not only in the interest of the owner, but in the interest of the whole community.

In other words, legislation to be permanently good for any class must also be good for the nation as a whole, and legislation which does injustice to any class is certain to work harm to the nation. (Labor Day address at New York State Fair, in Syracuse, September 7, 1903.)

CORPORATIONS ARE BENEFITED WHEN REQUIRED TO OBEY THE LAW.

Every man who has made wealth or used it in developing great legitimate business enterprises has been of benefit and not harm to the country at large. This city has grown by leaps and bounds only when the railroads came to it, when the railroads came to the State, and if the State were now cut off from its connection by rail and by steamship with the rest of the world its position would, of course, diminish incalculably. Great good has come from the development of our railroad system, great good has been done by the individuals and corporations that have made that development possible, and in return good has been done to them, and not harm, when they are required to obey the law. (Address at Spokane, Wash., May 27, 1903.)

OPENS ARMORIES FOR THE RECEPTION OF HOMELESS PEOPLE IN NEW YORK CITY DURING THE BLIZZARD OF 1899.

Before I make my formal speech I ask your permission to say one thing. Since coming to New York this afternoon there has been very vividly brought home to me, what perhaps all of you have realized the last two or three days, the terrible distress this unprecedented weather is causing, and, although I can not say I had exactly warrant in law for what I have done, yet I trust that the senator will see that the legislature supports me. I have directed the commander of the State guard, Major-General Roe, to throw open five of the armories, those of the Eighth, Ninth, Twelfth, Sixty-ninth, and Seventy-first Regiments, which were in the parts of the city where we thought the greatest distress could with most celerity be relieved, to throw open those five armories for the reception of destitute and houseless people. And the general has notified the police headquarters to instruct all the precinct commanders that the armories were open, so that in case there is not elsewhere accommodation for those without homes in this bitter weather they can find shelter there. (Response to the toast "The State of New York," at the Lincoln Club dinner, in New York City, February 13, 1899.)

[Address of President Roosevelt at the State fair, Syracuse, N. Y., September 7, 1903 (Labor Day).]

In speaking on Labor Day at the annual fair of the New York State Agricultural Association, it is natural to keep especially in mind the two bodies who compose the majority of our people and upon whose welfare depends the welfare of the entire State. If circumstances are such that thrift, energy, industry, and forethought enable the farmer, the tiller of the soil, on the one hand, and the wage-worker, on the other, to keep themselves, their wives, and their children in reasonable comfort, then the State is well off, and we can be assured that the other classes in the community will likewise prosper. On the other hand, if there is in the long run a lack of prosperity among the two classes named, then all other prosperity is sure to be more seeming than real.

INCREASE OF WEALTH AND COMFORT IN THE UNITED STATES.

It has been our profound good fortune as a nation that hitherto, disregarding exceptional periods of depression and the normal and inevitable fluctuations, there has been on the whole from the beginning of our Government to the present day a progressive betterment, alike in the condition of the tiller of the soil and in the condition of the man who, by his manual skill and labor, supports himself and his family, and endeavors to bring up his children so that they may be at least as well off as, and if possible better off than, he himself has been. There are, of course, exceptions, but as a whole the standard of living among the farmers of our country has risen from generation to generation, and the wealth represented on the farms has steadily increased, while the wages of labor have likewise risen, both as regards the actual money paid and as regards the purchasing power which that money represents.

Side by side with this increase in the prosperity of the wage-worker and the tiller of the soil has gone on a great increase in the prosperity among the business men and among certain classes of professional men, and the prosperity of these men has been partly the cause and partly the consequence of the prosperity of farmer and wage-worker. It can not be too often repeated that in this country in the long run we all of us tend to go up or go down together.

If the average of well-being is high, it means that the average wage-worker, the average farmer, and the average business man are all alike well off. If the average shrinks, there is not one of these classes which will not feel the shrinkage. Of course there are always some men who are not affected by good times, just as there are some men who are not affected by bad times.

But speaking broadly, it is true that if prosperity comes all of us tend to share more or less therein, and that if adversity comes, each of us, to a greater or less extent, feels the tension. Unfortunately, in this world the innocent frequently find themselves obliged to pay some of the penalty for the misdeeds of the guilty, and so if hard times come, whether they be due to our own fault or to our misfortune, whether they be due to some burst of speculative frenzy that has caused a portion of the business world to lose its head—a loss which no legislation can possibly supply—or whether they be due to any lack of wisdom in a portion of the world of labor, in each case the trouble once started is felt more or less in every walk of life.

THE GOOD OF ONE IS THE GOOD OF ALL.

It is all-essential to the continuance of our healthy national life that we should recognize this community of interest among our people. The welfare of each of us is dependent fundamentally upon the welfare of all of us, and therefore in public life that man is the best representative of each of us who seeks to do good to each by doing good to all; in other words, whose endeavor it is, not to represent any special class and promote merely that class's selfish interests, but to represent all true and honest men of all sections and all classes and to work for their interests by working for our common country.

We can keep our Government on a sane and healthy basis, we can make and keep our social system what it should be, only on condition of judging each man, not as a member of a class, but on his worth as a man. It is an infamous thing in our American life, and fundamentally treacherous to our institutions, to apply to any man any test save that of his personal worth, or to draw between two sets of men any distinction save the distinction of conduct, the distinction that marks off those who do well and wisely from those who do ill and foolishly. There are good citizens and bad citizens in every class as in every locality, and the attitude of decent people toward great public and social questions should be determined, not by the accidental questions of employment or locality, but by those deep-set principles which represent the innermost souls of men.

The failure in public and in private life thus to treat each man on his own merits, the recognition of this Government as being either for the poor as such or for the rich as such, would prove fatal to our Republic, as such failure and such recognition have always proved fatal in the past to other republics. A healthy republican government must rest upon individuals, not upon classes or sections. As soon as it becomes government by a class or by a section it departs from the old American ideal.

DANGER OF CLASS GOVERNMENT.

It is, of course, the merest truism to say that free institutions are of avail only to people who possess the high and peculiar characteristics needed to take advantage of such institutions. The century that has just closed has witnessed many and lamentable instances in which people have seized a government free in form, or have had it bestowed upon them, and yet have permitted it under the forms of liberty to become some species of despotism or anarchy, because they did not have in them the power to make this seeming liberty one of deed instead of one merely of word.

Under such circumstances the seeming liberty may be supplanted by a tyranny or despotism in the first place, or it may reach the road of despotism by the path of license and anarchy. It matters but little which road is taken. In either case the same goal is reached. People show themselves just as unfit for liberty whether they submit to anarchy or to tyranny; and class government, whether it be the government of a plutocracy or the government of a mob, is equally incompatible with the principles established in the days of Washington and perpetuated in the days of Lincoln.

Many qualities are needed by a people which would preserve the power of self-government in fact as well as in name. Among these qualities are forethought, shrewdness, self-restraint, the courage which refuses to abandon one's own rights, and the disinterested and kindly good sense which enables one to do justice to the rights of others. Lack of strength and lack of courage unfit men for self-government on the one hand, and on the other brutal arrogance, envy, in short, any manifestation of the spirit of selfish disregard, whether of one's own duties or of the rights of others, are equally fatal.

In the history of mankind many republics have risen, have flourished for a less or greater time, and then have fallen because their citizens lost the power of governing themselves and thereby of governing their state; and in no way has this loss of power been so often and so clearly shown as in the tendency to turn the government into a government primarily for the benefit of one class instead of a government for the benefit of the people as a whole.

Again and again in the republics of ancient Greece, in those of mediæval Italy and mediæval Flanders, this tendency was shown, and wherever the tendency became a habit it invariably and inevitably proved fatal to the state. In the final result it mattered not one whit whether the movement was in favor of one class or of another. The outcome was equally fatal, whether the country fell into the hands of a wealthy oligarchy which exploited the poor or whether it fell under the domination of a turbulent mob which plundered the rich.

In both cases there resulted violent alternations between tyranny and disorder, and a final complete loss of liberty to all citizens—destruction in the end overtaking the class which had for the moment been victorious, as well as that which had momentarily been defeated. The death knell of the Republic had rung as soon as the active power became lodged in the hands of those who sought, not to do justice to all citizens, rich and poor alike, but to stand for one special class and for its interests as opposed to the interests of others.

AMERICAN IDEALS OF JUSTICE.

The reason why our future is assured lies in the fact that our people are genuinely skilled in and fitted for self-government, and therefore will spurn the leadership of those who seek to excite this ferocious and foolish class antagonism. The average American knows not only that he himself intends to do about what is right, but that his average fellow-countryman has the same intention and the same power to make his intention effective. He knows, whether he be business man, professional man, farmer, mechanic, employer, or wage-worker, that the welfare of each of these men is bound up with the welfare of all the others; that each is neighbor to the other, is actuated by the same hopes and fears, has fundamentally the same ideals, and that all alike have much the same virtues and the same faults.

Our average fellow-citizen is a sane and healthy man, who believes in decency and has a wholesome mind. He therefore feels an equal scorn alike for the man of wealth guilty of the mean and base spirit of arrogance toward those who are less well off and for the man of small means who in his turn either feels or seeks to excite in others the feeling of mean and base envy for those who are better off. The two feelings—envy and arrogance—are but opposite sides of the same shield, but different developments of the same spirit. Fundamentally, the unscrupulous rich man who seeks to exploit and oppress those who are less well off is in spirit not opposed to but identical with the unscrupulous poor man who desires to plunder and oppress those who are better off.

The courtier and the demagogue are but developments of the same type under different conditions, each manifesting the same servile spirit, the same desire to rise by pandering to base passions, though one panders to power in the shape of a single man and the other to power in the shape of a multitude. So likewise the man who wishes to rise by wronging others must by right be contrasted, not with the man who likewise wishes to do wrong, though to a different set of people, but with the man who wishes to do justice to all people and to wrong none.

GOOD AND BAD CITIZENS.

The line of cleavage between good and bad citizenship lies, not between the man of wealth who acts squarely by his fellows and the man who seeks each day's wage by that day's work, wronging no one and doing his duty by his neighbor; nor yet does this line of cleavage divide the unscrupulous wealthy man, who exploits others in his own interest, from the demagogue, or from the sullen and envious being who wishes to attack all men of property, whether they do well or ill. On the contrary, the line of cleavage between good citizenship and bad citizenship separates the rich man who does well from the rich man who does ill, the poor man of good conduct from the poor man of bad conduct. This line of cleavage lies at right angles to any such arbitrary line of division as that separating one class from another, one locality from another, or men with a certain degree of property from those of a less degree of property.

The good citizen is the man who, whatever his wealth or his poverty, strives manfully to do his duty to himself, to his family, to his neighbor, to the State; who is incapable of the baseness which manifests itself either in arrogance or in envy, but who while demanding justice for himself is no less scrupulous to do justice to others. It is because the average American citizen, rich or poor, is of just this type that we have cause for our profound faith in the future of the Republic.

Ours is a government of liberty by, through, and under the law. Lawlessness and connivance at lawbreaking—whether the lawbreaking take the form of a crime of greed and cunning or of a crime of violence—are destructive not only of order, but of the true liberties which can only come through order. If alive to their true interests, rich and poor alike will set their faces like flint against the spirit which seeks personal advantage by overriding the laws, without regard to whether this spirit shows itself in the form of bodily violence by one set of men or in the form of vulpine cunning by another set of men.

Let the watchwords of all our people be the old familiar watchwords of honesty, decency, fair dealing, and common sense. The qualities denoted by these words are essential to all of us as we deal with the complex industrial problems of to-day, the problems affecting not merely the accumulation but even more the wise distribution of wealth. We ask no man's permission when we require him to obey the law, neither the permission of the poor man nor yet of the rich man. Least of all can the man of great wealth afford to break the law, even for his own financial advantage, for the law is his prop and support, and it is both foolish and profoundly unpatriotic for him to fail in giving hearty support to those who show that there is in very fact one law, and one law only alike for the rich and the poor, for the great and the small.

MUTUAL INTERESTS OF CAPITAL AND LABOR.

Men sincerely interested in the due protection of property, and men sincerely interested in seeing that the just rights of labor are guaranteed, should alike remember not only that in the long run neither the capitalist nor the wage-worker can be helped in healthy fashion save by helping the other; but also that to require either side to obey the law and do its full duty toward the community is emphatically to that side's real interest.

There is no worse enemy of the wage-worker than the man who condones mob violence in any shape or who preaches class hatred; and surely the slightest acquaintance with our industrial history should teach even the most short-sighted that the times of most suffering for our people as a whole, the times when business is stagnant, and capital suffers from shrinkage and gets no return from its investments, are exactly the times of hardship, and want, and grim disaster among the poor. If all the existing instrumentalities of wealth could be abolished, the first and severest suffering would come among those of us who are least well off at present. The wage-worker is well off only when the rest of the country is well off; and he can best contribute to this general well-being by showing sanity and a firm purpose to do justice to others.

In his turn the capitalist who is really a conservative, the man who has forethought as well as patriotism, should heartily welcome every effort, legislative or otherwise, which has for its object to secure fair dealing by capital, corporate or individual, toward the public and toward the employee. Such laws as the franchise-tax law in this State, which the court of appeals recently unanimously decided constitutional—such a law as that passed in Congress last year for the purpose of establishing a Department of Commerce and Labor, under which there should be a bureau to oversee and secure publicity from the great corporations which do an interstate business—such a law as that passed at the same time for the regulation of the great highways of commerce so as to keep these roads clear on fair terms to all producers in getting their goods to market—these laws are in the interest not merely of the people as a whole, but of the propertied classes. For in no way is the stability of property better assured than by making it patent to our people that property bears its proper share of the burdens of the state; that property is handled not only in the interest of the owner, but in the interest of the whole community.

WELFARE OF ALL THE CRITERION OF CLASS LEGISLATION.

In other words, legislation to be permanently good for any class must also be good for the nation as a whole, and legislation which does injustice to any class is certain to work harm to the nation. Take our currency system for example. This nation is on a gold basis. The Treasury of the public is in excellent condition. Never before has the per capita of circulation been as large as it is this day; and this circulation, moreover, is of money every dollar of which is at par with gold. Now, our having this sound currency system is of benefit to banks, of course, but it is of infinitely more benefit to the people as a whole, because of the healthy effect on business conditions.

In the same way, whatever is advisable in the way of remedial or corrective currency legislation—and nothing revolutionary is advisable under present conditions—must be undertaken only from the standpoint of the business community as a whole; that is, of the American body politic as a whole. Whatever is done, we can not afford to take any step backward or to cast any doubt upon the certain redemption in standard coin of every circulating note.

Among ourselves we differ in many qualities, of body, head, and heart; we are unequally developed, mentally as well as physically. But each of us has the right to ask that he shall be protected from wrongdoing as he does his work and carries his burden through life. No man needs sympathy because he has to work, because he has a burden to carry. Far and away the best prize that life offers is the chance to work hard at work worth doing, and this is a prize open to every man, for there can be no work better worth doing than that done to keep in health and comfort and with reasonable advantages those immediately dependent upon the husband, the father, or the son.

NO ROOM FOR THE IDLER.

There is no room in our healthy American life for the mere idler, for the man or the woman whose object it is throughout life to shirk the duties which life ought to bring. Life can mean nothing worth meaning unless its prime aim is the doing of duty, the achievement of results worth achieving. A recent writer has finely said: "After all, the saddest thing that can happen to a man is to carry no burdens. To be bent under too great a load is bad; to be crushed by it is lamentable; but even in that there are possibilities that are glorious. But to carry no load at all—there is nothing in that. No one seems to arrive at any goal really worth reaching in this world who does not come to it heavy laden."

Surely from our own experience each one of us knows that this is true. From the greatest to the smallest, happiness and usefulness are largely found in the same soul, and the joy of life is won in its deepest and truest sense only by those who have not shirked life's burdens. The men whom we most delight to honor in all this land are those who, in the iron years from 1861 to 1865, bore on their shoulders the burden of saving the Union. They did not choose the easy task. They did not shirk the difficult duty. Deliberately and of their own free will they strove for an ideal, upward and onward across the stony slopes of greatness. They did the hardest work that was then to be done; they bore the heaviest burden that any generation of Americans ever had to bear; and because they did this they have won such proud joy as it has fallen to the lot of no other men to win, and have written there names forevermore on the golden honor roll of the nation.

As it is with the soldier, so it is with the civilian. To win success in the business world, to become a first-class mechanic, a successful farmer, an able lawyer or doctor, means that the man has devoted his best energy and power through long years to the achievement of his ends. So it is in the life of the family, upon which in the last analysis the whole welfare of the nation rests. The man or woman who as bread winner and home maker, or as wife and mother, has done all that he or she can do, patiently and uncomplainingly, is to be honored and is to be envied by all those who have never had the good fortune to feel the need and duty of doing such work.

The woman who has borne, and who has reared as they should be reared, a family of children has in the most emphatic manner deserved well of the Republic. Her burden has been heavy, and she has been able to bear it worthily only by the possession of resolution, of good sense, of conscience, and of usefulness. But if she has borne it well, then to her shall come the supreme blessing, for in the words of the oldest and greatest of books, "Her children shall rise up and call her blessed;" and among the benefactors of the land her place must be with those who have done the best and the hardest work, whether as lawgivers or as soldiers, whether in public or in private life.

THE SECRET OF AMERICAN SUCCESS.

This is not a soft and easy creed to preach. It is a creed willingly learned only by men and women who, together with the softer virtues, possess also the stronger; who can do, and dare, and die at need, but who, while life lasts, will never flinch from their allotted task. You farmers and wage-workers and business men of this great State, of this mighty and wonderful nation, are gathered together to-day, proud of your State and still prouder of your nation, because your forefathers and predecessors have lived up to just this creed.

You have received from their hands a great inheritance, and you will leave an even greater inheritance to your children and your children's children, provided only that you practice alike in your private and your public lives the strong virtues that have given us as a people greatness in the past. It is not enough to be well-meaning and kindly, but weak; neither is it enough to be strong, unless morality and decency go hand in hand with strength.

We must possess the qualities which make us do our duty in our homes and among our neighbors, and in addition we must possess the qualities which are indispensable to the make-up of every great and masterful nation—the qualities of courage and hardihood, of individual initiative and yet of power to combine for a common end, and above all, the resolute determination to permit no man and no set of men to sunder us one from the other by lines of caste or creed or section. We must act upon the motto of all for each and each for all. There must be ever present in our minds the fundamental truth that in a republic such as ours the only safety is to stand neither for nor against any man because he is rich or because he is poor, because he is engaged in one occupation or another, because he works with his brains or because he works with his hands.

We must treat each man on his worth and merits as a man. We must see that each is given a square deal, because he is entitled to no more and should receive no less. Finally we must keep ever in mind that a republic such as ours can exist only in virtue of the orderly liberty which comes through the equal domination of law over all men alike, and through its administration in such resolute and fearless fashion as shall teach all that no man is above it and no man below it.

Mr. Chairman, the subject of the record of the forthcoming candidates, whoever they may be, on the two great tickets of the country for President touching the labor question will be very important and will attract great attention during the campaign. I therefore have no hesitation in placing in the RECORD as a part of my speech and with my entire approval the record of our candidate for the Presidency upon this most important topic. There is no question in my mind but that above all others Theodore Roosevelt will loom up as the special friend of labor and the laboring man. He may not have fulminated from the bench the platitudes that have been placed in the RECORD coming from one of the candidates, but he has done things, and the man who does something these times is the most important of them all. I point with great pleasure to the record of Theodore Roosevelt in this behalf. I challenge criticism. I challenge disapproval. I call for approval by the American people. I also point to the record of the Republican party upon other questions.

Slavery.—The great revolution which exalted labor and freed the country from the curse of slavery was accomplished by the Republican party, against the fiercest opposition possible by the combined forces of the Democrats and their allies. Still true to its original ideals of freedom, the Republican party, after a lapse of forty years since the emancipation proclamation of Lincoln, abolished slavery in the Philippine Islands. (Act passed by a Republican Senate and Republican House and signed by President Roosevelt July 1, 1902.)

Involuntary servitude of foreigners.—In 1874 the Forty-third Congress, which was Republican in both Houses, prohibited under heavy penalties the holding to involuntary services of any person forcibly kidnaped in any other country.

Peonage.—The act abolishing this kind of forced labor was passed by the Thirty-ninth Congress, when both Houses were Republican by a large majority, March 2, 1867.

The cooly trade.—The legislation prohibiting the cooly trade is the work of the Republicans. The original law was passed by the Thirty-seventh Congress and approved February 19, 1862, amended February 9, 1869, by the Fortieth Congress, and further amended March 3, 1875, to provide for its enforcement, as recommended by President Grant in his message of December 7, 1874. When Hawaii became a Territory of the United States a Republican Congress abolished the existing system of cooly contract labor. (Act passed by the Fifty-sixth Congress and signed by President McKinley April 30, 1900.)

IMMIGRATION.

The Republican party has favored the American standard of living, not only by abolishing compulsory labor, but also by excluding the products of the cheapest foreign labor through protective tariffs and by restricting the immigration of unassimilable elements from other races. The act of 1875 closed our doors to the paupers and criminals of Europe, and the exclusion act of 1882 stopped the immigration of the Chinese. Upon the annexation of Hawaii in 1898 the immigration of Chinese thereto was prohibited by a Republican Congress, as was the migration of those already in Hawaii from the islands to continental United States. In President Roosevelt's Administration the Chinese-exclusion laws have been extended to the entire island territory of the United States. (Act passed by the Fifty-seventh Congress and approved April 29, 1902.)

The importation of foreign laborers under contract was first prohibited in 1885, but, owing to defective provisions for enforcing the law, continued almost unchecked until the amendments made in President Harrison's Administration. (Acts of the Fifty-first Congress, which was Republican in both branches, and of the Fifty-second Congress, signed March 3, 1891, and March 3, 1893, respectively.)

The Republican party has increased the restrictions upon the immigration of cheap foreign labor in the new law of 1903. (Act passed by the Fifty-seventh Congress, both Houses being controlled by the Republicans, and signed by President Roosevelt March 3, 1903.)

CONVICT LABOR.

The law abolishing the contract system of labor for United States convicts passed the House March 9, 1886, and the Senate February 28, 1887. All the votes against the bill were Democratic.

The law providing for the construction of new United States prisons and the employment of convicts therein exclusively in the manufacture of such supplies for the Government as can be made without the use of machinery was passed by the Fifty-first Congress, which was Republican in both branches, and signed by President Harrison. (Chapter 529 of the acts of 1890-91.)

The importation of goods made by convicts in foreign countries was prohibited in the Fifty-third Congress, but it remained for a Republican Congress to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to make regulations for the law's enforcement. (Act passed by the Fifty-fifth Congress and signed by President McKinley July 24, 1897.)

SAFETY OF WORKMEN.

Protection of seamen.—This was accomplished by the Forty-second Congress, when both Houses were Republican, and the Forty-third Congress, also Republican.

Inspection of steam vessels.—Accomplished by the Fortieth Congress, which was controlled by the Republicans.

Inspection of coal mines in the Territories.—Provided for by the Fifty-first Congress, both Houses being under the control of the Republicans; approved by President Harrison.

Safety appliances on railways.—The original act providing for automatic couplers and power brakes on locomotives and cars used in interstate traffic was passed by the Fifty-second Congress, and signed by President Harrison March 2, 1893. Owing to decisions of the courts, new legislation became necessary, and the Fifty-seventh Congress (Republican) passed a greatly improved law, which was signed by President Roosevelt March 2, 1903.

Accidents to be reported.—The Fifty-sixth Congress (Republican) passed a law requiring common carriers to make monthly reports of accidents to the Interstate Commerce Commission. (Approved by President McKinley March 3, 1901.)

THE EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

The first eight-hour law in this country was enacted by the Fortieth Congress and approved by President Grant in 1868. It applied to all artisans and laborers employed by the Government.

In the Fiftieth Congress (1888) the eight-hour day was established for letter carriers. The bill passed the Senate, which was Republican, without division.

In President Harrison's Administration the eight-hour law was extended to include persons employed by contractors on public works. (Chap. 352 of the acts of 1892.)

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

The act creating the United States Bureau of Labor was passed by the Forty-eighth Congress (1884) and signed by President Arthur. In the Fiftieth Congress (1888) the Bureau was removed from the Department of the Interior and made an independent Department of Labor, all the votes cast against the bill being Democratic. In 1903 a Republican Congress established the Department of Commerce and Labor and made its head a Cabinet officer.

BOARDS OF ARBITRATION.

Act passed at the Fifty-fifth Congress (Republican) and signed by President McKinley June 1, 1898.

INCORPORATION OF NATIONAL TRADE UNIONS.

Provided for by act of Congress in 1886, without division in either House.

LABOR LEGISLATION IN REPUBLICAN AND DEMOCRATIC STATES.

There is no better way of judging the merits of a political party than by the laws which are passed by the legislators who are elected to office from its ranks. With regard to legislation for the protection of the workers, much remains to be done before they receive their full measure of protection and justice; but, as can be shown by the statistics of the different States, nearly all protective labor legislation in the United States was first enacted by Republican States and then adopted by way of imitation by the Democratic States. At the present time the proportion of Republican States having protective labor legislation is much greater than that of Democratic States. This is plainly shown in the tables.

Labor bureaus.—There are few agencies which have done more toward giving a clear insight into the problems of labor and capital, that have brought employer and employee nearer together, that have furnished the laboring people with facts for arguments in favor of protective legislation, than bureaus of labor and labor statistics. The table shows that at present there are 33 State labor bureaus in the United States. Of these, 23 are in Republican States and 10 are in Democratic States. Reducing these figures to a proportionate basis, we find that 23 out of 28 Republican States, or 82 per cent, have labor bureaus; 10 out of 17 Democratic States, or 59 per cent, have labor bureaus.

Factory-inspection service.—It is well known to all working people that protective labor laws are practically a dead letter in any State unless there is a factory-inspection service organized for the purpose of searching out and bringing to justice persons who violate such laws. It is easy enough to enact protective legislation, but it is another thing to enforce it. If a State, therefore, enacts such laws and fails to organize a service for their enforcement, it is betraying those whom it pretends to favor. Let us again observe the tables: We find that twenty-one out of twenty-eight Republican States, or 75 per cent, have established factory-inspection services. We also find that three out of seventeen Democratic States, or 18 per cent, have factory-inspection services. In examining the other subjects of labor legislation which follow we must not lose sight of the fact that only three of the Democratic States have factory-inspection services organized for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the labor laws which will be under consideration.

Inspection of mines.—Public inspection of mines is required on the same grounds as inspection of factories. The tables show that fifteen of the twenty-eight Republican States and nine of the seventeen Democratic States have established this service.

Child labor in factories.—Ever since the introduction of the factory system, over a century ago, the greatest sufferers from the greed of inconsiderate and cruel employers have been the helpless children, who often at a tender age are placed in factories and are ruined physically, morally, and mentally by their work, their surroundings, and their loss of opportunity for education. It is a principle recognized in all civilized countries that children under 12 years of age should not be employed in factories, and in nearly all European countries laws have been passed placing a limit of 12 or 14 years upon such child labor. In our country thirty-one out of the forty-five States prohibit the employment of children under 12 years of age from working in factories. Of these thirty-one States twenty-one are Republican and ten are Democratic. In other words, 68 per cent of all the Republican States and only 32 per cent of the Democratic States have laws prohibiting children under 12 years of age from working in factories.

Child labor in mines.—Twenty-four States prohibit the employment of children under 12 years of age in mines. Of these, sixteen are Republican and eight are Democratic States.

Woman labor.—Next to children, the greatest victims of abuse

by greedy employers when unrestrained by law are women. Investigations have shown that their condition is sometimes pitiful where employers are given free scope in their employment. Their protection in the interest of humanity and morals has also been the subject of legislation in nearly all civilized countries. In the United States, twenty-seven States have legislated upon this subject. Of these twenty-seven States, twenty-two are Republican and five are Democratic! Reducing these figures to a proportionate basis, we find that 82 per cent of the Republican States and only 19 per cent of the Democratic States have laws regulating woman labor.

Seats for females in shops.—Legislation on this subject needs no comment. Any man who has a daughter or sister employed in a shop or store, and every physician, knows what a hardship it is to a woman to be compelled to stand all day at a bench or behind a counter. Fortunately, in thirty-one States legislation has been enacted requiring employers to provide seats for females. Of these thirty-one States, twenty-three are Republican and eight are Democratic.

Sweat-shop legislation.—There is no greater menace to the health of the working people, and nothing which tends more to lower and degrade human beings, than to crowd them together in small, filthy workshops, where they are often compelled to work, eat, and sleep without regard to health or morals, and where the hours of labor are often so long that the victims, who are usually foreigners unacquainted with our language, are shut out from all opportunities for education or betterment of any kind. The scenes observed in these shops by official investigators have been revolting beyond description. Long ago efforts were made to regulate these so-called "sweat shops," and twelve States have enacted laws looking to this end. Of these twelve States, eleven are Republican and one is Democratic. Nothing more need be said on this point.

Truck system.—This legislation prohibits employers from paying their employees in scrip or orders on their company stores and which are not redeemable in cash. At present twenty-three States have such laws in force, of which fourteen are Republican and nine are Democratic, or 61 per cent of all the Republican and 39 per cent of all the Democratic States.

Mediation and arbitration.—State boards of mediation and arbitration have been established in fifteen States to aid in the adjustment of industrial disputes. Of the fifteen boards eleven are in Republican States and only four in Democratic States.

Free employment bureaus.—One of the great needs of wage-workers who are engaged for only a week or day at a time is some agency that will assist them in obtaining a situation when they are out of work. Private agencies have so frequently exploited their poverty by extorting registration fees for situations that are never procured, that churches and charitable societies now support free employment agencies in many leading cities. A few years ago State and municipal governments also entered the field and now there are public employment bureaus (free) in fourteen States, of which twelve are Republican and only two Democratic.

Employers' liability laws.—Since the introduction of steam and machinery workingmen are exposed to such great risks of death and injury that enlightened States have enacted legislation which requires employers to furnish safe work places and appliances, and make them responsible, in damages, for any injury that may befall an employee through their negligence. Twenty-seven States now have employers' liability laws, most of them relating to railways. Of the twenty-seven States fifteen were Republican and twelve Democratic in the last national election.

Eight-hour law.—For many years labor organizations have been endeavoring to secure legislation prohibiting labor on Government works or public contracts for over eight hours per day. They have succeeded thus far in securing such legislation in twenty-three of the forty-five States of the Union. Of these twenty-three States, sixteen are Republican and seven are Democratic. In other words, of the twenty-eight Republican States, 60 per cent have enacted the eight-hour law, and of the seventeen Democratic States only seven, or 41 per cent, have yielded to the demands of the labor organizations in this regard.

WAGES IN THE UNITED STATES AND EUROPE.

Owing to the vastly superior resources of the United States and the wise legislation which has protected American industries and thereby maintained the American standard of living, wages in the United States are, on the average, about twice as high as in Europe. The following table shows the average daily wage in certain cities of Europe and America, according to statistics gathered by the United States Bureau of Labor:

Year.	Great Britain (27 quotations).	Paris, France (21 quotations).
1876	1.40	1.12
1886	1.39	1.26
1896	1.49	1.33
1902	1.45	1.34

Year.	Liege, Belgium (11 quotations).	United States (255 quotations).
1870	$0.695	$2.20
1876	.63	2.18
1886	.63	2.47
1902	.65	2.50

The latest comparative statistics of wages are contained in an official report made by the statistical office of the board of trade, and published by order of Parliament in August, 1903. The data relate to years between 1895 and 1902 (mainly to years between 1898 and 1901) and pertain to fifteen skilled occupations in the chief city and other cities in the United States, Great Britain, France, and Germany, and the totals are as follows (corrected to a standard year):

Country.	Average weekly rates for 15 skilled trades in—
	Chief cities and towns.	Other cities and towns.
	s.	s. d.
United States	75=$18.00	69 4=$16.65
Great Britain and Ireland	42= 10.00	36 0= 8.65
France	36= 8.65	22 10= 5.50
Germany	24= 5.75	22 6= 5.40

It therefore appears that the average wage for the fifteen trades is nearly twice as high in New York as in London and more than twice as high as in Paris and three times as high as in Berlin. In the smaller cities the superiority of the United States is equally marked, as may be seen in the following comparison:

	Germany.	France.	Great Britain.	United States.
Capital cities	100	151	175	315
Other cities and towns	100	100	159	307

The fact that wages in the United States range three times as high as in Germany in the skilled trades is accompanied by similar evidence for unskilled labor. Thus the German Government reports on workingmen's insurance against sickness and accident (a compulsory system conducted by the Government) showed that on January 1, 1902, the average daily wage of adult male laborers in the thirty-three large cities was only 67 cents, in fifty-eight small cities (places with a population of from 10,000 to 20,000 each) 52 cents, while in the agricultural districts it was 49 cents in the west and 33 cents in the east.

The figures for the fifteen skilled trades included in the official English report are given below with the American equivalents:

The English report notes that a comparison of family earnings is less unfavorable to Europe owing to the fact that more women and children become wage-earners there than in America. On the basis of the investigation of the United States Department of Labor in 1891, covering the textile, iron and steel, coal, and glass industries, the Blue Book arrives at the following relative figures:

Comparison of family incomes.

	Germany.	France.	Great Britain.	United States.
British income taken as 100	69	83	100	123
German income taken as 100	100	120	145	178

The average family income was 23 per cent larger than that in Great Britain, 48 per cent larger than that in France, and 78 per cent larger than that in Germany. But since 1891 wages have risen more rapidly than in France or England.

In the following series of tables wages in Europe and the United States are compared for each of the great branches of industry—agriculture, manufacturing, and transportation.

AGRICULTURE.

The following table shows that the wages of farm laborers in the Northern States of this country are fully 50 per cent higher than in England. The low rates in the South bring down the average for the entire country considerably, thus:

The monthly earnings of English agricultural laborers is stated only for the year 1898; for the other years it has been computed by making the same allowance as in 1898. Wages in the United States are in currency, which in 1875 was at a discount ($114.90 in currency=$100 gold).

MANUFACTURING.

Owing to fluctuations in employment and the varying proportion of women and child workers, the calculation of the average annual earnings of factory employees is always difficult. The following figures are mere estimates, but are derived from the most trustworthy sources and may be accepted as a reasonably close approximation to the actual relative compensation of factory operatives in the leading manufacturing countries.

Average yearly income of men, women, and children employed in manufacturing industries.

Country.	Inquiry.	Date.	Amount of employment in year.	Average annual earnings.
United States	Census	1900	Full time	$438
Great Britain and Ireland.	Wage census	1885–86	do	230
France	do	1893	290 days	210
Germany	Insurance statistics.	1901		201
Austria	do	1890	300 days	150

The method by which the American average wage is computed assumes that every employee worked steadily throughout the year, and is therefore slightly higher than it should be for comparative purposes, but in any event the average would remain near $400, which is notably higher than that in any European country. The fact that the proportion of women and children employed in American factories (about 23 per cent) is smaller than the proportion abroad also tends to exalt the American average, as it properly should. In the English wage statistics about 40 per cent of the employees were women and children and in the French about 26 per cent.

The relative earnings of men, women, and children in American and British factories are shown separately below:

RAILWAY LABOR.

The average yearly earnings of all railway employees in the United States, according to the Interstate Commerce Commission, have ranged between $565 and $570 in the last six or eight years. Reports from twenty-seven companies, employing more than 90 per cent of all the railway men in Great Britain and Ireland, showed that in the first week of December, 1902, the average earnings were $6, which would make the average yearly income not more than $312. On the state railways of Prussia the average annual wages of the employees in the budget of 1898–99 were $335, exclusive of shopmen and trackmen, whose earnings, being considerably smaller, would, if included, bring down this average. In France more than 80 per cent of the railway employees receive less than $1 per day, the average in fact being about 75 cents, which would make the annual earnings lie between $230 and $270, according to the number of working days.

In Prussia the locomotive engineers begin at $286 a year and may attain $523. In the United States engineers average $3.78 a day and $1,200 a year. Firemen—Prussia, from $238 to $357 a year; United States, $2.16 a day and $667 a year. Conductors—Prussia, from $190 to $286 a year; United States, $3.17 a day and $1,004 a year. In Prussia the railway employees are entitled to pensions and other Government privileges, but of course allowances therefor would not add more than 5 or 10 per cent to their earnings.

THE TREND OF WAGES IN RECENT YEARS.

The Bulletin of the New York State Department of Labor for December, 1903, has the following editorial comment on the trend of wages in recent years:

The Bulletin contains a compilation of statistics published by the Federal and other State bureaus of labor to show the tendency of wages in recent years. All the statistics reveal a decline in wages after 1892, but the decline continued for a longer period in some States than in others, depending on the predominating industries of each and also in part upon the month of the year to which the statistics relate. As a general rule the lowest point in the decline was reached in 1895 or 1896, but whatever improvement began then remained unimportant until 1898. Since 1898 the rise in wages has been both important and widespread, so that by 1902 wages had generally reached a higher level than in 1892, the best year of the preceding decade.

In Massachusetts factories, for example, average yearly earnings rose from $396 in 1886 to $452 in 1892, declined to $413 in 1894 and $420 in 1898, and rose to $460 in 1902. In Wisconsin, average annual earnings of factory employees rose from $363 in 1883 to $426 in 1892, declined to $376 in 1894, and rose again to $422 in 1901. In Pennsylvania the 1892 average was surpassed as early as 1899. In striking agreement with the wage statistics of State bureaus are the statistics of unemployment furnished by the Cigar Makers' International Union of America. In 1890 this organization paid to its members out of work (but not on strike) the sum of $22,760.50 in benefits. In 1892 the amount declined to $17,461, but in 1893 it increased 400 per cent, and for three years, 1894–1896, it stood at about $175,000 annually. In 1897 it fell to $117,471, and thereafter steadily declined to only $21,071 in 1902, which, considering the increase in membership (more than 33 per cent), compares favorably with 1892.

The statistical compilation considered in the foregoing analysis appears at pages 445–454 of the New York department of labor's December bulletin and is subjoined:

The recent report of the United States Census Office on wages of factory operatives in 1890 and 1900 alludes to the inevitable incompleteness of statistics for such widely separated periods, in view of which the following statistics of wages in the last decade have been collated from the reports of State bureaus of labor statistics. To supplement these figures two tables are also given containing statistics published by Federal bureaus and covering agriculture, manufacturing, and transportation.[a]

[a] In close agreement with these official statistics are the figures published by the Cigar Makers' International Union of America on the amount annually expended for out-of-work benefits to its members. This fund is distinct from the strike and sick benefits and therefore registers the conditions of employment accurately.

NOTE.—In order to preserve an accurate basis for comparisons the Bureau each year omits establishments that did not report in the preceding year. To illustrate: In 1901 the Bureau reported the average earnings of all employees in factories that made comparative returns in 1900 and 1901 to be $449.63, as stated in the first column. But in the 1902 report the factories reporting were not precisely the same as those included in the preceding year, and a new average income was computed for 1901—namely $449.69, as stated in the second column—which, compared with 1902 average, revealed a gain of $10.29 in the last-mentioned year. As a general rule, little variation is to be noticed in the two averages for any one year.

NEW YORK.

EXPLANATORY NOTE.—The following table gives the results of two separate investigations which are not strictly comparable. The first investigation, made in 1896, shows that after the middle of 1892 wages declined. The second investigation, covering 3,553 identical establishments, reveals a slight fall in wages between 1895-96 and 1896-97. After the middle of 1897 employment and wages increased in a striking manner, and this very increase renders it difficult to calculate an average annual wage. The statistics indicate that the total amount paid out in wages by the 3,553 manufacturers between July 1, 1897, and July 1, 1898, was $151,279,010; but at the beginning of the period they were paying wages to 304,376 workers and at the end to 326,090. It is therefore obviously incorrect to call either $464 ($151,279,010 divided by 326,090) or $497 (the same amount divided by 304,376) the average yearly earnings. The fact is no satisfactory method has yet been discovered of computing the average income when the number of employees fluctuate in this way. The least objectionable method of calculation on the basis of these figures is to divide the total wages by the mean number of employees, 315,233 (one-half the sum of 304,376 and 326,090), which yields an average wage of $480. Similar calculations for 1897 and 1899 yield the averages $459, and $477, as expressed in brackets.

Since 1897 the New York bureau has collected statistics of actual earnings of wageworkers through the officers of workingmen's organizations, reaching in this way 150 wage-earners where one could have been reached by means of individual schedules. As a large proportion of the members of trades unions are well-paid artisans and mechanics of the building trades, their earnings of course average much higher than those of factory employees already given. The New York statistics are based on quarterly reports collected twice a year and thus cover one-half of each year:

Average earnings of organized workingmen, 1897–1903.

Year.	January-March.	July-September.	Average for three months.	Estimated average for one year.	Estimated number of days of employment in year.
1897	$145	$174	$163	$650	254
1898	164	175	169	678	255
1899	172	197	187	747	273
1900	176	182	179	718	265
1901	183	194	189	756	274
1902	184	197	191	765	278
1903	186	190	188	753	278

Experience has shown that earnings in the six months April-June and October-December run about the same as in the six months for which statistics are collected, so that it is not erroneous to estimate the year's earnings on that basis. Between 1897 and 1903 the average yearly earnings of men increased $103 (from $650 to $753), or 16 per cent. As a matter of fact, the real increase was much larger, for the membership of trades unions more than doubled in the above-mentioned period and the new members almost invariably belonged to trades or lived in localities where they worked for lower rates of wages than the old members. As a consequence of these additions the average daily wage appeared to be stationary after 1899, while as a matter of fact it was almost universally advancing. In 1901, for example, 47,585 members of unions obtained advances averaging $1.97 a week, while only 2,968 suffered reductions in weekly wages—and these were principally due to the establishment of shorter hours of work. In 1902, again, 93,225 trades-unionists secured increases in wages averaging $1.78 a week, while only 3,329 sustained decreases. Considering these facts, it seems quite conservative to say that wage rates increased at least 10 per cent between 1897 and 1903. In that period employment increased as follows.

Percentage of working time in which organized working men and women were employed and idle.

Year.	Employed.	Idle.
	Per cent.	Per cent.
1897	69.7	30.3
1898	76.0	24.0
1899	82.0	18.0
1900	79.5	20.5
1901	82.8	17.2
1903	86.1	13.9

The duration of employment in 1903 was therefore 24 per cent greater than in 1897. Assuming that rates of wages increased only 10 per cent in the same interval, their gain in earnings would be 36 per cent. This is doubtless larger than the increase enjoyed by workers in manufacturing industries.

LOWER PRICES IN THE UNITED STATES THAN IN ENGLAND.

The claim is often made that while wages are higher in the United States the cost of living is correspondingly cheaper in Great Britain. That this statement is erroneous can be proved by official statistics obtained simultaneously in both countries. In 1892 the Senate Committee on Finance made an extensive report on "Retail prices and wages" in leading cities of the United States and Europe at different periods from June, 1889, to September, 1891. Among the cities considered in this report were St. Louis, Mo., and Manchester, England, cities for which wage comparisons have just been made.

A comparison of the prices of articles of identically the same description, obtained at the same time, namely, June, 1889, and September, 1891, in both cities, shows that instead of the necessary commodities of life being higher in the United States than in England they are, on the contrary, as a rule much lower. This is shown in the table which follows. A glance at this table shows that most of the necessary food products, such as bread, eggs, lard, bacon, roast beef, hams, mutton, milk, starch, and canned vegetables, were much lower in St. Louis than in Manchester, while the prices of the few remaining food products averaged about the same in both countries.

With regard to clothing and cloth goods, we find that men's hosiery, cotton shirts, sheetings, shirtings, and cotton and woolen dress goods of the same description and quality were cheaper in St. Louis than in Manchester; that carpets, flannels, and cotton underwear averaged about the same, and that only in the case of men's hats was there any decided difference in favor of the Manchester purchaser.

Household articles, such as earthenware, glassware, and cutlery, were nearly the same in price in St. Louis as in Manchester, with a very slight difference in some cases in favor of the latter city. On the other hand, furniture costs from about one-fifth to one-half as much in the United States as in Great Britain, so that for the cost of one bedroom set in Manchester one could buy from two to three sets in St. Louis, and for the cost of one dining table at Manchester a whole dining-room set could be bought in St. Louis.

But the question may be asked, "If the American workingmen earn so much more and pay so much less for what they consume, why are they not all wealthy and contented?" The answer may be found in the statement of the eminent French scientist, Prof. Emile Levasseur, in his work on "L'Ouvrier Americain" (The American Workingman). After summing up the conditions of labor in America as compared with Europe he says that wages in the United States are about double the wages in Europe; that objects of ordinary consumption by working people (excepting dwelling houses) cost less in the cities of the United States than in those of Europe; that the American workingman lives better than the European; that he eats more substantially, dresses better, is more comfortably housed and more often owns his dwelling, spends more for life insurance and various social and beneficial associations, and, in short, has a much higher standard of life than the European workingman.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. DALZELL. I simply desire leave of the House to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to avail myself of this occasion for a few minutes to go back a little into history. When my friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] was making his very brilliant and able speech on the tariff a little while ago, I asked him how he stood upon the Wilson Act; if he would repeal the present tariff and revive the last Democratic measure. I want to read an extract from a speech made by another great Missourian on the 30th day of January, 1894, upon the Wilson bill. All will remember that as a period when this country was enduring the hardest times that we have ever known, and those hard times continued down to the campaign of 1896 and yielded only to the Dingley law. The Wilson bill was being considered in the House, and over its head was a Democratic halo of hope. Here is what an eminent Missourian said on that occasion. I read from the RECORD of the second session of the Fifty-third Congress, page 405:

> The passage of the bill [Wilson bill] will mark the dawn of a brighter day, with more of sunshine, more of the songs of birds, more of that sweetest music, the laughter of children, well-fed, well-clothed, well-housed.
> Can we doubt that in the brighter, happier days to come good, ever-handed, wholesome Democracy shall be triumphant? God hasten the era of equality in taxation and in opportunity. And God prosper the Wilson bill, the first leaf in the glorious book of reform in taxation, the promise of a brightening future for those whose genius and labor create the wealth of the land and whose courage and patriotism are the only sure bulwarks and defense of the Republic. [Applause.]
> As we scan it [the bill] we see the light breaking, and what a bow of promise we behold reflected on its pages. It is but the beginning, a first step on rough ground; but it starts us in the right direction and by the right road. Soon we shall travel fast and journey far.

Such was the brilliant peroration of Hon. DAVID DE ARMOND, of Missouri, when the Wilson bill was passed in 1894. We know how well fed, well clothed, and well housed the people were under that law. We know how it stimulated "the laughter of children." We know what the people did to "that glorious book of reform" when they got a chance in 1896. The voters thought the Democracy "had traveled fast and journeyed far" enough. We know and rejoice that the Dingley bill took its place in 1897. And now my friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] calls attention to the fact that the railroad companies can pay better wages and pay a higher price for steel rails and still make money at the old rates, because, he admits, the business of the country has been so immensely developed under the Dingley law. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEMENWAY. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, after the somewhat stormy and vociferous eloquence of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] I shall discuss a very plain and simple question, and that is the Government Printing Office. If there are any Members of the House who are interested in the question of Government printing and its expense, I should be glad to have their attention, and I should also be glad if those who are not interested would allow me quiet during the remarks that I am to make. Mr. Chairman, the growth of the Government Printing Office and in the expenses of Government printing is perhaps not realized by most Members of the House. I have looked at the data for the Forty-seventh Congress. That was twenty years ago. The entire expense of Government printing at that time was about $2,400,000. Coming down ten years to the Fifty-second Congress, there had been no material increase in the expense of Government printing. It was still about $2,400,000 to $2,500,000. But when we come ten years further down, to the Fifty-seventh Congress, we find that the expense of Government printing has gone up from $2,500,000 to about $6,200,000. In other words, in ten years the expense of Government printing has increased about 150 per cent.

Now, I need not say that there has been no increase either in wealth or in business that would correspond to the vast increase of expense in Government printing, and I think it is perhaps worth while to consider, at no very great length, I hope, what are the reasons of that increase and how far it deserves to be considered and to be checked.

There are some items that may well excite our interest. I find that for the year ending June, 1902, this Government expended for pictures alone—some of them pictures of officials and other persons who wanted their faces to be known to the public, some of them fancy pictures and all sorts of pictures—over $250,000, and a good deal more last year. We pay for pictures as much as the salaries of fifty Congressmen. Perhaps the pictures are worth the services of the Congressmen, but certainly, Mr. Chairman, an item so large as this strikes one with surprise.

Now, this growth in expense is due to a number of things which are worth, perhaps, some little consideration from the Members of the House; because, while we are giving so much time to the increases which we make in Government expenses, it is worth while to give a little time to see if in some place there can not possibly be a reduction.

The first explanation for the great cost of Government printing lies in the fact that the Government does its own printing. Government printing is like all other Government enterprises. I have taken pains to ascertain with some degree of accuracy the relative expenses of printing, and with reasonable accuracy I can say that it costs the Government for a given amount of printing 25 per cent more than the same work done in private offices would cost.

Now, of course, Mr. Chairman, no one for one moment would think of attempting to remedy this by changes in the hours of Government employees or by changes in the wages of Government employees. The thing is as it is; but certainly it is worthy of consideration by gentlemen who, on both sides of the House, at some time suggest as a remedy for the evils of trusts, or as a remedy for the evils of monopolies, that the Government should absorb other and further industries, that this one branch of Government enterprise costs on an average 25 per cent more than it would in the hands of private parties. Take the railroads, Mr. Chairman, for example: There is not a railroad system in the United States of America, no matter how rich, no matter how high a rate of dividends it pays, that would not go into the hands of a receiver if its operating expenses were increased 25 per cent. In other words, Mr. Chairman, there is not a railroad system in the United States that, if its ratio of expense were increased by its being operated by the Government, as the expenses of the Printing Office are increased by its being operated by the Government, would not either land in the hands of a receiver or be operated by the Government at a net loss. So much we may consider as we go by.

Now, a word more in reference to the operation of the Printing Office. I am not here to criticise. I am not familiar enough with the subject to criticise, though I have given it some study since I have been on the Printing Committee. But there are some subjects as to which I think a word should be said. There is one thing that is a marvel to me, and I think it is to many Members of the House, and that is why during all the years that have passed typesetting machines have not been used in the Government Printing Office. I saw the other day that Mr. Ricketts testified or stated that the use of typesetting machines would diminish by 30 per cent the number of employees in the Government Printing Office necessary to do that branch of the work. Why these machines have not been used, why they are not now purchased, I have never heard any explanation. I should suppose that the Committee on Appropriations could order their purchase.

I have spoken to members of the Appropriations Committee and I have been told by them that the Government Printer had authority to make the purchase, and I have been told by others, in behalf of the Government Printer, that the time had not yet come, that the value of these machines had not yet been sufficiently established. Now, Mr. Chairman, when every printing office of any size in the United States of America has so far tested these machines as to find them profitable for use in private business, their value has been sufficiently established, and certainly if the Government is to operate any branch of business it should be operated upon business principles. If the Government had a farm, would it be expected that the corn would be cut and gathered without the use of binders and reapers? Why the same argument should not apply to the use in the Printing Office of every device which is used in private enterprises is a question which is deserving of consideration at the hands of the Committee on Appropriations or any other appropriate committee.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I simply wish to suggest to the gentleman that the Government Printer made the statement which he has quoted, but this year the Government Printer said that the time had come. Consequently I suppose they will be installed.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, it seems to me that the time certainly has come. To some it seemed that the time had long ago come, and I am glad that in the opinion of all it has now been reached.

Now, there is another thing respecting the Government printing, and that applies to many of the branches of Government expenditure, which accounts, as I think, to a large extent for the undue increase in Government expenses. Our Government has become a very large one. There are 80,000,000 of people, and there is an expenditure of $700,000,000 or $800,000,000, and the size and the multiplicity of the items brought before the Committee on Appropriations is, of course, very large. Now, we all of us know that there is no chief of any bureau of this Government or any other government who does not naturally, necessarily, by the operation of common laws of human nature, think that his branch of the government is the one important thing; that the one thing for which appropriation committees exist is to enlarge the field of his operations, to furnish it a larger publicity and a larger force.

That being so, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it is perhaps questionable—and with all deference I make the suggestion to those who have had much more experience in Congressional life than I have had—whether we are not becoming mere clerks to register the requests of a bureau of a department. They tell us what they want, we make a mild reduction, and then grant their request. Take, for instance, this item of printing. I see in the sundry civil bill which we are now to pass upon there is appropriated something over $6,000,000 for printing. Now, I will venture to say, and I say it in no carping sprit, that there is not one member of the committee, with all the great duties that devolve upon them of reporting appropriation bills aggregating three or four hundred millions of dollars, who can give any explanation of where this $6,000,000 goes.

The Department of State comes in and asks so much, the War Department asks so much, the Agricultural Department asks so much, and it is a physical impossibility for the Appropriation Committees, with all the duties devolving upon them, to give any details or explanation of where the money goes and for what it is required. Take that one item of printing, that costs $6,000,000. It is more than some of the small and prosperous States in Europe spend for their entire annual expenditures. It would be better if that item and all items of printing were sent to one committee that could have such opportunities for investigation that if there was a possibility of reducing the expense, if there was a possibility of knowing whether the Departments were intertwining and interlacing with each other, that committee could investigate and intelligently report on the items.

I want to say in no spirit of carping that as to this item for printing the committee reporting it knows nothing except that demands for these amounts are filed by the Departments. Work can be duplicated; a bureau in the Agricultural Department can be sending out substantially the same information as a bureau in the Department of Commerce, and no one be much the wiser. It is the theory, and it ought to be the practice of this Government, that Congress should fix the expenditures of the nation, and not that they should be fixed by a great number of officials, each one trying to get all he can and regarding the development of his branch as the one thing most important to the country.

Let us see how these demands have grown. I have made a few figures which I shall not weary the House long with. But I see, for instance, that ten years ago the Department of State asked for $18,000; the Navy Department asked for $70,000; the Post-Office Department asked for $200,000. In ten years every one of these Departments has doubled the amount. The Navy Department has more than doubled its demand on the public Treasury for the item of printing alone. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that within ten years, if proper supervision were exercised, it would have been necessary for every Department of the Government to double the amount which it receives for the item of printing.

Now, let me say another word, Mr. Chairman, in reference to our procedure, where I think a just criticism can be made. If anyone will look back over the history of the last few years he will find almost every year deficiency appropriations for printing and for Heaven knows how many other things. So far as I can make out, in many Departments they go on and spend what they see fit. The amount appropriated by Congress is not large enough to satisfy the views of chiefs of bureaus who want to publish reports and of chief clerks who occasionally favor us. Apparently the Departments spend money without any reference to the amounts allowed. They spend all they have in a few months, so they are absolutely penniless for the balance of the year, and Congress makes up the deficiency. It is useless to scold about this condition of affairs.

Now, my friend, the friend of us all, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, said that the Departments ought not to exceed the amounts of moneys that were allowed to them. Certainly they ought not. But, Mr. Chairman, there is only one way by which you can stop a Department in spending more money than is appropriated for it, and that is to refuse to appropriate for deficiencies.

Suppose a man has a boy at school, and the boy in six months spends his entire allowance, and his father says to him, "You ought not to do this; you ought not to be so extravagant; you must not spend so much money," and then proceeds to furnish the additional amount of money in order to defray the boy's expenses through the next six months. Will he do better next year? Cut off the boy's allowance so for six months he has nothing and after that he will make the money hold out. You must treat a Government Department in precisely the same way. If it is known absolutely that the expenses of any branch must be kept within the amount appropriated by Congress the amount will be kept down. But if it is known that if the entire amount is expended Congress will grant an additional sum beyond the first appropriation, then it is absolutely certain that the amount will be expended.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words more on another branch of this business. This subject is too large to be treated by any bill that I could introduce; but I have introduced and there will be reported from the Committee on Printing a bill aimed to stop some small amounts of Government waste, and really I should feel very much obliged to the Members of this House if they will take interest enough to consider and pass that bill. I will tell you two or three things that I have sought to remedy in a very small way by conferences with people in the Printing Office and the document room and elsewhere, who are familiar with these questions. Here is an item of $10,000 that might be saved. Ten thousand dollars is not very much, but, after all, the duty is upon every honest legislator to save $10,000 if he can.

I will tell you how this is wasted, and I know it by the statements of Mr. Grayson, whom we all know. There are, for instance, under the law as it is, printed of every bill, including every private bill, and of reports made upon private bills, I think, about 600 copies. Mr. Grayson tells me that 100 is as much as is ever required; and of course, if by any strange chance there should be a special demand for reports on a private bill for more than 100 copies, they can be furnished, because the type is still set up at the office. Every morning at the document room, if any Member of Congress is curious enough to go and see, he will see parcels brought in of four or five hundred copies of reports on pension bills, copies of reports on every private bill, which the boys dump into waste-paper baskets as they come in, without even opening them. From eight to ten thousand dollars would be saved by limiting to the requirements of the office, as shown by experience, in the numbers of copies of bills and of reports on private bills. Nobody has paid any attention to this, though Mr. Grayson says that for a long time he has lamented it.

Besides this, you can go down in the basements of this building and you will see piles and piles and piles of papers and pamphlets and books, for every one of which the Government has paid, and which are of no more value than the sand upon the great desert in the West.

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly; I am always delighted to answer questions.

Mr. MAHON. My experience is, as the gentleman has said, that hundreds of thousands of copies of reports of the Ordnance Department and the Quartermaster Department running up into the hundreds are printed and put to the credit of Members of Congress. I do not get one request in a year for some of those documents, and they are down in the basement rotting away. Now, I want to make this suggestion: Those are reports which are not read by the public generally. Why not publish a sufficient number of them to furnish the Departments, and then a few more copies for outside use, and in this way I think we could cut the appropriation down to $3,000,000. I have investigated it, and I am satisfied that millions of dollars are wasted in public documents which are rotting in the basement. Nobody wants them, and they would not read them if they were sent to them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to hear the gentleman talk about this matter, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania as well. It is almost an everyday thing, and particularly when I get home, that I get documents which I have to try to give away.

Mr. MAHON. And you can not do it?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; that is true; no one wants them, and yet they are handsomely bound, more handsomely bound than your law books or any other lawyer's law books who practices law in the United States, and it is an outrage upon other appropriations that should be made and to the thousands of claimants in this country whose claims are not paid, to spend the people's money in printing and binding them thus. Instead of doing this, throwing the people's money away in that manner, we ought to quit such work and appropriate money in a way so that the people will be glad to get the printed matter.

Mr. PERKINS. Any waste to the people's money is an outrage.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And this is one way it is wasted.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman is entirely right——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We can take this and extend the rural free-delivery system and a whole lot of other good things the people need and beg for.

Mr. SULZER. And increase the letter carriers' pay.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There are a great many things we could do with this money which will be far better for the people and reflect more credit on Congress than such performances.

Mr. PERKINS. Now, I want to say one or two words along this line, and give a few figures to the Members of the House as to how much this waste, this absolute waste, is. Some Members perhaps know that four years ago the superintendent of the folding room was requested to prepare a list of books, bound and unbound, which, in his opinion, were entirely worthless.

Certainly he made a most conservative estimate, because he put in the list of books that may have some value a vast number of books that, in my judgment, have no possible value. But even allowing for that, it appeared at that time that there were on hand, filling up the vaults of the Capitol that might be used for some useful purpose, more than a quarter of a million books. These books are of no value to any man under God's heaven, but they are books for which the United States had to pay. They cost the Government probably half a million dollars, and they fill up the cellars of the Capitol with rubbish. They are of no use to us and they are of no use to our constituents and of no use to anybody.

That thing has gone on still more rapidly, and in the bill I have introduced I have endeavored to cut down the amount of printing of a few things where it seemed to be so manifestly right that I hoped no Member of the House would object. Here, for instance—and this is only for the last four years—are a few figures: There have been placed to the credit of Members of Abridgments of Messages 36,000 copies. How many copies do you suppose have been sent out by all the Members of this House? About 5,000 copies. In other words, there is a distribution to Members, as is shown by actual test, seven times as large as is required. Now, gentlemen, that is waste; it is almost criminal waste. There have been given Members for distribution during the last four years of Labor Reports 14,000, and only 4,000 sent out; of Educational Reports, 20,000, and 5,000 sent out; of Statistical Abstracts, 11,000, and 2,000 sent out.

Mr. OTJEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. OTJEN. Are not these documents that you have referred to valuable documents if Members would send them out when they are first published?

Mr. PERKINS. They are not valuable to many people. They are of small value to anybody except to a small number. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania has well suggested, these could get their distribution from the bureaus, for certainly there should be some distribution to the bureaus, where those interested could get them. There is not a man on this floor who, try as hard as he can to send out books, can not send them all out.

We could get a more satisfactory distribution if all the copies of some documents were left with the document room or the bureaus, for then the few Members who have occasion to use them could get what they wanted, and the rest of us would not be bothered with what we do not want. That, for instance, is true of eulogies of deceased Members. Instead of the distribution being made equally, it would be better to give the bulk of them to the Representatives of the State in which the deceased Member lived. To some extent we accomplish this by writing letters to the other Members, but each one of us knows what a nuisance this is. After all, there is not a man here who has not to his credit hundreds of eulogies that he does not want and nobody else wants.

Mr. OTJEN. The gentleman has mentioned the report of the superintendent of education. I have made a practice of sending those to members of school boards, and they find they are very useful.

Mr. PERKINS. There is some demand for them. We must remember another thing, of course; you could take Shakespeare's works or any good book and if the Government of the United States would publish it and distribute it free, you could get demands without end, but the Government is not in that business. So when you move to reduce the amount of some publication a Member somewhere will say that for his district he wants all the copies that are credited to him and a few more.

But, Mr. Chairman, Government printing must be regulated on reasonable terms. If the demand for any publication is so small as to be confined to one or two districts, and you find the books distributed, compared with the great number undistributed, are costing the Government $50 a book, I take it that no Member will say that the demands of his constituents are so overpowering that he is justified in insisting upon the publication. It is not right to have the Government spend five or ten thousand dollars a year in publishing a report in order that one or two Members may give away half a dozen copies. The constituents would be just as happy without the books, and if it is costing the Government $25 or $50 a volume for the few sent out, manifestly that is too high for them.

Now, this bill I have introduced reduces the Government printing by perhaps $100,000. As I said, it is not much, but it is something. I have reduced, first, the number of documents sent to the document room unbound, which are simply taken and thrown from the hand of the boy who brings them into the waste-basket that receives them, because everybody knows that nobody wants them.

Mr. MANN. What documents does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. PERKINS. Five or six hundred copies of private bills and reports on private bills.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman doesn't mean the ordinary public bills?

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's remark would seem to cover everything that went into the document room.

Mr. PERKINS. I refer to documents that experience has shown there is no demand for.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask for three minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BENTON. I will yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. PERKINS. I want to say a word or two more, because in this bill I have cut off the publication of a few things that it seems to me there is no reason this Government should print.

Here are the reports of the Bureau of American Republics. I do not believe that 10 per cent of the Members of this House know that such a book as the report of the Bureau of American Republics is published at all. I do not believe that book is of any value to any merchant in the United States, that there is any information in it that he can not get from some other place; but because years ago that Bureau was organized and a direction put in the law to publish those reports, every year the Government of the United States pays $22,000 for publishing the reports of the Bureau of American Republics, which I do not believe are worth 22 cents to anybody. I think things of that sort we can safely and profitably cut off.

When the Government's expenses are increasing in so many directions let us indulge in the rare luxury of making a little saving. Such changes will not throw a single man out of employment, but they will prevent the cost of the Printing Office increasing at the fabulous rapidity of the last few years. It is a good thing for the Printing Office as well as for the Government. As one of the most intelligent employees there told me, if the cost of Government printing went on increasing as it had done, the Government Printing Office would be broken down by its own weight. I venture to hope that while we are spending $700,000,000 the House will be willing to consider, and perhaps to pass, a modest bill which will save the country about $100,000 a year and harm no Member and no citizen. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10670) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for other purposes, numbered 16, 22, 23, 25, 29, 49, 50, and 51, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; had asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PROCTOR, Mr. QUARLES, and Mr. COCKRELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 11711. An act granting an increase of pension to Jerome J. Hinds.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TRIMBLE].

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I ask your indulgence for a few minutes while I briefly discuss, in my opinion, one of the most intensely interesting and important measures that is now pending before this body. It is not the question of equality between whites and blacks that my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts has just so eloquently discussed; it is not a question of appropriating hundreds of millions of dollars of the people's money for building war ships and maintaining standing armies to destroy human life, but it is a question of humanity that involves the hopes, peace, prosperity, and happiness of 400,000 men who are to-day engaged in the culture of tobacco in the United States, and of a million and a half of women and children who are dependent upon them for the necessaries of life.

I desire to make a positive and direct assertion, and I ask that it be challenged by any Member on the floor of this House, be he Democrat or Republican—for this is not a partisan question—that by reason of the internal-revenue laws of this country, which are to-day curbing by restrictions, regulations, and placing a tax of 6 cents upon every pound of tobacco that grows out of the ground before it can be properly prepared in its raw or unadulterated state by the producer to conveniently reach the consumer, that hydra-headed monster, the tobacco trust, which arbitrarily fixes the price on the raw product and manufactured article, is grinding these people into the very depth of poverty and industrial degradation. I say to you that by reason of the absolute monopoly of the tobacco business by the trust the Government is to-day virtually paying a bounty of 6 cents upon every pound of tobacco manufactured. When Congress reduced the tax from 12 cents to 6 cents a pound it benefited neither the consumer nor the producer, but practically put into the coffers of the Consolidated American and Continental Tobacco companies last year eighteen millions of dollars.

To help defray the expenses of the Spanish-American war, on July 1, 1898, the tax on manufactured tobacco was increased from 6 to 12 cents per pound, and the manufacturers advanced the price of said article accordingly. In July, 1902, that tax was reduced to 6 cents per pound; yet the manufacturers of tobacco in this country have not reduced the price of the manufactured article a single cent and are paying less for the raw product.

Had the Government retained the tax of 12 cents a pound upon tobacco, instead of collecting $18,000,000 of revenue from this source last year, as shown by the annual report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, it would have collected $36,000,000. I do not make this declaration from hearsay. I hold in my hands the invoices of the leading brands of tobacco manufactured by the tobacco trust, which show that to-day they are asking and selling for identically the same price the same brands of tobacco as when the tax was 12 cents a pound, notwithstanding the tax has been reduced to 6 cents a pound.

Mr. Chairman, the tobacco planters and the people who are depending upon them for a living are crying for relief, but no relief can come to this class of farmers until Congress shall have repealed this tax. Shall we do it and relieve them of this onerous burden, or shall we turn our ears away from the truth and refuse to hear the petitions of this sorely oppressed class of our citizens, and, in refusing to hear them, add insult to their injuries, deride their importunities, and curse them in their calamities? They come to you with their petitions and prayers and ask you to give the product of their fields the same privilege that is given every other staple that grows out of the ground. Put the tobacco planter upon the same plane as the man who grows cotton, corn, wheat, and oats, and every other product that comes out of the earth. It is claimed that tobacco is a luxury, and, therefore, ought to be taxed. Upon this question there is a difference of opinion. If it is a luxury, it is about the only one the poor man can enjoy. In my opinion it is one of the necessaries of life to the world at large. You may go where you will, you may circle this great round globe, and wherever you find the poor laboring man at work you will find him with his pipe and tobacco. It is his solace. It is as necessary almost to his comfort and happiness as the food that goes into his mouth.

Mr. Chairman, for the sake of argument, let's admit that tobacco is a luxury. No one who ever toiled in or knows anything about its cultivation will for a moment say that it is a luxury to produce. It requires more ceaseless toil to produce it than any other crop that grows out of the earth. It requires from twelve to sixteen months to grow and market a crop of tobacco. The plant beds are sown in February and March. The crop is transplanted in May and June. It is cut and put in the barn in August and September, and after going through a drying and curing process for from four to six months is stripped and prepared for market. Therefore, if tobacco be a luxury, it is in its consumption and not in its production. That you may understand more fully the deplorable conditions of this class of farmers, I submit to you resolutions adopted by a mass meeting of tobacco growers of Kentucky and Tennessee, held at Guthrie, Ky.

We, the tobacco growers and dealers of Kentucky and Tennessee, in convention assembled at Guthrie, this, the 25th day of January, 1904, do hereby petition and most respectfully represent:

That in the midst of the vaunted prosperity said to be deluging the other parts of our blessed country the tobacco-raising sections are in the very throes of calamity, the people hard up, farm laborers in want, nobody prospering, everything languishing.

That the effect of the revenue laws relating to tobacco has been to bring to the verge of ruin one of the richest counties God has made, destructively damaging to landlords and farmers, distressingly impoverishing to tenants and laborers, by placing it within the power of buyers and corporations to fix the price and combine to control it; that no other county in the United States has been so oppressed, having its natural fertility and wealth-producing powers rendered nil; that no other product of the soil is thus taxed and singled out for trusts to prey upon; that no other people are ground to powder by permission of the law.

That the effect of the law is to destroy competition among buyers and limit the growers' market; that if the grower were permitted to stem and twist his product and sell it in any quantity anywhere, in any quantity to anybody, he could thus reach the consumer and there would result a wider market, competitive demand, and living prices.

That under the prevailing system the grower can only sell a small quantity in the hand; that all the people about him to whom he might sell are growers like himself, or nearly all, and therefore he has no one to whom he might sell; that the small quantity he might sell would not justify him going into nontobacco regions to find customers; that he therefore has no one else to sell his crop to except the combined agents; that there is no longer competition in buying, the leading tobacco markets of the world have been abandoned by the army of buyers and agents from abroad, from all the principal countries of Europe, who sat daily around the tobacco boards and bid against each other; that the auction rooms are dismantled and abandoned, and where activity and prosperity once surged is now desolation and emptiness; that a few buyers for corporations, all in combination, alone remain to fix the price and take as much or as little as they wish; that there is no one else to whom they may sell—no exemption, no rivalry—and the result is that prices rule barely above the starvation point.

That the revenue law is directly responsible for this by depriving the grower of the right to sell his product to consumers stemmed and twisted into a shape that can be handled and used and in amount that would be any considerable part of the country's product; that to take off the handcuffs and allow him to stem and twist and sell it without limitation will create competition and bring tobacco to its worth.

That it is demonstrable, at least in the tobacco regions that we represent, that this suggestion will not decrease the revenues; but even if it does, even if it cost millions, is the Government warranted in punishing its people for revenue? Is it fair and just to select us from among all other tillers of the soil for unmerited punishment through unjust taxation?

Therefore we earnestly petition and pray the Congress of the United States to so amend the revenue laws as to permit any person (farmer, merchant, or dealer) to sell leaf tobacco in the hand, leaf tobacco stemmed, leaf tobacco stemmed and twisted, not mixed with any foreign ingredient or flavoring, to the consumer or to the trade in any quantity free of any tax whatever.

I am asked what will give relief. My answer is the passage of H. R. 3574, which I introduced in the first session of the present Congress, which reads as follows:

A bill for the relief of farmers and tobacco growers of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That farmers and growers of tobacco shall hereafter have the right to sell tobacco in the raw or unadulterated state, of their own growth, in any quantity, either in the leaf, twist, or such other form as they may wish, free from any tax or charge, or being in any manner subject to statutory regulation on the part of the Government of the United States.

This bill has been published and submitted through the press to the tobacco growers in every section of the country in the United States where tobacco is grown. The Kentucky legislature adopted resolutions requesting Congress to pass this bill. In has been indorsed by the White Burley Tobacco Growers' Association and more than 50,000 petitioners from every section of the country. Its passage will prevent the arbitrary fixing of the price of raw leaf or the manufactured product. It will be an equitable, automatic governor of prices, protecting producer and consumer and working no injury to the manufacturer who is satisfied with a legitimate profit on his capital. We do not ask you to take the tax off the manufactured article. We ask you to let the grower stem and twist his crop, and thereby put it in a convenient form to reach the consumer without paying this onerous and iniquitous tax. We say that because of this tax we have but one buyer in this country, one buyer from foreign countries, and because of this tax a foreign corporation is robbing the American tobacco growers every year on an average out of $14,000,000. You ask how this is done.

I will tell you how it is done. A foreign corporation cooperates with an American trust to control the price of tobacco. We ship annually on an average 350,000,000 pounds of tobacco to foreign countries. That tobacco is to-day being bought for 4 cents a pound, 2 cents a pound less than it costs to produce it. And why? Because the grower has to sell to the trust, there being no other buyer, or let it rot in his barn. Not a pound of tobacco should leave these shores for less than 8 cents a pound, which is but a fair living price. This foreign corporation to-day pays for 350,000,000 pounds of tobacco $14,000,000, when, if you will repeal this iniquitous tax and give us an opportunity to reach the consumer, that same tobacco would bring from foreign countries $28,000,000 instead of $14,000,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman if Mr. Yerkes does not state that this tax of which the gentleman is speaking does not produce any revenue to the Government?

Mr. TRIMBLE. Not one dollar of revenue is gotten by the Government from raw stemmed or unstemmed leaf tobacco which is exported.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It serves as a restriction and a burden, however, on the tobacco grower's tobacco when a nonproducer buys it of the grower and then sells to the people. Then the nonproducer must pay 6 cents per pound tax.

Mr. TRIMBLE. It does.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And does not produce a particle of revenue.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Here is some tobacco in its raw or natural state, just as it comes off the stalk and ready to sell to the manufacturer or exporter, for they are virtually the only buyers the grower can conveniently reach. That tobacco can now be sold to the consumer, provided the man who grows that tobacco delivers it with his own hands; but although that tobacco may be grown on my own farm, I can not sell it to a consumer and deliver it to him by a hired man or an agent. I submit a letter from the Commissioner, that you may understand the construction of the law and the hardship on the grower in this report. It reads thus:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., April 7, 1903.

SIR: In your letter dated 2d instant you present several questions concerning the sale of leaf tobacco by and for farmers who raise the tobacco, or who receive the same from tenants, or who buy the same while it is growing in the fields, and also whether a number of farmers may employ an agent to travel from place to place and sell the tobacco for them.

GROWER CAN NOT DELEGATE AUTHORITY TO SELL FOR HIM.

In reply you are informed that a farmer or grower of tobacco may sell tobacco of his own growth or raising, or that which he receives from his tenants as rent for land, without restriction as to the quantity sold or the business of the person to whom the tobacco is sold and delivered. This privilege is one which the farmer or grower can not delegate to another person.

My bill allows him to "delegate"—sell by another person, his agent.

The Office has decided that where a grower of tobacco sells his crop before it is severed from the land to another person, the purchaser would not be privileged to resell the tobacco to consumers without payment of the tax.

My bill allows free trade in leaf tobacco.

A farmer or grower of tobacco may place his tobacco in the hands of a qualified dealer in leaf tobacco to be sold by him on commission, and such dealer must sell the tobacco only to other qualified leaf dealers or to qualified manufacturers of tobacco or cigars, or to persons who buy leaf tobacco in packages for export.

My bill removes this restriction.

Any arrangement made by a farmer, or a number of farmers, with another person to sell and deliver his or their tobacco for him or them while traveling from place to place would be in violation of law. An agent who is paid a stipulated salary may travel and solicit orders for the sale of tobacco raised by another person, but he may not deliver the tobacco to purchasers; nor can he sell tobacco on commission, or receive as compensation for his services the difference between the price as fixed by the farmer and the selling price.

My bill abrogates these limitations.

All tobacco sold by an agent for the farmer who raised the tobacco must be delivered by the farmer, and not the agent, directly to the person who purchased the tobacco; and a farmer must sell his tobacco in the condition in which it was cured on the farm, and can not stem, twist, plait, roll, sweeten, or otherwise manipulate it for sale to consumers.

Respectfully,

J. W. YERKES, Commissioner.

If I take the stem out of that tobacco and make it into a twist—you see, this is in a dry state, so that it can not be handled—so that the consumer can smoke or chew it, then I have to pay a tax of 6 cents a pound to the Government, although I grow the tobacco on my own farm. No other product of the farm is restricted by such an abominable and infamous law. The tax on tobacco is the only tax levied on an agricultural crop. Mr. Chairman, tobacco was the first and at one time the only legal tender known to our country, and from the foundation of the Government until the war between the States it enjoyed free trade, and what was then known as the tobacco sections of the country were full of beautiful farms dotted over with elegant homes, the people were thrifty, prosperous, and happy. The great civil war came on. The Government needed both money and men to subdue the little band of gray-coated boys who were fighting for what they thought was right. It was then, July, 1862, that the present internal-revenue system was established. Blaine, in Twenty Years of Congress, says:

It was one of the most searching, thorough, comprehensive systems of taxation ever devised by any government. Spirituous and malt liquors and tobacco were relied upon for a very large share of revenue, a considerable sum was expected from stamps, and 3 per cent was exacted from all annual incomes over $600 and less than $10,000, and 5 per cent—afterwards increased to 10 per cent—on all incomes exceeding $10,000. Manufactures of cotton, wool, hemp, iron, steel, wood, stone, earth, and every other material were taxed 3 per cent. Banks, insurance and railroad companies, telegraph companies, and all other corporations were made to pay tribute. The butcher paid 30 cents for every beef slaughtered, 10 cents for every hog, 5 cents for every sheep. Carriages, billiard tables, yachts, gold and silver plate, and all other articles of luxury were levied upon heavily. Every profession and every calling, except the ministry of religion, was included within the far-reaching provisions of the law and subjected to tax for license.

Bankers and pawnbrokers, lawyers and horse dealers, physicians and confectioners, commercial brokers and peddlers, proprietors of theaters and jugglers on the street, were indiscriminately summoned to aid the National Treasury. We were levying "taxes upon every article which enters the mouth or covers the back or is placed under the foot; taxes on everything which is pleasant to see, hear, feel, smell, or taste; taxes upon warmth, light, and locomotion; taxes on everything on the earth and waters under the earth; taxes on everything that comes from abroad or is grown at home; on the sauce which pampers man's appetite and on the drug that restores him to health; on the ermine which decorates the judge and the rope which hangs the criminal; on the poor man's salt and the rich man's spice; on the brass nails of the coffin and the ribbons of the bride.

The system of internal revenue, of which the foregoing is no exaggeration, proved in all respects effective. Congress rendered the taxes more palatable and less oppressive to the producer by largely increasing the duties on imports by the tariff act of July 14, 1862, thus shutting out still more conclusively all competition from foreign fabrics. The increased cost was charged to the consumer, and taxes of fabulous amount were paid promptly and with apparent cheerfulness by the people. The internal revenue was bounteous from the first, and in a short period increased to a million of dollars per day for every secular day of the year. The amount paid on incomes for a single year reached $73,000,000.

Mr. Webster said that "Hamilton smote the rock of national resources and abundant streams of revenue gushed forth." Since the war all the hardships imposed upon home industries and products by this drastic measure have been repealed with the single exception of tobacco, which for more than forty years has carried a tax of from 2 to 40 cents a pound, thereby converting hundreds of millions of dollars into the Treasury.

I am asked why, if this tax is such a hardship, relief has not been asked before this time. I will tell you. In the first place, the tobacco-tax question has been agitated more or less for the last twenty years, but that you may understand the deplorable condition under which the grower of tobacco now labors and the combination of circumstances, or, I might say, the artificial means used, by which every grower of tobacco is reduced to a condition of serfdom which is becoming unbearable and which ought not to be allowed to exist in any government, and which will continue indefinitely unless relief by the passage of a measure which will take Government restrictions, regulations, and tax off of the product in its raw or unadulterated state in any form—in other words, give tobacco the same rights and privileges that corn, wheat, cotton, and other products of the earth now enjoy—it would be necessary for me to refer you to the conditions existing before the organization of the tobacco trust and a brief summary of the history of that organization and its present method of doing business.

A few years ago the manufacture of tobacco in all of its forms and the sale of the manufactured article was in the hands of many thousand different individuals and corporations, each competing with the other in the purchase of the raw material and the sale of the manufactured article. Prices then were controlled alone by the law of supply and demand, and the growers received a fair price for their labor and a reasonable income on the capital invested, and the consumer only paid a fair price for the manufactured article.

In 1890 the American Tobacco Company was organized under the laws of New Jersey, with an immense capital, for the ostensible purpose of manufacturing tobacco in all of its forms, but with the real design of crushing out all competition in buying tobacco in its raw condition and in selling the manufactured article. How well it succeeded the present condition of the tobacco business and the general uprising of the people in opposition to the methods of the trust clearly indicate. Immediately after its organization it began to purchase competing tobacco factories in this and foreign countries, and paying for them in stock in the new concern at fabulous prices, many times more than these factories were worth. It engaged in the manufacture of tobacco in competition with other factories, and as it progressed in business whenever a formidable competitor was encountered it would be offered the alternative of favorable inducements to join the trusts or forced into bankruptcy by ruinous competition.

In December, 1898, a similar concern was organized under the laws of New Jersey, known as the Continental Tobacco Company, with a capital equally as great as the American Tobacco Company, which engaged in the business of absorbing minor factories in the same way as the American had done. While the Continental was apparently a competitor of the American, yet it was known that the promoters of the Continental were the same as the organizers of the American.

These two concerns continued as separate organizations until June, 1901, when another corporation, known as the Consolidated Tobacco Company, was organized by the same persons and for the same purposes that its predecessors had been formed, with a capital representing more millions than was ever conceived of by the Count of Monte Cristo in his wildest hallucinations.

A short time after the organization of the Consolidated Tobacco Company it acquired 88 and 90 per cent of the common stock of the American and Continental companies, respectively, which gave it control of these concerns, with all the factories engaged in the manufacture of plug, smoking tobacco, snuff, and cigars, and the wholesale and retail establishments engaged in selling tobacco, cigars, snuff, etc., which they had acquired. After this gigantic combination was formed the Consolidated Tobacco Company began a war of extermination against all independent factories which had not been absorbed by the American and Continental companies, and which were liable to compete with it in business.

In a short time a great majority of these independent concerns were either driven out of business or were forced to sell their plants to the trust, the result of which was that at the close of the year 1901 the Consolidated Tobacco Company owned and had control of 80 per cent of all the tobacco factories engaged in the manufacture of tobacco in any form in the United States and in many foreign countries.

The capital stock of this colossal combination, including stock of minor corporations owned and controlled by it, amounted to one-half billion of dollars. How much of this was watered stock no one other than the promoters will ever know, and they will never tell. Notwithstanding this unheard-of capitalization, this gigantic concern, in December, 1901, less than seven months after its organization, declared and paid a dividend of 20 per cent on its entire capital stock, and this, it will be remembered, was shortly after the close of the Spanish-American war, when the tax on manufactured tobacco was 12 cents per pound, and since the reduction of the tax from 12 to 6 cents per pound the trust has made no change in the price it pays for the raw tobacco or the price at which it sells the manufactured article.

To enable this corporation to make an annual dividend equal to one-fifth of its entire capitalization, real and fictitious, the trust forces the growers to sell their tobacco to it at less than the cost of production, with labor at from 50 to 75 cents per day, and sells the manufactured article to the consumer at from six to ten times more than it allows the growers for it. When it is understood that in the manufacture of tobacco a large amount of cheap, low-grade sugar, molasses, and licorice, worth only a few cents per pound, is worked into the raw material to make the manufactured article, some idea of the immense profits realized by the trust may be understood.

Under the internal-revenue laws of the United States, which we are attempting to modify, if a grower takes the stem out of the tobacco grown by him, so that it may be twisted and put into a convenient form and sold direct to the consumer, all the laws applicable to the manufacturers of tobacco becomes applicable to him, and he is required to pay a Government tax of 6 cents per pound thereon.

Under the laws the grower is denied the right to make advantageous disposition of his crop, and is thereby placed at the mercy of the trust. The situation is simply this: The trust owns and controls 80 per cent of all the tobacco factories of the world, consuming 80 per cent of all the tobacco produced in the United States, and it therefore, with the assistance of the laws of the Government, forces every producer to sell to it, as I have shown, thus destroying every vestige of competition of the purchase of tobacco in its raw state, as well as the sale of the manufactured article. The consequence is that the trust under present conditions has the power to arbitrarily fix the price of every pound of tobacco that it purchases or sells without regard to its real value.

The growers of tobacco do not ask the aid of the law to destroy the trust, nor do they ask the aid of the law to force the trust to deal with them fairly and on business principles; but they do ask that the law be so modified that they may be allowed to prepare their tobacco in its pure, raw, or unadulterated state in any form they deem most convenient to reach the consumer; and after being so prepared all persons shall have the right to buy and sell the same without Government tax, restrictions, or regulations. Under these conditions they can compete with the trust and sustain themselves without the aid of the Government. [Applause.]

Why should a grower of tobacco be required to pay a heavy tax for the privilege of preparing the product of his land so that it may be sold to the consumer? The argument in favor of such a law is no more plausible than to say a farmer should not shuck his corn, thrash his wheat, gin his cotton, or make bacon out of his hogs without paying such a tax.

We are aware the trust will oppose the passage of a measure of this character and will use the argument which at first blush seems plausible and contend that the passage of the law would deprive the Government of a large amount of revenue. In answer to this argument, we insist that the amount of revenue which the Government would be deprived of by the passage of this bill would be inconsiderable, for the reason that if a grower were allowed a market for his tobacco other than the trust affords the trust would be forced to meet competition and pay a fair price. And no grower of tobacco, when he could sell it at a fair price in the "hand," could ever afford to take the time and trouble to twist and stem it so as to sell it to the consumer. Under ordinary circumstances they would always prefer to sell direct to the manufacturer, but if the trust should undertake to unjustly oppress the grower, as it is now doing, by fixing the price of tobacco in the hands of the growers in its unstemmed condition at less than it is worth or out of proportion to what it charges for the manufactured article, the grower could, as a matter of self-defense, seek another market by selling to the consumer, independent of the trust.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Kentucky permit me to ask a question?

Mr. TRIMBLE. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky how much, in his opinion, it would depreciate the revenue to give the farmer the right to stem and twist and give absolute free trade in tobacco in its raw and unadulterated state?

Mr. TRIMBLE. I am glad the gentleman has asked the question. I will read from the hearing before the Ways and Means Committee in regard to this bill. Mr. Yerkes, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, was asked the same question you have asked me, and his response was:

> It is very difficult, Mr. Chairman, for me to say exactly what amount of tax the Government would lose by the enactment of the second section, even after as thorough examination as I could make by correspondence with the collectors throughout the United States, and by examining all the records to which we have access and trying to reach an accurate statement as to the amount of tax annually secured by the Government through the 6 cents per pound levied on the twisted tobacco as distinguished from other forms of manufactured tobacco. But I do not believe the Government receives to-day more than $700,000 or $750,000 per year as the result of the tax upon twisted manufactured tobacco.

Mr. Chairman, I regret to say that in the hearing before the committee considering this bill it seemed the only object of the committee (and I say this with due deference to the gentlemen of the committee) was to ascertain not what would be the best interest of the growers, but how it would affect the revenue of the Government. Just think of that—and I am going to address myself to the Republicans of this House, because you absolutely dominate and control legislation; therefore the responsibility for the passage of this measure rests upon your shoulders. No law can come from this House unless you say it shall be the law [applause], and I want the tobacco growers of the United States, who constitute one of the great class of farmers who produce the wealth and pay the taxes of this country in times of peace, and fight its battles in time of war [applause], to know if they do not get relief it will be the fault of the Republican Members of this House. [Applause.] It will be because they love the trust more than the welfare of the people. [Applause.] My Republican friends, I want you to listen to the admonition of that martyred statesman and patriot, Abraham Lincoln, the greatest of all Republicans, when he warns you "not to put the dollar above the man."

When you take the position that you can not give relief to these suffering people because it will reduce the revenue, you "do put the dollar above the man." [Applause.] You weigh human misery in the balance and deliberately put a price upon human happiness [applause], for I tell you as I stand upon this floor, pleading for the welfare of the tobacco growers of the United States, I do not speak to you from the standpoint of a kid-glove politician. [Applause.] I live among them; I mingle with them; I am one of them; I know them in their comings and their goings, in their hopes and their fears, their trials and disappointments, and I tell you these people are to-day sorely oppressed and are being ground between the upper and nether millstone of Government and monopoly, the Government holding their hands while monopoly robs them of the fruits of their toil, reducing men, women, and children to a condition worse than Russian peasants and Mexican peons and filling this God-blessed but man-cursed land of ours with bloated plutocrats and hungry paupers. [Applause.] Remember, Mr. Chairman, that this nation is indebted to the farmer more than to any other class of people for all that it has been, for all it is to-day, and for all it can ever hope to be, for it is he, with his brain and brawn, sweat and toil, who tills the soil and from its fertility brings forth this nation's primary wealth. I appeal to you not to destroy him, for Goldsmith well expressed it when he said:

> Princes and lords may flourish or may fade,
> A breath can make them, as a breath has made,
> But a bold peasantry, a nation's pride,
> When once destroyed can never be supplied.

[Applause.]

Should Congress grant the relief asked, the trust would be forced to allow the grower, in addition to the price it now pays, a part of the unreasonable profits which it is realizing under present conditions. Therefore it will never be to the interest of the growers to stem their tobacco, and they will sell it to the trust and the Government will receive the same or practically the same amount of revenue from the manufacture of tobacco that it now collects. The passage of such a measure will act as a wholesome check on the trust in fixing the price of manufactured tobacco, as well as in allowing a fair and reasonable price to the grower. In other words, it will prevent the arbitrary fixing of the price of raw leaf or the manufactured product. It will be an automatic, equitable governor of prices, protecting both producer and consumer and working no injury to the manufacturer who is satisfied with a legitimate profit on his capital. The law of supply and demand will be allowed to govern prices between growers, manufacturers, and consumers, to which no honest person ought to object.

For the sake of argument, suppose the claim of the trust that by the passage of the measure the Government will lose a considerable amount of money in the way of taxes. We contend that no government is justified in impoverishing a certain class of her people for the sake of collecting taxes on any commodity of agriculture or should so frame its laws that in order to collect such taxes a gigantic trust would be fostered and given a monopoly of the purchase of the raw material and sale of the manufactured articles of such an important product as tobacco. We contend that but for the laws as they now exist the Consolidated Tobacco Company could not maintain this monopoly of the tobacco business, in all of its branches, in the United States, as it is doing to-day, by means of which it is unjustly oppressing hundreds of thousands of the best and most loyal citizens of the Government and depriving them of the means of providing the necessaries and comforts of life for themselves and families.

These people ask no exclusive privilege. They contend that the trust has taken advantage of the revenue laws, and by means thereof have destroyed all competition among the purchasers of tobacco, and by reason of these conditions the trust arbitrarily fixes any price it sees proper at which the grower shall sell his tobacco, whether it be one-half or one-fourth of its value, and thereby unjustly convert to its own use innumerable millions of dollars in the way of profits, more than the Government can ever hope to realize in the way of taxes.

The growers of Burley tobacco now have an organization for the purpose of securing from the trust a fair price for their tobacco, and representatives of this organization have had repeated conferences with the managers of the trust, seeking to bring about better conditions. The officers of the trust admitted that they were not paying the growers what their tobacco was worth, nor what, as they claim, they would like to pay them for it, but they contend that if they paid them what their tobacco was worth one year, the next year the growers would raise such a large crop that the business of the trust would be disorganized, and other interests would engage in the manufacture or rehandling of tobacco in opposition to the trust, by reason of which the trust could not handle or manage their business as successfully as under present conditions. The representatives of the Growers' Association offered to conform to any reasonable conditions that the trust might see proper to impose, all of which was declined by the trust, and the growers were given to understand that the trust would fix whatever price it saw proper on the tobacco, and the growers could raise tobacco at the price fixed by the trust or could go out of business, thus admitting that the trust controls the size of every crop of tobacco by the price it fixes on the tobacco in its raw condition.

It is a well-known fact that every year as soon as the time for preparing tobacco beds or setting the tobacco out arrives after the growers have sold their tobacco there is a very decided increase in the market price, but as soon as the new crop in the hands of the growers is ready for market the price drops back to the price at which the trust determines the grower shall sell.

To discontinue raising tobacco will work a great hardship in many instances, especially in the Burley territory. Burley tobacco, as you know, can only be produced in about forty counties in the world, and about thirty-five of these are in Kentucky, two or three in Ohio, and about the same number in Indiana, which are contiguous to central Kentucky, which is peculiarly adapted to raising this tobacco. The demand for this particular type of tobacco is increasing in every part of the world, and the soil which produces it is being rapidly impoverished each year. Besides, these farmers at a great expense have built barns in which to cure the tobacco, and for them to be forced to discontinue raising it would entail a great loss. Under favorable conditions raising Burley tobacco would be the most profitable business in which these farmers could engage, and for this reason farmers have for several years continued raising it and submitting to the oppression of the trust, hoping some means would be adopted for their relief.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman said a while ago that when the war tax of 12 cents a pound was collected on this manufactured tobacco the manufacturers sold it at the same price for which they are to-day selling it, when the tax is only 6 cents a pound.

Mr. TRIMBLE. That is exactly what I said. I have here the original invoices of tobacco manufactured by the American Tobacco Company, showing that they sold the Star brand at 42 cents a pound on May 29, 1902. I have here another invoice showing that they sold this same Star brand on the 4th of March, 1904, at 42 cents a pound. The Government has reduced the tax from 12 cents to 6 cents a pound, which reduces their expense just 6 cents upon every pound manufactured, but neither the producer nor consumer has derived any benefit by the reduction.

As I have stated, last year this Government collected on manufactured tobacco in internal revenue, at 6 cents a pound, $18,000,000 in round numbers. Had the tax been 12 cents a pound it would have collected $36,000,000, and nobody would have been the worse. Thus you practically give these tobacco manufacturers a bounty of $18,000,000; and at the same time you are tying the hands of the tobacco producers, while they are being robbed by this gigantic monopoly.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. One question, if the gentleman pleases. If the consumer did not get the benefit of the reduction from 12 cents a pound to 6 cents a pound, why does the gentleman think he would get the benefit of a reduction from 6 cents a pound to nothing?

Mr. TRIMBLE. The gentleman does not seem to comprehend the meaning of this measure, and certainly the language is plain enough. Its object is not to reduce or in any way interfere with the revenue on manufactured tobacco, but to remove Government restrictions, regulations, and tax from raw tobacco, either stemmed or twisted. If we are allowed to go into the open market with the price of the product controlled simply by the law of supply and demand, we ask nothing more; but to-day, by reason of Government regulations, we have but one buyer; the price of the product is controlled by one firm, which arbitrarily fixes the price of both the raw and the manufactured article.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The gentleman knows that I am in sympathy with his view. I am asking simply for information. If the reduction of the tax from 12 to 6 cents a pound gave the consumer no benefit——

Mr. TRIMBLE. Not a dollar——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Why may not a reduction from 6 cents a pound to nothing work in the same way? Has the gentleman the figures showing the price that the producer of the tobacco was receiving when the tax was 12 cents a pound?

Mr. TRIMBLE. I have not the identical figures here, but I know the facts are as I am stating them. I am a producer of tobacco myself.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Then what did you get for your tobacco?

Mr. TRIMBLE. In a part of the country the tobacco is cheaper than ever. In certain other districts the price is nominal. I will tell the gentleman the reason. The fact to be recognized is the competition. I believe that if you would to-day give, not to the farmers, the producers, but to the product, a free, unrestricted, untaxed trade, allowing the tobacco to be sold in any form while it is in the raw or unadulteratad state; if you would allow it to reach the consumer in that form, I do not believe that the revenue of the Government would be reduced, but there would be created a healthy competition.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Let me ask the gentleman again whether he can give us figures showing the price that the producer received for his tobacco when it was taxed 12 cents a pound and the price which he realizes now, when it is taxed 6 cents a pound?

Mr. TRIMBLE. I can not give the gentleman the exact figures; but I will tell him that now the price of the raw leaf tobacco of the dark type is 4 cents a pound, and it can not be raised for less than 6 cents.

Mr. FLOOD. In that part of the tobacco-growing country which I represent the price of tobacco has gone down during the past six years about 4 cents a pound. If the gentleman would give me the time, I could explain the reason of this.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, may I have the attention of the gentleman from Connecticut? What was his question?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The question I asked was this: The gentleman seems to be working on the theory that with the tax at 12 cents a pound the reduction to 6 cents went entirely to the trust. Now, the question I asked was whether the taking off the remaining 6 cents would not allow that 6 cents equally to go to the trust? Would the producer get the benefit? I asked as an illustration of that if the gentleman would not quote the price that he as a producer received when the tax was 12 cents a pound, and also quote the price which he gets now with the tax at 6 cents a pound. The gentleman from Virginia states that the price is about 4 cents a pound less now than it was then, and that the price is about 4 cents a pound. Now, it seems to me likely to work out in this way, that if there was a reduction of 4 cents a pound to the producer as the result of taking off the 6-cent tax, and if the price was now 4 cents a pound, theoretically, at least, he would not get anything if the other 6 cents a pound was taken off.

Mr. STANLEY. It would operate in this way: By taking this tax off twisted tobacco entirely the benefit of the reduction of that would inevitably go to the trust wherever the trust sold the twist. But the farmer can make a better twist for less money than the trust can, because he can make it at home without additional expense.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The gentleman is not talking about twisted tobacco, but raw tobacco.

Mr. STANLEY. On raw tobacco it will operate in the same way. If the trust sells it, the trust will get the benefit of it, and if the farmer sells it, the farmer will get the benefit of it, and our theory is that the farmer will beat the trust on it.

Mr. TRIMBLE. In answer to the gentleman's question, I want to say to you that raw leaf tobacco is cheaper to-day than it was when the tax was 12 cents a pound. Now, when we are asking to take the tax off and give us unrestricted, unregulated, untaxed trade in the raw leaf, we are not striking at the trust, but we want competition. If you will give us the chance that we have not got to-day, I as a tobacco grower can twist my tobacco and sell it, a thing which I can not do to-day. To-day I can not twist my own tobacco and give it away. The Government comes in and says, "When you take the stem out of your tobacco in its raw state or in any other form, you become a manufacturer, and you are subject to all the rules and restrictions of a manufacturer." Now, if you take the restrictions and the regulations of the Government tax off the raw leaf and let the farmer twist it, he can go to the crossroads merchant, the city grocery, the mining camp, the cotton plantations of the South—he can go to the consumer direct and sell it; but to-day he is restricted, and he must go to the tobacco trust for his market and ask the tobacco trust, "What can you give us for our tobacco?" And there is no alternative except to sell it to the tobacco trust.

Mr. BOUTELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STANLEY. If my colleague [Mr. TRIMBLE] will yield.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. TRIMBLE. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELL. I should like to ask the gentleman whether his attention was called to an article in this morning's Post headed "Tobacco prices high—Advance of $1 per 100 pounds in Petersburg market—Expectation of a short crop," etc.? In the dispatches from Petersburg and Danville it speaks rather as if the farmers were dictating to the trust instead of the trust dictating to the farmers. It says one purchaser got a thousand dollars for a load, and so on.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Well, I suppose we all know that the farmer dictates to the trust and everybody else in this country! [Laughter.] We all know that. At least an effort is made in some of our campaigns to make people believe that the trusts do not hurt anybody, but that they are organized for the welfare of the common people. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELL. The question I should like to ask my friend from Kentucky is whether this applies to any certain kinds of tobacco?

Mr. TRIMBLE. It does. I will tell you about tobacco.

Mr. BOUTELL. Because we are very much interested in the question.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Tobacco grows on a stalk—from five to twenty leaves on each stalk. The leaves of a crop of tobacco, according to their quality, sell from one-half cent up. The general average is what we are talking about. I have seen a hogshead of tobacco sell for $30 a hundred, and I have seen other tobacco, raised on the same place, that would not bring a dollar a hundred.

Mr. LAMB. That increase in price that is spoken of there is a temporary thing anyway.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman is speaking about Danville tobacco. The Danville tobacco is not an export tobacco, whereas the dark tobacco that is raised in Kentucky and Tennessee is exported—about 80 or 90 per cent of it—and that export tobacco business is controlled by the tobacco trust absolutely, as much so as you control your hat or your horse.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a question?

Mr. BOUTELL. With the consent of the gentleman who has the floor [Mr. TRIMBLE]. This matter having come up, I am very much interested in it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TRIMBLE] yield?

Mr. TRIMBLE. Yes, for a moment, as my time is very limited.

Mr. BOUTELL. It would take too much of the gentleman's time.

Mr. STANLEY. I will just make this statement. I have seen this article in the Post time and again. That applies to a particular kind of light leaf, very rare, and used in making wrappers. That tobacco is sometimes sold for 30 and 40 cents a pound—not one-hundredth part of the gross tobacco which we want to relieve. That does not apply to this tobacco. I would like if the gentleman would explain why it is absolutely necessary that this restriction should be removed from this tobacco so that it may be sold and so that it can be handled in this State.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Tobacco can not be conveniently handled in that shape, except in hogsheads and bales for the manufacturer. In the hand the farmer now has the right to sell tobacco in that state to the consumer, provided it is in the hand.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just state what that is.

Mr. TRIMBLE. This is a hand of tobacco; and all we ask is the right to sell the tobacco in the same condition, after taking out that stem and twisting it into a shape that it can reach the consumer and be convenient for use. In other words, tobacco in the shape that I exhibit is like wheat in the bundle. You might as well ask the farmer to sell wheat without being thrashed, so as to reach the consumer, as to ask a farmer to sell his tobacco in that shape.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Yerkes said this about giving the growers the right to stem: "I do not know whether it is necessary to give the stemming privilege to the growers." What do you say about that?

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Jo Washington, one of the witnesses before the committee, said: "I do not think it would do any good." But I think it would do a great deal of good. It would be another step toward twisting.

It would give us more liberty in handling our crop, and that is what we are fighting for. We now have a right to stem our tobacco provided it is sold to an exporter. If Congress gives free and unrestricted trade in stemmed leaf tobacco, and the great Committee on Ways and Means has in its goodness of heart agreed to favorably report a bill of this character, the additional privilege to stem without twisting would be advantageous, as the speculators and independent buyers could then prepare their purchase for export; and if the exporter did not buy it, he could then dispose of it on the local market without paying tax; but if the law should stand as it now is, if he did not sell to the exporter, he would have to pay the manufacturer's tax.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. England buys most of our export tobacco stemmed, so as to avoid paying the tax on the stem. Now, to give our people the right to stem would give them a chance to put more value into their tobacco, would it not?

Mr. TRIMBLE. I am not very well acquainted with the export business, as very little of the tobacco in my section of the State is exported; but I understand the chief object in stemming for the foreign trade is to save the freight on the stem, which is about 3½ per cent of the gross weight of the tobacco.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There is a tax of 82 cents on tobacco in England.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is your duty as patriots to come to the relief of the tobacco planters of this country. [Democratic applause.] You are the guardian of the people and should not ignore the rights of the toilers that Dives may add to his fortune. The true statesman tries to make all men equal before the law, to accord like opportunity in the field of industry, and insure to each the full usufruct of his labor. This is no partisan question. Both Republicans and Democrats are engaged in this work. In fact, three-fourths of the people who are engaged in the cultivation of tobacco in the dark-tobacco district are negroes, and you have expressed great friendship for them. I tell you that the negroes who are dependent upon the culture of tobacco to-day are in a worse fix than when they were chattel slaves, because then their masters fed, clothed, sheltered them, and doctored them in their sickness, but to-day the tobacco trust feeds them on half rations and lets them go hungry, wretched, and ragged, and has no compassion for them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I appeal to my Republican friends to come to their relief, and I say, Mr. Chairman, that from all over this land—North, South, East, and West—the appeals and petitions of the tobacco growers come to you praying for relief. They come to this Congress and ask you to relieve them of this onerous, iniquitous, and unjust burden. They do not want your sympathy, they spurn your charity; they ask only even-handed justice, that they may have an opportunity to earn their bread in the sweat of their face [applause on the Democratic side], that the fruits of their own labor may go into their own pockets and not into the coffers of a heartless, greedy trust, who would steal the very nozzle of the nursing bottle in the mouths of their babes, and I tell you I know what I am talking about. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Such universal weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth among the tobacco growers of the United States is certainly without parallel in the history of our country. Thousands and tens of thousands of these honest toilers of the soil are asking: "What shall I do to be saved from the most frightful of all Gehennas, the hell of want."

With them this is the great problem of life, and the goal of their ambition is to solve it. By day and by night their pitiable condition worries, burdens, haunts, and curses them; the dark cloud which hangs over and around them seems to have no silver lining; they are completely discouraged, yet they relax not their energies, but, on the contrary, are forced to work with all the more earnestness and desperation, hoping and praying for the dawn of a brighter day, that they may provide themselves and families with the necessaries and comforts of life.

Mr. Chairman, let us send the glad tidings to the tobacco fields of Kentucky, Virginia, Tennessee, and other States engaged in its production that this great staple is to be relieved from tax from this time forth. It will give bread and cheer to these toiling thousands and will let the sunshine of prosperity pour into their humble homes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

TOBACCO DIVISION.

The total revenue derived from taxes imposed and collected on domestic and imported tobacco manufactures, paid by stamps, during the last fiscal year ended June 30, 1903, amounted to $43,513,616.85, not including $1,193.39, miscellaneous collections.

The net increase in collections from cigars and cigarettes was $2,333,917.37, as compared with the collections for the previous fiscal year, and a decrease of $10,538,558.97 in the amount collected from tobacco and snuff. The total net decrease in collections for the last fiscal year, as compared with the previous year, was $8,204,641.60.

The total collections of revenue from each source during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1903, were as follows:

From manufactured tobacco	$18,640,052.20
From snuff	1,130,455.00
From cigars, taxed at $3 per thousand	20,359,171.60
From cigars, taxed at 54 cents per thousand	345,869.93
From cigarettes, taxed at $1.08 per thousand	2,743,594.89
From cigarettes, taxed at 54 cents per thousand	265,425.17
From cigarettes, taxed at $3 per thousand	29,041.06
Total collections	43,513,616.85

There was a decrease in the amounts collected from the following sources, as compared with the previous year:

Tobacco	$9,972,584.95
Snuff	565,974.02
Small cigars, taxed at 54 cents per thousand	65,053.55
Cigarettes, taxed at $3 per thousand	2,122.61
Total	10,605,716.13

There was an increase in collections from the following sources:

Cigars, taxed at $3 per thousand	$2,048,029.35
Cigarettes, taxed at $1.08 per thousand	286,044.03
Cigarettes, taxed at 54 cents per thousand	67,001.15
Total increase from these sources	2,401,074.53

The total net decrease in collections from all sources for the last fiscal year, as compared with the previous year, amounted to $8,204,641.60, as first above stated.

ANOTHER IMPORTANT MEETING OF BURLEY TOBACCO GROWERS HELD IN THIS CITY ON THE 25TH—EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE MET AT LELAND HOTEL ON THE 24TH—IMPORTANT BUSINESS TRANSACTED—ASSOCIATION BEGINS HANDLING 1903 CROP DECEMBER 1.

Pursuant to a call of President W. B. Hawkins, the executive committee of the Burley Tobacco Growers' Association met at the Leland Hotel, in this city, Tuesday, November 24. Many important questions were up for discussion, and all arrangements to begin the handling of the 1903 crop were completed. The meeting was adjourned at 4.30, to meet at Jackson Hall Wednesday.

About 150 growers assembled at Jackson Hall Wednesday morning. The meeting was called to order by President W. B. Hawkins, who in a few words stated the object of the meeting. Reports as to the progress in writing stock for the association in the various counties were read, and it was learned that much work has been done within the past ten days.

Enough stock had been raised to guarantee the success of this mammoth undertaking. After several matters of importance were acted upon the meeting was declared open for discussion. Several discussions were made, questions asked and answered, and different views on the different subjects were expressed by members present, which was of great benefit to those present.

Mr. C. C. McChord was appointed a committee of one to draw up a bill of sale to be signed when the crop was delivered to the association. These will be placed in the hands of the different county boards as soon as printed. The following resolution was offered and passed:

"Be it resolved, That every member of the association be urged to subscribe for the Kentucky Observer, the official organ of the association."

All members present were urged to notify every grower in their respective counties that the association would be ready to receive this year's crop on December 1, and the executive committeeman of each county was instructed to make all arrangements for the receiving of the crop.

In the House of Representatives, November 17, 1903, Mr. TRIMBLE introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed:

"A bill for the relief of the farmers and tobacco growers of the United States.

"Be it enacted, etc., That farmers and growers of tobacco shall hereafter have the right to sell tobacco in the raw or unadulterated, of their own growth, in any quantity, either in the leaf, twist, or such other form as they may wish, free from any tax or charge, or being in any manner subject to any statutory regulation on the part of the Government of the United States. All statutes in conflict herewith are hereby repealed."

"Whereas only a few years ago the tobacco produced in this country was all manufactured by many factories scattered over the land, each factory a competitor in the open market for its raw material; and

"Whereas at this time 80 per cent of all these factories have been purchased by one gigantic trust called the tobacco trust, thus virtually cutting off all competition; and

"Whereas the law regulating the tax on manufactured tobacco has been so construed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to include tobacco in the raw state, as subject to the tax of 6 cents per pound; and

"Whereas this construction has worked and does work a great injustice to the farmer who raises the tobacco, in that he has no market for his product other than to sell to one man, because, as before stated, the great tobacco trust controls more than 80 per cent of all factories in the United States:

"Now, we, the tobacco growers in the State of Kentucky, do by this petition call the attention of Congress to the gross injustice done by said law or construction of said law to the producers of tobacco and pray for relief, and ask that the bill now pending (H. R. 3574) for the relief of the farmer and tobacco grower of the United States be passed, and to take effect from its passage."

The above was adopted by the tobacco growers in convention assembled in this city on Tuesday, November 24, and it was recommended that every tobacco grower write to the Hon. SOUTH TRIMBLE, at Washington, D. C., thanking him for his advocacy of the farmers' interest.

During the delivery of the above speech,

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky, as extended, has expired.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and leave is granted.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN].

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairmnn, for the first time in the history of our country it is asserted that the Republican party is the enemy of trusts. From the time the war tariff was passed in 1861 Republican tariff schedules have carefully nurtured monopolies, and it was thought that this policy had been carried to its extreme limit in the McKinley tariff of 1890, but it reached its highest development in the Dingley tariff of 1897. The antitrust law of 1890 was passed by both political parties, and both parties have made attempts to enforce its provisions. But the Dingley tariff bred trusts one hundred times faster than the slow machinery of the law could destroy them, even though all the energies of the Government were bent to destroy them.

After 1897 the formation of industrial trusts flourished as it never did before. Foreign competition was excluded by the high tariff, and if domestic competition could now be removed by combinations of industries these combinations could charge the public any price they pleased up to the point of what "the market would bear." The prospect of profits to be made by charging exorbitant prices for the necessaries of life and the materials of industry was so alluring that the formation of industrial trusts became the absorbing passion of the captains of industry. Industry after industry was seized by capital, and combination of industries was followed by combination of combinations. The entire field was swept in the mad rush for wealth, and all but a few unimportant industries were seized by the giants' power. Meanwhile the manufacturers saw the hope of cheaper raw materials vanish, the consumer saw prices of food and clothing and fuel mount higher and higher, and the small merchant and frugal mechanic saw the door of business opportunity closing against them.

The trusts, in these years of Republican administration, had attained their greatest power and practised their cruelties upon The people unrestrained by law. The beef trust forced prices up so high that beef was beyond the reach of persons of small means. The coal trust forced up the price of coal, and thousands were threatened with sickness and even death. And the Standard oil trust, taking advantage of the high price of coal, forced up the price of oil, thus depriving many of cheap fuel. The steel trust made the prices of its product so high that the building industry came to a standstill, and all the industries dependent upon the products of that trust paid vast tribute to it and helped to earn dividends on its well-watered stock. In short, the trusts ran riot under the license to plunder the people which the Republican party granted them in 1897, and the trusts in 1900 purchased by campaign contributions a promise from the Republican party that their tariff shelter would not be taken from them.

Now, there is one way to restrain the trusts that is more potent than all others, and that is by reducing the tariff. No one ought to object to a reduction to such a point as to provide sufficient competition to enable Americans to buy American products at prices at least as cheap as Europeans buy them. From 1897 until now the Democratic party has demanded tariff reduction, and the Republican party has denied it. Our manufacturers want cheaper coal, iron, lumber, and hides, and our people want cheaper and better food and clothing. But the Representative from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] tells us we can not have reciprocity with Canada, because the Republican party is opposed to it, and the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee vote solidly against the Democratic bill for free raw materials for our industries.

Now, this refusal to help the people in the only way the trusts really fear is strangely inconsistent with your claim that you have deserted the trusts and gone over to the side of the people.

But the country will be glad if you have really begun a campaign of hostility to the trusts. No political party was ever better equipped for the accomplishment of this purpose. You have the President, the Senate, and the House, and you have sufficient time between now and election day to begin this work. And you need not go outside of your own ranks to secure information as to the methods of the trusts. Mr. Perry Heath could give you much information which he gathered as national committeeman and as a post-office official. The Secretary of the Treasury stood on the same platform with the Senator from Rhode Island recently and declared the Republican party the enemy of trusts. As "general manager" of the Republican party it might be well to consult the Senator from Rhode Island as to the best mode of attacking the sugar trust and the Standard Oil Company. The senior Senator from Pennsylvania could be counted on to devise a scheme to destroy the coal trust, and the Senator from Michigan, former Secretary of War, would delight in a campaign against the beef trust. The senior Senator from New York would abandon temporarily his contest for control of New York and join with the junior Senator from New York in framing a plan to punish railroads that violated the laws.

With a President of such strong purpose, surrounded by such a competent corps of advisers, the trusts should soon be driven to extremity; and the Administration should begin at once, for the Attorney-General has said he will not "run amuck," and this has been construed as the declaration of a truce with the trusts. Unless something is done at once the trusts will believe that the Northern Securities Company has been made a scapegoat, and they will feel assured that the usual campaign contributions will purchase immunity from prosecution. So the President must press on and serve notice on the trusts that they can not purchase a further license to strangle competition and thereby plunder the community. If this warfare is not begun now the people will know that it will not begin after the election if the Republican party is successful therein, and the people will realize that the Administration waged just enough war against the trusts to convince the plain people that it was on their side and against the trusts, but not quite enough war to prevent the trusts from paying their usual contributions to the Republican campaign fund, as the price of further license to violate the law.

You should not rest content with this one decision in your seven years of Administration. There is still an unexpended balance of $475,000 which is at the disposal of the Attorney-General for the prosecution of trusts; and although he says that "this appropriation should be made available for the enforcement of the laws of the United States generally," because "vast portions of the public lands have been dishonestly acquired through frauds, perjuries, and forgeries, and by similar means the laws relative to the proper administration of the Post-Office Department and other branches of the public service have been grossly violated," still we hope that it will not require all of this $475,000 to punish the officials who have been guilty of plunder under this Administration, so that there will be nothing left to complete the prosecution of the trusts which the Republican party has just begun. Nor should you rely upon making party capital out of the dissenting opinions of the justices of the Supreme Court, for you will remember that it is not long since criticism of a former decision of that court was denounced by your party as an attack upon the court itself. There are limits beyond which the exigencies of politics should not force us, and a decent respect for the highest tribunal of the land should cause you to refrain from indorsing the insinuation that partisanship caused a division among the members of the Supreme Court.

Now, the Democratic party has proposed a practical remedy for the abuses of industrial trusts, and if placed in power will apply that remedy. It will also enforce existing law and seek to amend that law so as to make it more effective. It stands ready to give the country a President who respects the law, whose lifetime veneration of its majesty will insure its vigorous administration at his hands.

In 1902 the grasping avarice of the coal trust caused a situation that was well described by the supreme court of Pennsylvania when it said, speaking of a combination that existed prior to this one:

> This combination has a power in its confederated form which no individual action can confer. The public interest must succumb to it, for it has left no competition free to correct its baleful influence. When the supply of coal is suspended the demand for it becomes importunate and prices must rise. Or if the supply goes forward, the price fixed by the confederates must accompany it. The domestic hearth, the furnaces of the ironmaster, and the fires of the manufacturer all feel the restraint, while many dependent hands are paralyzed and hungry mouths are stinted. The influence of a lack of supply or a rise in the price of an article of such prime necessity can not be measured. It permeates the entire mass of the community and leaves few of its members untouched by its withering blight.

The President had implored the coal trust to arbitrate its differences with its workmen, but the trust had spurned his recommendations. Then a great man arose in the community, whose record as Secretary of State and Attorney-General lent authority to his words, and denounced the coal trust for its unblushing violation of law. This declaration of Richard Olney focused the attention of the country on its criminality, and shortly after that the trust receded from its arrogant position and agreed to arbitrate with its employees. He it was who maintained the dignity of this nation by insisting on the preservation of the Monroe doctrine when the most powerful nation in the world threatened to violate it. He it was who from his commanding position as Attorney-General intervened in a suit before a circuit court of the United States and gained recognition of labor's right to organize. In his ability, courage, judicial balance, and calm temperament, as shown in his record of statesmanship and diplomacy, lies the best guaranty of peace and honor with all nations and happiness and prosperity at home.

The country turns for relief to the Democracy. The Democracy contains within it many men capable of guiding the destinies of our nation. None within its ranks are more gifted or more trustworthy than this distinguished son of Massachusetts. The country needs a President who will compel a return to former standards of official honesty and propriety, and who will not find it necessary to instruct the members of newly created commissions that their official standard of conduct must be higher than that which now exists in the several Departments of this Government.

We need a return to economy in administration, which Republican policies persistently ignore. We need a revision of the tariff in the interest of the people and not in the interest of protected manufacturers and trusts. We need a standard of international fair dealing that will restore confidence in the American nation and insure respect for the Monroe doctrine, which our retention and exploitation of the Philippine Islands and our sharp practice with Colombia in the canal negotiation have done much to destroy. We need an Executive who will observe the law himself and who will not authorize Departments to usurp the legislative function. And above all we need an Executive upon whom we can depend for the preservation of peace with all the nations of the world.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield fifty minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BYRD].

Mr. BYRD. Mr. Chairman, some weeks ago I introduced House bill No. 12694, intended to aid the farmers by removing the protective duties that range from 20 to 60 per cent on agricultural machinery, implements, and a few other necessaries incident to the life of the farmer. This bill, I understand, was turned down by the Ways and Means Committee a few days ago on a strict party vote. This measure I believe to be just, and it should receive the earnest consideration of this body. Agriculture is our chief source of national wealth. The estimated value of the food and kindred products of the American farms in 1903 was more than $2,300,000,000, and in the last decade 30,000,000,000 pounds of cotton, valued at about $2,500,000,000, were exported and sold to maintain our international financial parity.

One need not be learned in political economy to know that the financial success of the farmer is directly dependent upon buying and selling on the same terms and in the same market. Bartering is his most beneficial method of commerce, and when denied this privilege, by law or otherwise, his prosperity is seriously impaired. To deprive him of this right in any country is indefensible, but to deny it to him in this country of equal rights to all men is little less than tyranny. To tax one to upbuild the industry of another is legalized robbery, excusable only in a half-civilized despotism, yet we find it to be the chief rule of administration in this Government.

Since the inception of the American protective-tariff system the farmer has often been compelled to drink the bitter dregs of penury, in order that a policy intended from its beginning to enrich the few at the expense of the many might be exploited, and we must concede that it has served its mission well, breeding millionaires and trusts by the hundreds in every period of its existence. To-day it is holding high carnival in this temple of American liberty. Its every devotee, from its lord protector in the White House to the billingsgate political ward bummer, is imbued with its divinity far more than they are with the teachings of that Holy One who taught that every man should eat bread by the sweat of his brow.

Mr. Chairman, from the effects of this ideal Republican policy I have witnessed hardships almost too incredible for belief. I have seen magnificent estates, which were once the abode of baronial magnificence and splendor, plastered with mortgages, and finally pass at the auction block from the possession of the owner into the hands of heartless syndicates, notwithstanding they were as fertile as the valley of the Nile, and, had they been in any other land, would have been transmitted from generation to generation, clustered about with the sacred legends of ancestral history. I have seen the inmates of these once palatial homes reduced to extreme poverty, becoming tenants in the ideal mansions of their fathers. Their broad acres, though fertile and tilled to the verge of exhaustion, could not yield a sufficiency to appease the greed of the Shylocks of protection.

Passing to the more humble farmer, the yeoman of the land, I have seen him toiling from ten to fourteen hours a day, year after year, and his tender children dragged from the schoolroom to drive a plowshare in the scorching southern sun. I have seen him die, his home sold for debt, and his wife and children scattered and reduced to miserable degradation.

In summing up the hardships visited upon the American farmer by this policy of protection, I am forcibly reminded of the miserable condition to which the same policy reduced the English agriculturist fifty years ago, as given in the reported speeches of Mr. Cobden. Listen to what a few of the many thousands of these defenseless people said to the agents of the English Government concerning the destitution to which they were reduced. One witness said:

> If women and boys who labor in the fields suffer in their health at all, it is not from the work they perform but the want of food. The food they eat is not bad of its kind, but they have not enough of it, and more animal food would be most desirable; but with the present rate of wages it is impossible. Their low diet exposes them to certain kinds of diseases, more particularly to those of the stomach.

Another:

> Our common drink is burnt crust tea. We also buy about a half a pound of sugar a week. We never know what it is to get enough to eat. At the end of the meal the children would always eat more. Of bread there is never enough, the children always asking for more at every meal.

Another:

> Our poor live on the borders of destitution. * * * From one year's end to another there are many laboring families that scarcely touch in the way of food anything but bread and potatoes, with now and then some bacon. Bread in almost every cottage is the chief food of the children.

These are miserable pictures, indeed; yet I have seen their prototypes in different sections of the South within the last few years. It is a very common scene among the 6,000,000 negroes of the South who till the soil for a living. The wages received by both white and colored farm laborers are wholly inadequate to provide the necessaries of life, being only $10 or $12 per month, while the industrial laborers receive from $2 to $4 per day for their wages. And the few negroes who have acquired little homes realize so little therefrom in the way of profits that they have scarcely been able to provide sufficient food and clothing for their wives and children. And here permit me to say that if the Republican party were as much concerned about their right to live as human beings should live as it claims to be about their right of suffrage they long since would have been in much better condition—would have expanded in intelligence along with their prosperity, and would have freed themselves of many crimes begotten of poverty. It is claimed that the Democrats of the South deprive them of their votes, but the Republicans, year after year, have robbed them of their bread, and they should long hesitate before shaking their "gory locks" again. [Applause.]

A few years ago in my home town I observed an old negro entering a grocery store to invest his day's wages as a farm laborer—50 cents—in bacon. In a few moments he came out with a small roll wrapped in brown paper. Coming up to me, he said, "Boss, what does this mean that I can't get more to eat for my day's work? This won't make two meals for myself, wife, and six children." I said, "Uncle, you have heard about the Republicans who have been 'raising cain' about your right to vote so long. A few years ago they put a tax of 5 cents a pound on bacon, and a few of them in Chicago who make all the meat got together and advanced the price 5 cents per pound, in order to get the benefit of this tax, and this is why you have to pay 14 cents for all you eat." After reflecting a moment the old negro raised his head, with tears in his eyes, and said, "Boss, them Yankees am fools. If dis goes on dar ain't going to be no niggers here to vote." [Applause.]

But it is contended that if these conditions ever existed they have passed; that the farmer now, too, is prosperous; that he has a market for his produce, and that the Republican Administration is responsible for his prosperity, and that his sole duty is to "stand pat" and let well enough alone.

But what produced this little wave of agricultural prosperity, and how long will it continue? Do we not all know that it was caused by a shortage in the world's supply of cotton and by an increased demand for food products beyond the sea? This temporary boom in the prices of farm products has imparted new life and new energy in all of our industrial pursuits, thereby proving the indispensability of the farm as a factor in our national existence. [Applause.] The Dingley law has been in operation since 1897, and the most direful hardships that were ever realized by the southern farmer were in 1898 and 1899, when he was compelled to sell his cotton crop at about 5 cents per pound. The following will show the price of his product on the 1st day of November for each year since 1897, when the Dingley law went into effect: 1898, 4¼ cents; 1899, 7 cents; 1900, 9 cents; 1901, 7 cents; 1902, 7 cents, and 1903, 10 cents. This shows that the average price has only been about 7½ cents per pound, and it is conceded by the best authorities that on account of the advance on the necessaries of life incident to the reign of protection and trust the cost of production is at least 7 cents per pound, leaving the farmer's profit at one-third of 1 cent. The cost of living since 1897 has increased more than 30 per cent, as is demonstrated by the following statement from R. G. Dun & Co., published by the approval of the Government, and showing the value of a year's necessaries if purchased on the 1st day of January of each year: January 1, 1898, $72; January 1, 1899, $82; January 1, 1900, $95; January 1, 1901, $95; January 1, 1902, $101; January 1, 1903, $100, and January 1, 1904, $100.

From this it seems impossible for the present wave of prosperity to long continue in the agricultural districts unless the Government comes to the rescue and reduces the cost of production by removing the tax from agricultural implements, machinery, and other necessaries of life, the price of which is now only affected by the conscience of heartless trusts, which are largely organized and perpetuated under the thieving schedules of the tariff law. [Applause.] It is impossible for the farmer to conjecture the price he will realize for the crop now being planted. He does not know whether it will be profitable or unprofitable. In approximating its worth he must consider the ravages of the boll weevil of Texas and the locusts of Kansas; he must number the showers that fall on the plains of Europe and watch the irrigation of the cotton fields in Egypt; he must number the fields reclaimed from the wilderness in Africa, note the labor troubles in Europe, and the duration and destructive results of the Japo-Russian war.

All these varying conditions and much more must be considered in approximating his profits from the present crop. Should the world's supply of cotton be above its consumption, as was the case in 1898, and which is altogether probable, this commodity will again drop in price to 5 cents per pound, and should the foreign demand for wheat be less than our surplus the western farmer will again realize only 40 cents a bushel for his product. This is true because the price of the whole is always measured by the value of the surplus in a foreign market. This is an economic axiom, self-evident, and can not be successfully contradicted. [Applause.]

But turn to the other side of the question, and ask if there is any uncertainty about the price the farmer must pay for the necessaries incident to his occupation. The McCormicks, the Carnegies, and other trust magnates have long since prescribed the terms by which he must live and ply his humble avocation; and their decree is as unalterable as the "laws of the Medes and Persians." They have determined the amount and fixed the price of his raiment and food, and with the insignia of the trusts they have stamped his nails, his wire, his plows, his reapers, and many other of his indispensable necessaries. [Applause.]

Notwithstanding the products of his labor are exposed for sale in a market where the whole world meets in competition, he is compelled to buy within a protected wall where the will of one or two men alone fix the price of all he must purchase. The same parties who have arranged an unchangeable trust price for him compel him to pay any amount of profit they please, while they sell the same articles in foreign markets, where they encounter competition, at from 20 to 100 per cent less than he is charged for the same. We find, as I will show further on, that when they charge him $11 for a cultivator, they would charge the Mexican only $8.40; when he pays $14 for a plow the Englishman would buy it for $12.60; when he pays $22 for a sewing machine the Brazilian could buy it for $17.50, and when he pays $7 per dozen for shovels the Russians could buy them for $5.75, and so on throughout the whole list of articles needful for his well-being as a farmer.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the light of this showing, is it not a fact that the agricultural consumer is bound hand and foot and is being robbed as effectually as though he were being sacked by the wildest band of highwaymen that ever roamed the western plain? Is the man who compels you at the point of a rifle to surrender your money any more a robber than the millionaire who plants himself behind the thieving walls of the existing tariff law and demands the pound of flesh next to the farmer's heart, who reduces the farmer's wife and children to hardships in order that he may exploit his millions to the world and live and die in a brownstone mansion? [Applause.]

It is perfectly manifest that the duty levied on the articles mentioned is being prostituted and used as a tool by the trusts to rob the home consumer, and it is also equally certain that the full amount of this duty under the manipulation of these Shylocks is being extracted above a legitimate profit.

We find that in 1903 $22,000,000 worth of agricultural machinery was sold to foreigners; we also find that about eighty-eight millions, or four times as much, was sold to the home consumer, and it is estimated that of the latter sum at least $17,000,000 was a bonus paid by the farmers to the trusts and manufacturers by virtue of the existing duty. In like manner they were robbed on the $21,000,000 they paid for sewing machines and on the $30,000,000 they paid for nails, wire, piping, and kindred products. Now, if you will calculate the amounts stolen from them in this manner since the infamous Dingley bill went into operation, you will find that the American farmer has contributed enough to the trusts and millionaires to more than build the isthmian canal. [Applause.]

The per capita wealth of Mississippi is only about $143, Arkansas $144, Alabama $155, and Tennessee $170, notwithstanding they include the most fertile agricultural and valuable timber and mineral lands in the world; while, on the other hand, the per capita wealth of Pennsylvania is $559, Michigan $590, Rhode Island $950, and Massachusetts $1,419. Why is this? Why has the farmer been shackled in poverty for the past fifty years, while his manufacturing brother has prospered to the extent of turning to gold almost everything he has touched? There can be no answer except the one is being robbed to enrich the other; and, too, the Republican party is a joint heir in this legacy of shame. It is the highwayman that makes the farmer "stand pat" while the manufacturers and trusts filch his pockets. [Applause.]

To more fully demonstrate how the home consumer is being held up and robbed by the trusts, let me quote from an article that recently appeared in one of our journals. It says:

On November 12 the Iron Age quoted American steel bars in England at 8?s., or less than $2 per ton, and in America at $1.42½, or $31.92 per ton. The same number of the Iron Age tells us that American steel beams, plates, angles, channels, and rivet steel are being sold in Canada at from $9 to $11 per ton less than the prices charged here.

The Iron Age of December 17 enumerates a great number of articles of American make which are sold largely in South Africa. Nearly all are sold there at prices far below those charged here. Thus it appears that shovels, which our shovel trust sells here at 90 cents each, are sold there at 36½ cents. This Iron Age also contains information showing that the United States Steel Corporation was early in January offering steel billets in Lancashire, England, at 75s. per ton. Deducting $5 for freight and other transportation costs, the trust gets about $14 per ton for billets for export, while its price to American consumers is $23.

The American manufacturers, mostly in big corporate trusts, guard their export prices so well that it has become next to impossible to obtain export price lists or catalogues in this country. Recently Henry Russell & Co., of Sheffield, England, dealers in files and tools, wrote a letter, which says:

"As an illustration of the unfair manner in which the home buyers of files are treated by the United States of America manufacturers, I inclose you herewith a comparison of the prices charged to the buyers in the United States of America with those offered by the same manufacturers here."

Some of the prices on the list inclosed follow:

Files.	Price per dozen.		Per cent difference.
	England.	United States.
Flat bastard, 4 inches	$0.34	$0.92	170
Flat bastard, 6 inches	.50	1.07	114
Flat bastard, 10 inches	1.08	1.75	62
Hand bastard, 4 inches	.38	.92	142
Hand bastard, 6 inches	.62	1.07	73
Hand bastard, 10 inches	1.20	1.87	44
Half round bastard, 4 inches	.24	1.20	255
Half round bastard, 6 inches	.50	1.52	204
Half round bastard, 10 inches	1.08	2.27	109
Round bastard, 4 inches	.34	.75	121
Round bastard, 6 inches	.50	.87	74
Round bastard, 10 inches	1.08	1.40	30
Square bastard, 4 inches	.34	.95	179
Square bastard, 6 inches	.50	1.15	130
Square bastard, 10 inches	1.08	1.85	71

But in order to show you how fully and completely the farmer is being robbed on almost everything incident to his humble occupation, I desire to quote the following figures showing the prices that he must pay, and also what the foreigner must pay on the same articles. This statement is made up of data furnished by an expert, who was employed to secure the same for the late Democratic campaign committee:

Articles.	Domestic price.	Export price.
Cultivators	$11.00	$8.40
Plows	14.00	12.60
Axes, per dozen	8.25	7.20
Kettles	1.40	.85
Wire nails, per 100 pounds	2.25	1.35
Horse nails, per pound	.17	.14
Barbed wire, per 100 pounds	3.00	2.00
Sewing machines, medium	22.00	17.50
Axle grease, per gallon	5.40	4.50
Fruit presses	11.00	8.82
Meat choppers, average	2.00	1.50
Rakes (shanks), per dozen, average	1.75	1.40
Saws, per dozen, average	15.00	12.00
Shovels, per dozen, average	7.00	5.75
Hoes, per dozen, average	13.00	10.00

These figures proclaim the condemnation of this iniquitous protective tariff policy far more eloquently than the human tongue can speak. They show that this trust-breeding system is indefensible, tyrannical, and not intended for revenue purposes, but to enrich the rich. The Government derives no revenue from the importation of this class of goods. They are not imported in sufficient amounts for consideration, nor is the tax needful to enable any of our manufacturers of this class of articles to compete with foreigners, because, unlike any other country, we have the raw material—the iron, the coal, and the timber—on the same mountain side. [Applause.]

What justification can there be in longer perpetuating such an infamous policy? Has it come to this that 40,000,000 farmers must be taxed without limit? Upon what hypothesis of right is it predicated? Has the farmer not played his part well in the great drama of our national existence? Did he not in blood write our liberty on the snows at Valley Forge? Was he not foremost in the charges of Sumter and Marion, in the swamps of Georgia and Carolina? When our President was a fugitive, when our capital was sacked and burned, when these classic hills were under the martial step of the proud Briton, and when our northern army had cowardly surrendered or scattered like wild beasts to the mountains, who was it that dared to die on that historic battlefield far to the South in order that the nation's flag might be purged of the stains of shameful cowardice and might once again float transcendently in the heavens? [Applause.]

Who filled the ranks of the Spartan bands of Crockett, Travis, and Houston; that drove the bloody savage and the treacherous Mexican far to the sunset, planting a lone glittering star in the southern sky to herald the advent of the new-born Republic? Who were more abundant in that intrepid army that marched with Scott and Taylor through fire and blood and scorching sands to gather trophies from the palace of the Montezumas, and to spread the map of this Republic to the golden shores of the Pacific? [Applause.]

Sirs, we may extend to him the basest ingratitude; we may shackle him in the pinions of misfortune by unjust taxation; we may rob him of his humble home and make him a fugitive of poverty in the land of his fathers to appease our avaricious greed, but remember that we can no more blot his deeds of valor, devotion, and chivalry from our country's history without dimming its brightest pages than we can strike the constellations from the heavens without impairing the beauty of the universe. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, not only is the farmer being impoverished by this infamous policy at home, but it is rapidly closing his most extensive and profitable markets abroad. By realizing such enormous profits from the home consumer the trusts and manufacturers are enabled to undersell the foreigner in his own country, and this is done with the delibe ate purpose to further satiate his greed by destroying all free competition. If you doubt this, listen to the following, credited to a writer in the Pittsburg Gazette, published in the very hothouse of protection:

> The time is coming when the present duty on steel manufactures will either be removed or materially reduced. Before this comes a wise management will see that we are firmly intrenched in our home markets and that no foreign manufacturer can enter them. This can best be done by so underselling him in his own markets that he will have no profits to invest in betterments. It is only by maintaining prices here that we can afford to undersell the foreigner in his own market. This may be regarded as a cold-blooded policy. It will shock many people who do not know that many of our manufacturers have been built up under it.

The truth here expressed has reached across the sea, and the present English ministry is upon the verge of dissolution, being driven from power by the cries of popular vengeance against the American industries.

But, we ask, how is it possible for our manufacturers to pay American wages, ocean freights, and then undersell the Englishman in his home market? Let me explain. By the same authority above quoted it was stated that the American Steel Trust could make steel rails at $12 per ton, and by adding $3 profit we find that they can be profitably made and sold at $15; but the December report of Commerce and Finance says that from May, 1902, to the date of the report steel rails were sold at the fixed price of $28 to American consumers. This unchangeable and outrageous profit-making price destroyed all foreign competition, there being no record of any rails imported into this country during the year 1903.

The Germans and Belgians who furnished the same character of goods to Mexico and South Africa at $24 per ton, including ocean freights, were, by tariff duties to the amount of $7.80 per ton, prohibited from entering this rich field of commerce. The American manufacturer, in order to receive $28 per ton, had only to add the $5 per ton freight that would have to be paid by a foreign competitor and the $7.80 duty under the Dingley bill to his legitimate price of $15 per ton, to make $27.50 per ton, which is only 50 cents less than his fixed price.

From this we are forced to the conclusion that the whole amount of the duty now levied on this class of goods is gobbled up at the expense of the American consumers by the trusts and manufacturers, and that in this manner the American consumer is robbed on the hundreds of millions of dollars for steel rails used by our railways. And right here let me say that this enormous profit to the trusts and manufacturers is not only a tax on the railroads, but it is likewise a tax on the whole American people; more largely on the farmers whose freight must be fixed by the railroad with a view of discharging this enormous debt, and, too, this debt will prove an unending burden. This generation will pay the interest on the bonds issued to cover this extra cost of construction, and when we have all passed away the same bonds will be re-issued, and our children will be taxed in a like manner to pay the interest on the same, and so on through all of the generations to come. [Applause.]

From these figures it is perfectly clear that on every ton of rail sold the manufacturers or trusts realize above a legitimate profit $13 per ton, and we are not surprised that they are thereby enabled to destroy foreign competition. Suppose they sell 400 tons at $13 profit to American consumers, we find that they realize $5,200. Then, should they sell 400 tons, the same amount, to the English railway at $10 per ton, being $2 less than first cost, they would lose $800. By deducting $800 losses from the $5,200 profit, we find that the seller realizes the net sum of $4,400 profit on 800 tons of rails, plus the satisfaction of having inflicted a deadly blow to their foreign competitor.

This method of gathering profits from home consumers and destroying foreign competition is true as to all the iron and steel schedules of the Dingley law and is likewise true as to all the agricultural implements and machinery enumerated in the foregoing schedules, the sale price of which is fixed by the harvester trust, organized under the name of the International Harvester Company, chartered under the laws of New Jersey in 1892 with a capital stock of $120,000,000, and is composed of six or more independent companies. This combination largely sold in 1893 at less than home prices reapers, mowers, cultivators, and plows to the amount of $3,617,430 to Russia, $1,680,439 to Germany, $1,020,053 to British Africa, $1,558,836 to Australia, and $15,075,358 to other foreign countries.

Now, if this is true, as we have shown, what reason can there be for longer perpetuating tariff tax on this class of articles? It is not needed for revenue; none are ever imported. According to the report from the Department of Commerce and Finance not a dollar of revenue was derived from these sources during the past year, 1903. Then why should it be continued? For what purpose do we retain it? Where is the authority to levy any tax except for revenue? It can not be claimed that it is needed to enable this trust to justly compensate its employees, for a business backed by such enormous wealth, separated from all serious competition by an ocean, and having for a market a continent at home and the world abroad can not be otherwise than prosperous and fully able to take care of all of its wage-earners.

This method of robbing at home and underselling abroad is rapidly revolutionizing the fiscal policy of England, that has for more than half a century been founded upon the bed rock of free trade, and that great market that has been free and open to the world and in which we sold nearly one-half of our exported agricultural products in 1893, and for many years prior to that time, is about to be closed by protective duties to save the English industries threatened largely by the American trusts.

The Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, late secretary of the English colonies and the author of this retaliating policy, has all his life been an adherent of the Cobden theory of free trade and justifies his present position by pleading national self-defense.

The Edinburg Review or Critical Journal quotes him as recently saying:

> Protection enables foreign countries to dump in England—that is, sell to us below cost price, and recoup themselves by high prices in their home markets. By this process, sufficiently continued, they can destroy a particular industry and then raise their prices. Iron and steel at present are threatened in this way.

Again, he says:

> The old ideas of free competition are changed. We are face to face with great combinations and enormous trusts, having behind them gigantic wealth. Even the industries and commerce which we thought to be peculiarly our own are in danger. * * * At the present time the Empire is being attacked on all sides, and in our isolation we must look to ourselves. We must draw closer our international relations—the ties of sentiment, ties of sympathy; yes, ties of interest.

But if this policy of English retaliation, as outlined by Mr. Chamberlain, extended only to the imposition of duties on our manufactured and trust-controlled articles shipped to that country, it would not be so far-reaching in its damaging results, and, too, it would carry with it the approval of all who believe in righteous retribution; but we understand that it is the purpose of the advocates of that doctrine to levy a duty upon imported agricultural products. It contemplates a general tariff law with pref-erential schedules and rates to the English colonies and dependencies, which is to be reciprocal, to the end that the colonial markets are to be saved for the manufacturers of England, and the market of the mother country is to be saved for the agricultural and other products of the colonies.

Listen to what Mr. Chamberlain says is the true intent of this policy:

If, however, our colonies develop further their present protectionist policy, the colonial market also will be gradually closed to us. Hence it is wise, while we can, to secure preferential treatment in their markets, which we can do by giving them preferential treatment in ours. This involves the taxation of food.

What does he mean by using the expression, "This involves the taxation of food?" Is it not his purpose to place a tax upon American meat, corn, and wheat in order to provide a protective market for like products from Canada, Australia, and other colonies? In the event that he does succeed and does place a duty of something like 50 per cent on all the food products of this character not produced in the colonies, what would be its effect upon our western farmers, who in the year 1903 sold in that market alone $180,000,000 worth of these products? Where would he find another market in which to sell such a large share of his annual surplus? Is it not reasonable to conclude that a large per cent of it would decay in the bins and packing houses of the West? But we are confronted by those who say that if they live they must eat, and that as they have depended on us for their food supply for the past half century they must continue to do so.

But, Mr. Chairman, we should not forget the fact that the wheat-growing area of middle and western Canada, as yet practically undeveloped, is quite as large as our western grain belt, and is so fertile that many of our western farmers are flocking there in search of homes.

The Duke of Argyle, in a recent article on the resources of Canada, says:

Both by soil and climate Canada is specially adapted to agriculture. Within the last few years its agricultural importance has greatly increased, and when the great prairies are brought into cultivation Canada will be one of the chief agricultural countries in the world. * * * Within a period of thirty years Canada has stretched from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and the territory now under her control is very little inferior in extent to that of the great Republic to the south, and contains within itself all the elements of a prosperous future. * * * The great Northwest, still in the very infancy of its development, is destined to give the confederation several provinces outside of Manitoba, as large and productive as Minnesota, and to be the principal wheat-growing district of Canada.

Hon. John Charlton, a member of the Canadian Parliament, in a recent article in the North American Review, says:

In the Canadian northwest, as yet practically untouched, is a wheat-growing area as large as eight States like Illinois. Where now there are a few hundred thousand inhabitants, there will be teeming millions, and the 60,000,000-bushel wheat crop of the present year will be swollen to a figure that will make this great region the granary of food-purchasing nations.

This being true, and with a preferential right in the English market, it is altogether probable that the wheat-growing area of that country and the annual shipments therefrom will equal ours within the next few decades.

Not only have our food products been listed for taxation by the advocates of this commercial upheaval in England, but we find that cotton is also to be protected by a preferential system of taxation with the colonies. Mr. Boyle, our consul-general at Liverpool, speaking in a late report on this subject, says that Mr. Chamberlain is an advocate of the taxation of cotton, so as to enable the industry to be developed in the colonies to the extent of relieving England from absolute dependence on the American cotton fields. In this report he says:

The significant growth of the new "imperial sentiment" among the British people has led to the desire to produce within the Empire as much as possible the things the Empire consumes. There is now a widespread and profound belief among the cotton spinners of this country that the only salvation of our trade is British-grown cotton.

To this end the British Cotton Growers' Association is experimenting in cotton growing in all of the English colonies.

Mr. Chamberlain, the ex-colonial secretary, has taken a great interest in the movement, and through him the aid of the governors of the colonies has been obtained. We call your attention to the following excerpts from this report of Mr. Boyle, showing the cotton-producing area of the English colonies and dependencies:

It is claimed that West Africa and Nigeria have an area of land suitable for cotton growing equal to that of the cotton-producing districts of the Southern States of America. * * * Several gins and 100 tons of seed were sent to Lagos in 1902. There were 4,000 acres under cultivation, and since then the acreage has increased to 30,000 acres. * * * Years ago cotton was exported from Lagos to the value of $380,000 per year. * * * It is believed that cotton can now be grown as cheaply as in the United States.

Last year an expert from Greenville, Miss., was sent to Free Town, Sierra Leone. * * * The expert there professes great hopes for the future of indigenous cotton, which he believes to be equal if not superior to middling American.

Early this year a practical cotton grower went to Gambia to give instructions in conducting experiments. The results from the American and Egyptian seeds are reported as satisfactory.

In the last annual report of the British commissioner of Central Africa the details of exports were interesting as containing the first mention of the export of cotton. Last spring 600 acres were under cotton cultivation, and it is expected that there will be 4,000 acres.

Efforts are being made to revive the cotton-growing industry in Jamaica. Sea-island seed has been procured from the United States Department of Agriculture. Sea-island cotton is a native of Barbados, and the Government has undertaken to encourage its cultivation.

BRITISH GUIANA.

The governor of this colony says that cotton grows wild there, and from time immemorial it has been cultivated by the Indians. In the early years of the last century from six to ten million pounds of cotton were exported annually.

Cotton grows in a wild state throughout British Honduras. American growers are negotiating for the purchase of land for cotton cultivation. * * * It is believed that India could easily produce an additional million of bales.

AUSTRALIA.

Attention is being paid to the question in Central Queensland, and experiment stations are being established.

The consumption of Egyptian cotton is increasing in England. In 1890 the United Kingdom imported 1,618,448 hundredweight, and in 1902 the amount was 3,168,697 hundredweight. * * * The wonderful system of water storage and irrigation recently established on the Nile under British auspices has greatly increased the acreage of cotton cultivation. It is said that the Egyptian cotton this year will be 98,000,000 pounds more than last year. It is claimed that there are millions of acres of cotton-growing land in the Sudan.

Thus it appears that the cotton-growing area of the English colonies and other countries under her immediate control is equal to about one-quarter of the habitable globe, and if we will consider for a moment the wonderful fertility of many sections of this vast domain and the mighty wealth and energy of the progressive people who are enlisted in the development of this great industry, and if we will further consider the fact that in a few years at least the producers of cotton in this territory will, in all probability, have preferential right to market their product in England, the greatest cotton-consuming country in the world, we are astounded at the probable rapidity with which this profitable industry will be developed within the very near future. [Applause.]

An additional profit of 4 or 5 cents a pound over foreign competitors will have the effect to multiply the production in these fields many millions of bales annually.

If a monopoly of the iron and steel trust market, produced by tariff taxation, has made it possible for a little blacksmith shop situated on the banks of a Pennsylvania river in 1860 to evolve into the mightiest trust and corporation ever known to the world, how long will it take for a similar system of taxation, monopolizing the English market, to make the valley of the Nile, the plains of Sudan, the isles of the sea, and other colonies and dependencies to become as white as the driven snow with this gold-bearing fleece?

Mr. Chairman, if we continue this policy of spoliation at home and destruction abroad until we make certain the adoption of this policy of retaliation by the English Government, if we make it possible for the only free market which is great enough to consume nearly one-half of our exported agricultural products to be closed by taxation, we will have visited upon the farmers of this country an injustice and calamity more far-reaching and damaging than the destruction of the civil war. [Applause.]

However fast our population may increase, and however fast our spindles may multiply, they can never keep pace with the ever-increasing production of our farms; and when we contemplate, for a moment, that with the whole world as our market in the past the farmer was scarcely able to realize a small margin of profit from his labor, and that not until within the last few years have the prices of his products been above the cost of production, and that when the great English market is closed to him, and all the paupers of India, the negroes of Africa, and the fellahin of Egypt are engaged without numbers and without limit to compete with him in the production of his chief product, we can see no escape but ruin for him.

Should this become true, we will see his cattle running wild on the plains, his corn burning for fuel, his cotton rotting in the field, his home mortgaged, his children being reared in poverty and ignorance, and the horrors of serfdom haunting his little ones.

The Europeans, especially the English, are importers, while the American farmers are the exporters of agricultural products, and it is as vitally important for them to have a monopoly of that market as it is for the manufacturers to have a trust on this.

It is claimed that competition here impoverishes the latter. In the same manner will competition there impoverish the former. The price the farmer receives for the surplus of his products in a foreign market is "the leaven that leavens the whole of his production." [Applause.]

The 10,000,000 bales of cotton produced in 1903 brought about $50 per bale, because that was the price paid for the surplus in foreign markets, and the many millions of bushels of wheat grown by the western farmer sold for about $1 per bushel, because the foreign bread consumer was willing to pay that price for the amount he exported. And so it is with all of the agricultural products produced in excess of home consumption. The influence of every flurry in the foreign market is noted in every exchange in America, just as the waves of the sea are broken by lashing the rocks of the opposite shore. [Applause.]

The startling increase of our agricultural surplus renders the question of providing foreign markets one of vital importance. Of this class of goods, in 1893 we exported $600,000,000 and in 1903 $900,000,000, an increase of $300,000,000 in one decade. Farm products amounted to 62 per cent of all our goods sold in a foreign market and shows that they are the direct cause of the enormous balance of trade annually resulting in favor of America from her foreign dealings, and it further shows that they are adding more to our gold supply than is realized from any other commercial source.

The farm is an exhaustless source of national wealth, and is susceptible of marvelous development if it could only receive fair and just treatment at the hands of the Government.

The farmer is not a beggar. He does not want preferential treatment. He only wants an equal chance in the race of life. He only wants the Government to draw the hands of the thieves and robbers from his pockets. [Applause.] He only wants to be permitted to expend his "sweat and blood" for comforts for his wife and children, and not to further enrich the parasites of protection. He believes the Government should abandon its trust-breeding policy that has robbed him for fifty years. He believes it should dispel the gloom that overhangs his richest market across the sea by removing the "damnable" causes of that industrial revolution which lurk on our own shores. He believes instead of its Navy and diplomacy being used to intermeddle in foreign wars and in exploiting the doctrine of imperialism, that these mighty agencies should be used in opening the barricaded markets of the world to his ever-increasing products, to aid in carrying his bread and cotton to the hungry and naked millions in every quarter of the globe, and that the Government in refusing him these just demands is his enemy, and not his friend. That instead of aiding him in the race of life, it adds to the destruction of his prosperity, and instead of giving him an equal showing in the pursuit of happiness, it exposes him as a feeble victim of the mighty and the strong. [Loud applause.]

In the beginning of the present tariff policy of Germany the welfare of her agricultural classes was zealously guarded. Testimony was taken to show what effect this schedule and that schedule would have on the cost of production, and to what extent, if any, they would impair their rights in the markets of the world. The same policy has been pursued by the French Government, and I dare say that a more contented and happy people do not exist than the agriculturists who dwell in the vine-clad homes of France.

The rights of our farmers have not been so regarded. It seems that their welfare has not been consulted in shaping any of the policies of this great Republic, and if they have succeeded to any degree it has been through their heroic energy and the benedictions of Heaven, and not through any governmental favors. They have not been invited to any of your tariff hearings; they have not been asked how much the tax on agricultural necessaries increased their cost of production or how much profit they have been realizing on their immense crops. Mr. Schwab has been here to defend the steel trust, Mr. Havemeyer to protect his millions invested in the sugar trust, and Mr. Mitchell, or other representatives of the labor unions, have been here to speak for their rights. Cæsar has spoken for Cæsar, Brutus for Brutus, and Cassius for Cassius, but there has been no one to speak for Rome. [Applause.]

I desire to say to the opposition in this House that your party has never been the friend of the farmer, though he has been your most valiant supporter. You would not have been in power to-day but for the prosperity brought to the country by the wonderful crops he has made and exported. Had he failed in a crop last year or had his prices been greatly reduced we would to-day have been in the midst of a fearful panic, and your party would have been trembling for its existence.

Notwithstanding this benediction, you have never advocated a policy that did not involve his impoverishment and ruin, and all of your legislation in his behalf has been deceptive and elusive. Under the pretense of fostering his prosperity you levied a tax of 25 cents per bushel on wheat, knowing full well at the time you did it that he had no competition in our wheat market, that no one wanted to bring wheat to a country where they made millions for export. You might as well say that hades needs protection on fire, or that the ocean needs the April shower to swell its volume, as to say that the wheat growers need a protective tariff to enhance the price of their product. [Applause.]

What possible good could come to the grower of our common cotton were you to levy a tax of $10 per bale on all that might be imported? Everybody knows that we export 6,000,000 bales per year. An advocate of such a policy would be denounced as a fraud or an imbecile. Likewise, gentlemen, you practiced your deceptive art on the western meat producers when you imposed a duty of 5 cents a pound on bacon and hams and 2 cents on imported beef. In persuasive tones you told them that this tax would enhance the price of their cattle and hogs, when many of you knew full well that the only purpose it could serve and did serve was to enable Swift, Armour, and other packers to create the meat trust and deprive millions of our poor people of the use of this essential article of food.

Here is how it affected the farmer. Listen: In January, 1899, beef sold at $10.50 per barrel and Texas steers at $5.25 per hundred, and in January, 1903, beef had advanced to $18.50 per barrel and Texas steers were selling at about $4 per hundred. For a few weeks in the summer of 1902 beef cattle advanced to $6 or $7 per hundred, but by September of the same year it was down to about $4.50, and it has since remained at about that price. And thus it was when the farmers "asked you for bread, you gave them a stone; and when they asked for a fish, you gave them a serpent."

The history of the Republican party is a romantic story of triumphant delusion and deception. It has long "served the devil in the livery of heaven." Pretending to be the champion of freedom, it has enslaved the weak to the strong and the poor to the rich. Boasting of having severed the shackles of slavery from the negro, it has forced upon him the manacles of an industrial servitude that has kept him in the direst poverty for half a century. Claiming friendship for the laboring man, you are "standing pat" while there are annually coming into this country to compete for his bread-earning occupation 600,000 Hungarians, Austrians, and Italians, the most degraded pauperized blood of Europe. Advocating honesty in the public service, it is as dumb as the dead to the demands of the American people for the searchlight of investigation to be turned on the suppressed glaring frauds in the Post-Office Department. And professing a statesmanship liberal enough to encircle the welfare of all Israel, it legislates only for the proud Pharisees of spoliation and greed, the irrepressible barnacles of the trust.

Mr. Chairman, popular government becomes a tyranny when not administered upon the principles of equal and exact justice to all the governed, and statesmanship is a misnomer when not broad enough to compass all the rights of all the people in all the sections and in all the prospective years of national existence. A governmental policy launched for the gratification of the avarice of the minority, regardless of the welfare of the majority, eventually ruins either its promoters or those over whom it is promulgated. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, when President McKinley was inaugurated for a second term a feeling of hopeful satisfaction spread throughout the country. The people believed he was sincere in fostering the doctrine of protection that had made him great, but they had the utmost confidence in his integrity, and believed his statesmanship was broad enough for him to recede from his former position on this great question if convinced that it was no longer a desirable national policy, and in this belief I am sure they did not misjudge him, for in the last and greatest speech of his life, made at Buffalo the day before he was stricken down by the bloody assassin, he said:

> What we produce beyond our domestic consumption must have a vent abroad. The excess must be relieved through a foreign outlet, and we should sell everywhere we can and buy wherever the buying will enlarge our sales and productions, and thereby make a greater demand for home labor.
> The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good-will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals. Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not.

These great sentiments were not idly expressed; they were carefully considered; every word and every sentence was intended to express just what he said, and we believe he intended to announce his purpose to abandon our policy of "exclusiveness" produced by protection and to convert the nation into a commercial world power. Not only was he speaking to the American people, but to the representatives of all of the American republics.

But this great man has gone to his reward; his mantle of power has fallen upon another, who, when he assumed the reigns of Government, announced to the world that he would follow the policy outlined by his illustrious predecessor. The people were still hopeful; they remembered that Mr. Roosevelt was once a member of the Cobden Free Trade Club of England, the most ultra antiprotection organization in the world, and that he had also been a member of the Free Trade Club of New York and had repeatedly said that he "would die for free trade;" and that one of his admiring friends, Doctor Schurman, as late as 1891, proposed as a campaign slogan for 1904 the "Three R's—Roosevelt, Reciprocity, and Reduction of the Tariff." And their expectant hopes ran high along this line when they heard him say at Denison, Iowa, June 2, 1902:

> I think you will do me the justice to say that I do not say what I do not mean. I never said anything off the stump that I would not say on the stump

To further inspire the people with the hope of relief, in his message of December 3, 1901, he said:

The natural line of development for a policy of reciprocity will be in connection with those of our productions which no longer require all of the support once needed to establish them upon a sound basis.

Again he said:

Wherever the tariff conditions are such that a needed change can not with advantage be made by the application of the reciprocity idea, then it can be made outright by lowering the duties on given products.

Observe the striking similarity between this and what Mr. McKinley said on reciprocity in his Buffalo speech. He said:

If perchance some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue or to encourage and protect our industries at home, why should they not be employed to extend and promote our markets abroad?

And just here permit me to call your attention to this theory of reciprocity, outlined by both President McKinley and President Roosevelt. They evidently pointed out this as the true theory of reciprocity and as one of the means by which the excessive protective duties should be repealed; and it was under this conception of the doctrine that the celebrated Kasson treaties, now dying at the hands of the Republican Senate, were negotiated. What an immeasurable difference between this enunciation of Republican reciprocity and that outlined by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who declared that "Republican reciprocity is reciprocity in noncompeting articles and in nothing else."

How widely divergent, too, is the warning counsel of Mr. McKinley, who said that "commercial wars were unprofitable," to the sentiment daily expressed in the applause of the Republicans of this House at the slightest mention of the name of Mr. Chamberlain, the author of the threatened disastrous commercial war between this country and England.

Returning to Mr. Roosevelt, we find that at one time he was very much opposed to the trusts and was willing to use the strong arm of the law to suppress them, saying in his message of 1901:

There is a widespread conviction in the minds of the American people that the great corporations known as trusts are in certain of their features and tendencies hurtful to the general welfare.

Again, on the 4th day of July, 1902, in discussing the subject of trusts in a speech at Pittsburg, he said:

It is a little difficult to set clearly before us all the evils; but I think that those gentlemen, and especially those gentlemen of large means, who deny that the evils exist are acting with great folly.

From these and other declarations of the President, it was evident that in the beginning of the Administration he desired to follow the doctrines of tariff reform, reciprocity, and trade expansion outlined in Mr. McKinley's dying message to the American people; but in September, 1902, the Republican leaders, becoming alarmed at this revolutionary tariff reform and antitrust policy, sent Senator ALDRICH and others to Sagamore Hall, the President's home by the sea, to bridle him in his wild and reckless course. They must have done their work well, and have prescribed to him the terms of his political existence; they must have convinced him that he and the tariff-protected barons were too powerful and strong not to live in peace, for on the 20th day of the same month we find him speaking in Cincinnati, and in this speech he flops over, soul and body, to the defense of the trusts and protection. Speaking of the trusts, he says:

Now, it matters very little whether or not we like these new conditions. * * * Our likes and dislikes have very little to do with the matter. The new conditions are here. They have produced both good and evil. We can not get rid of them, even if it were not undesirable to get rid of them. * * * It remains true that the real evils connected with the trusts can not be remedied by any change in the tariff laws. The trusts can be damaged by depriving them of the benefits of a protective tariff only on condition of damaging all their smaller competitors and all the wageworkers employed in the industry.

In commenting upon the sudden change in the President's policy, the New York Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin a few weeks afterwards said:

That speech may be regarded as the result of the advice of the Senators who lately conferred with him (the President) at Sagamore Hall.

Such is the varied record of our President on these great political issues. He now "stands pat" in perfect obedience to the will of the "bosses." Indeed, it seems that when he would do good evil was always present. His insatiable craze to "bestride the narrow world like a Colossus" evidently produced this change of policy. He has permitted his inordinate ambition to drive from his memory the principles of political rectitude and civic virtue that adorned his former life, and to-day we find him playing the rôle of the "cuckoo" and "dreaming of the hour" when he can more fully exploit his ideal views of imperialism. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, going back to my subject, and in conclusion, let me urge the majority to report this bill and pass it, thereby giving a living profit to those who till the soil, and strike one blow at the monsters of the trusts before folding your tents to return to the people. Do this, and with one accord millions of our common people will rise up and sing your praises. But if you are determined in your policy of inertia, let me charge you that there is a limitation to the patience of an outraged people—a line beyond which political oppressors should fear to go.

Dangerous, indeed, is the process of converting into gold the "sweat and blood" of a brave, proud people to fill the coffers of the rich. One is blinded by selfish ignorance who assumes that they will submit to a base injustice until becoming beggars at the gates of Dives. The American is too proud for such humiliation; the same blood that nerved him for every emergency of the past will urge him to victory in a coming political revolution. All may be well with you now; you may possibly be able to collect "monkeys" enough to bridge the stream in November, but that will be your last victory unless you change your policy. The sky appears rosy to-day, but an ominous cloud may hang on the horizon of to-morrow. Remember that the heedless boy scaled the cliffs, and the thoughtless maiden chanted the lullabies of love in the shadows of Mount Pelee in the same hour that nature was marshaling her forces to baptize a city in a revolution of fire. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

During the delivery of the above speech,

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, under order of the House, the control of the time is with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON].

Mr. BYRD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and leave is granted.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is the objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and leave is granted.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of my argument is not to defend "peonage;" it is not to indorse slavery, involuntary servitude, or crime of any kind. It is simply to raise the question of jurisdiction in cases where Federal courts assume to try individuals for the alleged offense of depriving other individuals of their liberty, denominating same as "peonage." I submit that "peonage" does not exist in Georgia, or in any other State, and I submit that neither under the Constitution of the United States nor the statutes of the United States is there any authority for the "peonage" trials that have been had and are still being had in the South. That instances occur in the South where individuals trespass upon the liberty of other individuals is unfortunately true, but I apprehend that it is also unfortunately true that such instances occur in other sections of the Union.

The South is neither better nor worse in this regard than any other part of our common country. That such individual or isolated instances occur or that numerous instances of the kind occur would not constitute a system or a condition of peonage. Trespasses upon property and upon life itself unfortunately occur in the South and throughout the Union, but does the fact of the trespasses confer jurisdiction upon the Federal courts to try the trespassers? It is the duty of the States to protect their citizens in life, liberty, and property. If one citizen of a State in the commission of a private wrong deprives another citizen of either one of these three great rights, the right, the duty, and the power to punish him is vested solely in the State.

Because the trespass is upon liberty is no reason why the jurisdiction of the State is less than when the trespass is upon life or property. For Federal courts to assume jurisdiction to try private citizens of a State for lawlessly trespassing upon the liberties of other private citizens of the same State is an unwarranted assumption of power and jurisdiction, and is as much an invasion and attack upon the sovereignty of that State as would be an act of Congress delegating such jurisdiction. At least such is my belief and my contention, and such I will undertake to demonstrate.

THE LAW AGAINST PEONAGE.

The Revised Statutes deals with peonage as follows:

Section 5526 reads:

Every person who holds, arrests, returns, or causes to be held or returned, or in any manner aids in the arrest or return of any person to a condition of peonage shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment not less than one year nor more than five years, or by both.

Section 5527 reads:

Every person who obstructs, or attempts to obstruct, or in any way interferes with or prevents the enforcement of the preceding section shall be liable to the punishments and penalties therein prescribed.

Section 5532 provides that, in addition to the foregoing penalties, persons convicted of peonage shall be disqualified from holding any office of any profit or trust under the United States.

Section 1990 reads:

The holding of any person to service or labor under the system known as "peonage" is abolished and forever prohibited in the Territory of New Mexico, or in any other Territory or State of the United States, and all acts, laws, resolutions, orders, regulations, or usages of the Territory of New Mexico, or of any other Territory or State which have heretofore established, maintained, or enforced, or by virtue of which any attempt shall hereafter be made to establish, maintain, or enforce, directly or indirectly, the voluntary or involuntary servitude or labor of any persons as peons in liquidation of any debt or obligation, or otherwise, are declared null and void.

Each of these sections refers to the act of March 2, 1867, as the authority for its existence, and when we read the act of March 2, 1867, we are at a loss to understand why these sections of the Revised Statutes are so widely separated and why they appear as if each was a separate enactment of Congress. The act of March 2, 1867, found in volume 14, United States Statutes at Large, page 546, the same being chapter 187, does not explain the matter, but the same does state the law and the whole law against peonage. The said act reads as follows:

An act to abolish and forever prohibit the system of peonage in the Territory of New Mexico and other parts of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That the holding of any person to service or labor under the system known as "peonage" is hereby declared to be unlawful, and the same is hereby abolished and forever prohibited in the Territory of New Mexico, or in any other Territory or State of the United States, and all acts, laws, resolutions, orders, regulations, or usages of the Territory of New Mexico, or of any other Territory or State of the United States, which have heretofore established, maintained, or enforced, or by virtue of which any attempt shall hereafter be made to establish, maintain, or enforce, directly or indirectly, the voluntary or involuntary service or labor of any persons as peons in liquidation of any debt or obligation, or otherwise, be and the same are hereby declared null and void; and any person or persons who shall hold, arrest, or return, or cause to be held, arrested, or returned, or in any other manner aid in the arrest or return of any person or persons to a condition of peonage, shall, upon conviction, be punished by fine not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment not less than one nor more than five years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of all persons in the military or civil service in the Territory of New Mexico to aid in the enforcement of the foregoing section of this act; and any person or persons who shall obstruct or attempt to obstruct, or in any way interfere with or prevent the enforcement of this act shall be liable to the punishments and penalties hereby provided, and any officer or other person in the military service of the United States who shall so offend, directly or indirectly, shall on conviction before a court-martial be dishonorably dismissed from the service of the United States, and shall thereafter be ineligible to reappointment to any office of trust, honor, or profit under the Government.

Approved March 2, 1867.

The reading of this act fails to inform us what constitutes "peonage," and fails to clearly enlighten us as to what evil Congress was seeking to remedy. It is important, therefore, to turn to the HISTORY OF THE LEGISLATION.

A reference to the proceedings of the Senate at the second session of the Thirty-ninth Congress, found in the Congressional Globe, volume 38, part 1, page 239, on January 3, 1867, shows that Mr. Sumner offered this resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to consider if any further legislation is needed to prevent enslavement of Indians in New Mexico, or any system of peonage there, and especially to prohibit the employment of the Army of the United States in the surrender of persons claimed as peons.

A letter from N. H. Davis, Assistant Inspector-General, United States Army, was read, as follows:

LAS CRUCES, August 22, 1865.

The commanding officer of Fort Selden will allow and assist, if necessary, the bearer, Don Pedro Garcia, and retain and take in his charge his peon, Antonio Rodriguez, at said post.

By command of General Carleton.

N. H. DAVIS,
Assistant Inspector-General, United States Army.

A further letter from General Davis, specifically ordering Capt. J. H. Whitlock, commanding Fort Selden, N. Mex., among other things, as follows:

You are hereby directed so far to aid in the rendition of peons when claimed by their masters, or there is a reasonable cause to believe that they have deserted them, as not to allow them to remain on the military reservation—was read.

These letters were claimed as justification for the resolution, and the evil complained of in the discussion this day was limited solely to New Mexico. The resolution, after debate, was referred by unanimous consent, not to the Committee on the Judiciary, but to the Committee on Military Affairs (see p. 241), showing that the object of the Senate was to get at the army officers who were assisting in upholding peonage.

On January 26, 1867 (see Congressional Globe, vol. 38, pt. 2, p. 764), in the proceedings of the Senate, Mr. Wilson asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. 543) to abolish and forever prohibit the system of peonage in the Territory of New Mexico and other parts of the United States, and the same was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

On January 28, 1867 (see p. 789, same volume), Mr. Wilson, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the bill with an amendment.

On February 19, 1867 (vol. 38, pt. 3, p. 1571, of the Congressional Globe), Mr. Wilson called up the bill, offered a substitute therefor, which substitute is the identical language of the law as it passed. The substitute was adopted and the bill passed. (See p. 1572.)

In the discussion Mr. Wilson was asked to define peonage, and he did so (p. 1571). He said:

It is a condition of modified servitude which we have inherited from Mexico. It exists in New Mexico at this time, the only part of the country where I know it does exist. In some cases it is voluntary, but in most cases forcible. In the larger towns it is disappearing, but in a portion of the country it still exists, and what is more, officers of the United States, military and civil, have been carrying it out. The object of this bill is to arrest it—to make it the duty of the civil and military officers of the United States to put an end to the system, and not support it. * * * It is a system of modified servitude which is carried on to a great extent in New Mexico, and especially to a lamentable extent with the Indians. A great many Indians are captured and forcibly held in servitude.

Mr. Lane (p. 1571) gave this definition:

By the laws of Mexico, which were existing in New Mexico at the time of the conquest, peonage was established. The system was simply this, as I understood it, that where a Mexican owed a debt his creditor had a right to his labor and services until the debt was paid. The debtor became a domestic servant, and he and his family were supported by the creditor, and the peonage never ended until the debt was discharged. It was a kind of servitude for debt which the committee thought was inconsistent with our institutions. We simply say by this bill that peonage shall be abolished, and the creditor shall be left to all his legal means of collecting his debt, but he shall not hold the peon in slavery.

Mr. Lane further said:

If the Senator will pardon me one moment, I will say that the creditor can not sell the peon, but he can transfer him as he would a mule or a horse and give his services to anybody else. It is a system of serfdom worse than the Russian system ever was.

Mr. Doolittle said:

The sum and substance of the testimony was that probably there were about 2,000 Indians held in New Mexico under that system. But, sir, you will recall the testimony of Judge Benedict, the chief justice of the Territory. He stated that the question having arisen before the United States court in New Mexico upon a habeas corpus it was decided that these persons were free, and the court had discharged them upon habeas corpus. The court had decided that there was no power in the law of New Mexico which would hold a person against his will in servitude; but he stated as a practical fact that these persons remained in the families and in the service of their former masters or employers. Not knowing their rights, not being in a position to go into court to assert their rights, or not having a desire to do so, they were generally remaining in the families of their masters, and probably there were about 2,000 of them in the Territory. * * * Then, as to the system of peonage, it is true that by the law of Mexico, before we acquired the Territory of New Mexico, the system of peonage existed there, a system by which a person indebted to another is compelled specifically to perform labor until the debt is discharged.

The debtor has the privilege under their law of hiring himself out to another man; to get another man or master, if you please, to purchase the debt, and then he goes along with his debt to another master, but as long as the debt remains he is compelled to serve. According to the custom of that country, with that class of people, in the development of civilization which they have attained, the practical fact was that almost always when one desired to hire out the first thing the laborer desired to do was to get in debt to his master, and get in debt as much as he could, and go and live with him. * * * It is a system of serfdom. I understood, however, from the chief justice of the Territory that in the decision which was given by the court they had decided against the power to hold these persons against their will. They were not compelled to remain any longer than they desired to remain, but, as a practical fact, they do reside with the landholders throughout New Mexico to a considerable extent.

Mr. Buckalew (p. 1572) said:

There is no doubt of our jurisdiction in the Territory of New Mexico to enact such a law as the one proposed. I have some knowledge of this system, and I think the necessity of this law is evident. Eventually the courts will weed out this system in that Territory and do it effectually, but it will remain lingering there for a considerable time, unless Congress shall interpose by a law of this kind. Upon the publication of such a statute in that Territory, the whole system will fall to the ground at once.

When we turn to the proceedings of the House, we find that on March 2, 1867, this bill was, upon motion of Mr. Bingham, put upon its passage and passed without debate and without division.

It will be a help to us also to seek—

FURTHER DEFINITIONS OF PEONAGE.

The Standard Dictionary defines "peon" as follows:

A common laborer; a servant; specifically, in Spanish America, one who is bound to serve his creditor until the debt is paid.

And defines "peonage" as "the state of a peon."

Webster's Dictionary defines "peon:"

A day laborer; a servant; especially in some of the Spanish-American countries, a debtor held by his creditor in form of qualified servitude to work out a debt.

And defines "peonage" as "the condition of a peon."

Worcester's Dictionary defines "peon" as—

In Mexico, a day laborer; usually a laborer held in servitude until a debt is discharged; a bondsman for debt.

And defines "peonage:"

The state of peons. Slavery as it exists in Mexico.

The Century Dictionary defines "peon:"

A day laborer; specifically in Spanish America a species of serf compelled to work for his creditor until his debts are paid.

And defines "peonage" as—

A form of servitude existing in Spanish America. It prevailed especially in Mexico.

The International Encyclopedia (vol. 13, p. 918), after describing peonage, its practice, etc., in Mexico, says:

Though in a legal sense the institution long since disappeared, the name of "peon" is still used to designate the laborer of native or mixed blood, and through his ignorance and credulity many of the worst features of the system are yet fastened upon him. The system as then prevailing in Mexico survived in New Mexico and Arizona a few years after the annexation of the Southwest to the United States, but was removed by national enactment March 2, 1867. Recent revelations have shown that the worst features of the convict-labor systems of the South, especially as applied to negro prisoners, closely parallel some of the most flagrant evils of early Spanish-American peonage, and consequently that term has been used, though not with strict accuracy, to designate the condition of these convicts.

Black's Law Dictionary (edition A. D. 1891) defines "peon" as follows:

In Mexico, a debtor held by his creditor in a qualified servitude to work out the debt; a serf. In India, a footman, a soldier, an inferior officer, a servant employed in the business of the revenue, police, or judicature.

Anderson's Dictionary of Law (edition 1889) defines "peonage" as follows:

The state or condition of a peon. In Mexico, a debtor held in servitude until he has worked out his debt.

A still further definition is given by Judge Jones, of Alabama, in 123 Federal Reporter, page 673. The learned judge there says:

Peonage was not slavery as it formerly existed in this country. The peon was not a slave. He was a free man with political as well as civil rights. He entered into the relation from choice, for a definite period, as a result of a mutual contract. The relation was not confined to any race. The child of a peon did not become a peon, and the father could not contract away the services of his minor child, except in rare cases. The peon, male or female, agreed with the master upon the nature of the service, the length of its duration, and compensation. The peon, then, became bound to the master for an indebtedness founded upon an advancement in consideration of service.

Section 5526 of the Revised Statutes, quoted in the foregoing, is the authority that certain Federal courts rely upon as justifying them in seizing individual citizens of the States for the alleged offense of depriving other citizens of the State of their liberty. These citizens are not charged with acting as officials or officers of the State or of any other government. They are not charged with acting under or by virtue of any act, law, resolution, order, regulation, or usage of any State, but they are charged as individuals committing a private wrong upon other individuals, which wrong, through some process of reasoning wholly unintelligible to me, is denominated "peonage."

Now, in order to get at the true meaning and intent of section 5526 we must read it in connection with section 1900, and we must construe it by construing the entire act of 1867, for here is found the complete expression of the legislative will on the subject of "peonage." We must also go further and read the Senate debates in order that we may gather the intention of the lawmakers, for it is the legislative will in connection with the legislative intent that makes the law.

Pursuing this method of investigation, we must conclude, first, that the purpose of the act of 1867 was specifically to abolish "peonage" in New Mexico and to punish persons guilty of "peonage" in New Mexico, and, generally, to make "peonage" unlawful anywhere in the United States.

The debates conclusively show the purpose of the lawmakers; and the second section, directing that "it shall be the duty of all persons in the military or civil service in the Territory of New Mexico," and nowhere else, "to aid in the enforcement" of the first section, shows that the purpose of the lawmakers was carried out in their enactment. In the light of the Senate debates the words "arrest" and "return" clearly were intended to apply to Army officers. It is urged, however, that the words "or in any Territory or State of the United States" appear in the act and that this language was authorized by the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution then in force, and that therefore the penal provisions of the act are leveled against citizens of the States and may be enforced by the United States courts. Let us see how the language quoted is used in the act. We find that the first section of the act, after declaring the "system known as peonage" to be unlawful, says:

And the same is hereby abolished and forever prohibited in the Territory of New Mexico, or in any other Territory or State of the United States, and all acts, laws, resolutions, orders, regulations, or usages of the Territory of New Mexico, or of any other Territory or State of the United States, which have heretofore established, maintained, or enforced, or by virtue of which any attempt shall hereafter be made to establish, maintain, or enforce, directly or indirectly, the voluntary or involuntary service or labor of any persons as peons in liquidation of any debt or obligation or otherwise be, and the same are hereby, declared null and void.

And then follows the penal provisions of the section, in which the word "State" does not occur. Now, what does this act do? It does three things. First, it makes the "system" of peonage unlawful, and abolishes and prohibits the "system" in all the States and Territories; second, it makes null and void in New Mexico, and in all the States and Territories, "all acts, laws, resolutions, orders, regulations, or usages" then or thereafter established by which the voluntary or involuntary service or labor of persons as peons in liquidation of a debt or obligation is permitted, and third, it provides a punishment for holding, arresting, or returning a person to "a condition of peonage."

Construing the act as a whole, it couldn't be contended that the second section of same, directing all persons in the military or civil service in the Territory of New Mexico to aid in the enforcement of the first section, could apply to the first and second things that the act does.

Persons in New Mexico couldn't aid in preventing a "system" of peonage or a "law" authorizing peonage from existing in the several States. They were, therefore, directed to aid in enforcing the law only in New Mexico, to wit, the penal or third provision of the law, which provision was intended to apply only to the Territories and specifically intended to apply to New Mexico. Clearly, therefore, the true intent and meaning of this act, so far as the States were concerned, was to prevent them from establishing a "system" of peonage, or from enacting, maintaining, or enforcing "laws, resolutions, orders, regulations, or usages" by which peonage could be enforced.

So far as the States are concerned, the act is directed specifically against them as States; the only individuals it is directed against are the individuals in the Territories. That such is the meaning of the act is patent from the reading of it, and that Congress intended no other meaning to be given it is fully and completely shown by the debates preceding its passage. I go further, however, and maintain that any other construction of the act will be fatal to its validity. I maintain, and will herein cite the authorities in justification thereof, that to construe the penal provisions of the act as applicable to individuals in a State would make the law void for want of constitutional power in the Congress. In my view the construction I give the act is one so imperatively demanded by reason as to call for no authority on construction; but I cite:

If a section of an act of Congress admits of two interpretations, one of which brings it within and the other presses it beyond the constitutional authority of Congress, it is the duty of the Supreme Court to adopt the former construction, because a presumption never ought to be indulged that Congress meant to exercise or usurp unconstitutional authority, unless that conclusion is forced upon the court by language altogether unambiguous. (12 Peters, 72.)

Just here, and before proceeding to the citation of authorities on the main question, I call attention to the very important fact that the act, construing it as a whole, is not directed against individuals acting independently of a "system," "law," "usage," or "regulation," no matter where the individuals reside, whether in a State or in a Territory.

The title of the act is "to abolish and forever prohibit the system of peonage in the Territory of New Mexico and other parts of the United States." In the outset, therefore, it is announced that it is a "system," not individual acts, that is prohibited. The act proceeds to make the "system known as peonage" unlawful and prohibits it. It then recognizes that the "system" it is seeking to abolish is one arising by "law, regulation, or usage," etc., and proceeds to make all such laws, regulations, or usages null and void; but it will be noted that the act does not make null and void any law, regulation, usage, etc., by which there is maintained merely the voluntary or involuntary service or labor of a person in liquidation of a debt or obligation. The act requires more than this to make the law, regulation, or usage void. It contains the words "as peons."

The thing that is made null and void is the law, regulation, or usage that permits or authorizes persons to be held in the voluntary or involuntary service or labor "as peons" in liquidation of a debt or obligation. After these inhibitions against the acts of States, the act then proceeds, without even the intervention of a period, "and any person or persons who shall hold, arrest, or return, or cause to be held, arrested, or returned, etc., any person or persons"—to what? To involuntary service? No. To peonage? No; but returned "to a condition of peonage," shall be punished, etc.

We must of necessity read this language in connection with what precedes it, and thus reading it we know that a "condition of peonage" means a "system known as peonage." It means "the voluntary or involuntary service or labor of a person as a peon in liquidation of a debt or obligation or otherwise," which is obtained "by virtue" of an "act, law, resolution, order, regulation, or usage, established, maintained, or enforced" by a State or Territory.

It follows, therefore, that before a person can "hold, arrest, or return" another to a "condition of peonage" the "system" of peonage must exist, and must exist by virtue of some "act, law, resolution, usage," etc., maintained or enforced by the State or Territory.

"Peonage," it is clear from this act, is something authorized, recognized, or maintained by the State or Territory. An individual can not create it. Once created by the State or Territory, the individual can "hold" or "return" a person to it, or "arrest" a person who has fled from it, and this is the thing that is made criminal for him to do. The act of 1867 abolishes the "system," makes null and void laws then or thereafter enacted that authorize it, and at the same time makes it a penal offense for any person to hold or return a person to the "system" thus abolished.

The act is thus aimed only incidentally at the individual. Its real purpose was to make null and void the laws authorizing the "system," and to abolish the "system," and as a means to that end provision was made to punish the individual. Clearly, therefore, preliminary to punishing the individual the "system" must be shown as existing and as existing by virtue of some law or usage maintained or enforced by the State or Territory. An individual acting as an individual and independently of any law, regulation, or usage maintained or enforced by his State or Territory could not be guilty of "peonage." His offense under such circumstances, if he deprived another person of his liberty, would be the invasion of the private rights of one individual by another individual. It would be a private wrong. It would be just such a crime or wrong as the local law might prescribe, and a crime for the local law to punish, and one over which Congress would have no jurisdiction.

We have, therefore, two conclusions from a careful reading of the act of 1867, either one of which is sufficient to deny the Federal court's jurisdiction to punish individuals in the State of Georgia for the alleged offense of "peonage." First, the penal provision of the act, from the letter and language of the act itself, is directed against individuals in the Territories, and is not applicable elsewhere; second, this penal provision is not directed against individuals anywhere whose acts are outside and independent of a "system" of peonage established, maintained, or enforced by some act, law, resolution, order, regulation, or usage of a State or Territory, and no such "system" being alleged or shown to exist in Georgia, the offense of holding, arresting, or returning a person to a "condition of peonage" can not exist in Georgia.

Having shown that the natural and ordinary construction of the act of 1867 is sufficient in itself to deny the Federal courts jurisdiction in the States to punish for the alleged offense of "peonage," I now proceed to demonstrate that this natural construction is the only legal construction that can be given the act, and that Congress has no power to provide for the punishment of a private wrong by one citizen of a State against another citizen of the same State. It necessarily follows, therefore, that if Congress never intended to provide such a punishment, and could not, even though it intended to do so, that no such punishment is provided by the act of 1867.

The argument is made, as I have suggested, that the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution justifies the use of the word "State" in the act; and the word "State" being in the act, the act in its entirety is applicable to all States and Territories and the citizens thereof. The thirteenth amendment is as follows:

SECTION 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

I first call attention to the point already made that the act of 1867 only applies to States as States. It abolishes a certain "system" in the States and makes it unlawful, and annuls and makes void all laws that authorize it. The act attempts to go no further than that, so far as the States are concerned, and as to whether it can constitutionally go that far depends entirely upon whether "peonage" is such slavery or involuntary servitude as the thirteenth amendment prohibits. Certainly there is no other provision of the Constitution that would permit Congress to abolish a system of "peonage" in the States; and if "peonage" is a form of servitude less than the slavery and involuntary servitude prohibited by the thirteenth amendment, it would not be abolished in the States by the act of 1867, assuming that it existed in the States, for the act to that extent would be void.

It is interesting in this connection to note that this act solemnly says, "The system known as peonage is hereby declared to be unlawful and the same is hereby abolished and forever prohibited." Now, when Congress made this declaration the thirteenth amendment was in force. The President's proclamation announcing its ratification was made December 14, 1865. This amendment, the Supreme Court has said, "by its own unaided force and effect abolished slavery and established universal freedom." The court says it is "self-executing." Therefore, when the act of 1867 was passed the things prohibited by the thirteenth amendment were already unlawful and were already abolished. Isn't it absurd to suppose that Congress undertook in 1867 to make by a Congressional act slavery and involuntary servitude unlawful and to abolish them, and to make any law of a State authorizing them null and void?

Such a declaration by Congress in 1867 did not add to the force and effect of the thirteenth amendment. It is not the act of 1867 that prohibits the States from recognizing slavery. It is the thirteenth amendment that makes the prohibition, and with the act of 1867 repealed the States would be just as powerless to establish slavery as they are with it in existence. Are we not to presume that Congress knew all this when it passed the act of 1867? If we do so presume, then we must further presume that when Congress in 1867 said the "system known as peonage" is "hereby" made unlawful and is "hereby" prohibited and abolished, Congress had in mind something that was not slavery and something that was not unlawful involuntary servitude. This view is strengthened by the definitions of "peonage" hereinbefore given, in which it is most frequently referred to as a "qualified form of servitude," and, following this line of reasoning, we reach the conclu ion that in the opinion of Congress "peonage" did not come within the definition of slavery or involuntary servitude.

It is not important to the proposition maintained by me whether Congress did or did not have the power to make null and void any State law authorizing "peonage," because there is no contention and couldn't be that any such State law exists. It does follow, however, that if Congress had no power to make State "peonage" laws void, still less would it have power to provide punishment for an individual in a State for the offense of "peonage."

But, recurring to the thirteenth amendment in connection with the act of 1867, these conclusions, from all that has been stated, are inevitable:

First, that in passing the act of 1867 Congress was not undertaking to legislate the thirteenth amendment into a statute—

(a) Because the terms "slavery" and "involuntary servitude" do not appear in the act.

(b) Because the act uses the term "voluntary service," which the thirteenth amendment does not authorize.

(c) Because to the term "voluntary or involuntary service or labor of any persons" is added "as peons," showing that Congress was dealing with something separate and apart from the "involuntary servitude" named in the thirteenth amendment.

Second, that the thirteenth amendment was not necessary to give Congress jurisdiction to pass the act of 1867, so far as concerned its application to the Territories, because, as to the Territories, Congress had plenary power.

I now wish to direct attention to the specific reasons why Congress could not and can not pass a law providing a punishment for citizens of a State committing the alleged offense of "peonage" against other citizens of the same State.

There being no law, resolution, order, or usage of the State by which "peonage" is maintained, established, or enforced, the act of a citizen in depriving another citizen of his liberty, call the offense "peonage" or any other name, is merely the act of an individual. The wrong is a private wrong, and the power to punish for it is vested exclusively in the State. Such punishment comes within the police power of the State, and Congress has no jurisdiction to punish same. Our system of government is a dual one. We have a National Government and a State government. Each has certain powers, duties, and jurisdictions, and each is sovereign in its proper sphere. The Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers. The ninth amendment to the Constitution reads:

The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

The tenth amendment reads:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

Now, specifically as to what powers were reserved by the States and the people and denied to the United States Government by the foregoing amendments, I quote 14 Howard, 17:

The power to make municipal regulations for the restraint and punishment of crime, for the preservation of the health and morals of her citizens, has never been surrendered by the States or restrained by the Constitution of the United States.

9 Wallace, 41, says:

No power is conferred by the Constitution upon Congress to establish mere police regulations within the States.

1 Wheaton, 304, 326, says:

The Government of the United States can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given, or given by necessary implication.

16 Wallace (Slaughterhouse Cases), 82, says:

Under the pressure of all the excited feeling growing out of the war our statesmen still believed that the existence of the States, with powers for domestic and local government, including the regulation of civil rights, the rights of persons and of property, was essential to the perfect working of our complete form of government.

92 U. S., 542, seventh headnote, says:

Sovereignty for the protection of life and personal liberty within the respective States rests alone with the States.

113 United States, 31, in speakng of the fourteenth amendment, says:

But neither the amendment, broad and comprehensive as it is, nor any other amendment was designed to interfere with the power of the State, sometimes termed its "police power," to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people, etc.

95 United States, 672:

But an act committed within a State for a good or bad purpose, or whether with an honest or criminal intent, can not be made an offense against the United States unless it have relation to the execution of a power of Congress or to some matter within the jurisdiction of the United States. An act not having such relation is one in respect to which the State can alone legislate.

106 United States, 629 (Harris case), involved the constitutionality of section 5519 of the Revised Statutes. The court held the same unauthorized by the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments or by any other provision of the Constitution. The court says (p. 643):

A private person can not make constitutions or laws, nor can he, with authority, construe them, nor can he administer or execute them. The only way, therefore, in which the private person can deprive another of equal protection of the laws is by the commission of some offense against the laws which protect the rights of persons, as by theft, burglary, arson, libel, assault, or murder. If, therefore, we hold that section 5519 is warranted by the thirteenth amendment, we should, by virtue of that amendment, accord to Congress the power to punish every crime by which the right of any person to life, property, or reputation is involved. Thus, under a provision of the Constitution which simply abolished slavery and involuntary servitude, we should, with few exceptions, invest Congress with power over the whole catalogue of crimes.

Again, on page 644, speaking of second section, Article IV, of the Constitution, the court said:

It was never supposed that the section under consideration conferred on Congress the power to enact a law which would punish a private citizen for an invasion of the rights of his fellow-citizens conferred by the State of which they were both residents on all its citizens alike.

In 140 United States, 554, the court said:

The power of the State to impose restraints and burdens upon persons and property in conservatism and promotion of the public health, good order, and prosperity is a power originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to the General Government, nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States and essentially exclusive. In short, it is not to be doubted that the power to make the ordinary regulations of police remains with the individual States and can not be assumed by the National Government, and that in this respect it is not interfered with by the fourteenth amendment.

Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 706, says:

In the American constitutional system the power to establish the ordinary regulations of police has been left with the individual States, and it can not be taken from them, either wholly or in part, and exercised under legislation of Congress. Neither can the National Government, through any of its departments or officers, assume any supervision of the police regulations of the States.

Again, in 704, the same writer says:

The police of a State, in a comprehensive sense, embraces its whole system of internal regulations by which the State seeks not only to preserve the public order, but also to establish for the intercourse of citizens with citizens those rules of good manners and good neighborhood which are calculated to prevent a conflict of rights and to insure to each the uninterrupted enjoyment of his own so far as is reasonably consistent with a like enjoyment of rights by others.

Pomeroy on Constitutional Law (p. 154) says:

Those affairs which are local, which affect the individual citizen in his private capacity, abstracted from his relations to the whole political society, are managed by the separate State governments which were found in existence and left remaining in existence by the same Constitution.

The contention is made, however, that the thirteenth amendment prohibits slavery and involuntary servitude and gives Congress power to enforce the prohibition by appropriate legislation, and therefore that Congress has the power to punish a citizen in a State for the offense of slavery and the offense of involuntary servitude. We are concerned just now not so much with the question of the power of Congress to enact such punishment as we are with the question whether or not the act of 1867 is the exercise of such power by Congress. We have shown, as I think, conclusively that Congress in said act did not intend and did not attempt to exercise such power.

I now submit further, as the authorities to follow will demonstrate, that the only way by which Congress could exercise such power would be by an act directed against those who practiced slavery or involuntary servitude under and by virtue of a State law; and the act of 1867 not being directed in that way, the same is not "appropriate" legislation under the thirteenth amendment.

What is slavery? The Supreme Court, in 163 United States, 542, gives this definition:

Slavery implies involuntary servitude, a state of bondage, the ownership of mankind as a chattel, or at least the control of the labor and service of one man for the benefit of another, and the absence of a legal right to the disposal of his own person, property, and service.

With this definition before us we can the more easily appreciate the force of the following declaration made by the Supreme Court in 109 United States, 20:

It is true that slavery can not exist without law any more than property in lands and goods can exist without law, and therefore the thirteenth amendment may be regarded as nullifying all State laws which establish or uphold slavery.

In the light of this announcement from the Supreme Court, saying without a law authorizing it there is no slavery, how can it be lawful or constitutional for Congress to provide a punishment for an individual charged with slavery, the charge being against him as an individual and independent of any State law authorizing his conduct? Can such a law by any possibility be held appropriate legislation under the thirteenth amendment, or under any other provision of the Constitution?

It is said, however, that it is against "peonage" that the act of 1867 is directed, and not against legalized slavery. I submit that there is no distinction between slavery and peonage possible to be made under the thirteenth amendment. If peonage comes within the operation of the thirteenth amendment, it is because and only because it is slavery. We must remember, too, that the only justification for enforcing the act of 1867 in Georgia is given in the claim that the act is authorized by the thirteenth amendment. Therefore to claim one rule for slavery and another rule for peonage is to beg the whole question. But let us see about "peonage."

In the Slaughterhouse Cases (16 Wallace, 72) the court says:

Undoubtedly, while negro slavery alone was in the mind of the Congress which proposed the thirteenth article, it forbids any other kind of slavery, now or hereafter. If Mexican peonage or the Chinese cooly labor system shall develop slavery of the Mexican or Chinese race within our territory, this amendment may safely be trusted to make it void.

The headnote says:

While the thirteenth article of amendment was intended primarily to abolish African slavery, it equally forbids Mexican peonage or the Chinese cooly trade, where they amount to slavery or involuntary servitude.

Here we have the declaration from the very highest source that the only peonage affected by the thirteenth amendment is that which develops or amounts to slavery or involuntary servitude. Consequently the same rule applies to peonage that applies to slavery; and the rule as to slavery being, if there is no law to authorize it there is no slavery; it necessarily follows, if there is no law to authorize "peonage," there is no peonage. In this connection, if we will recur to the Senate debates and to the entire act of 1867, we will again learn that this act was directed against a "system" that was maintained, enforced, and established by law—to wit, by the Mexican law. Senator Doolittle said:

It is true that by the law of Mexico before we acquired the Territory of New Mexico the system of peonage existed there.

The act being intended and being directed only against a "system" recognized by law, and our Supreme Court having said that this "system" can not exist except by law, where does a United States district court in Georgia get authority or jurisdiction, without allegation that a peonage law exists, and without proof that it exists, to punish a citizen of Georgia for the offense of peonage? The act of 1867 confers no such authority under any possible construction, and the thirteenth amendment confers no such authority under any legislation appropriate or otherwise that has ever been enacted by Congress.

We know that Congress has never passed a law providing punishment for slavery or for involuntary servitude in those terms, and we learn from the authorities above referred to why Congress has not done so. There could be no occasion or reason for Congress to do so unless some State subsequent to the thirteenth amendment had undertaken by its laws to maintain slavery; and, more than this, the offense could not be defined and could not exist unless some State did retain or enact a law maintaining slavery. No State having done this, Congress has never acted.

If Congress did act, its action would of necessity be directed not against an individual acting as an individual, but acting as an officer or in some public capacity or under and by virtue of the State law. This will be patent from the authorities to follow. My contention now is that the act of 1867 was not and is not an exercise of the power, whatever it may be, that Congress has under the thirteenth amendment. The contention is made, however, that the thirteenth amendment is broad and comprehensive, and that it acts upon individuals as well as States.

Let us see the exact language used by the Supreme Court in this regard. In the civil rights cases reported in 109 United States, the court, in referring to the thirteenth amendment, on page 20, says:

By its own unaided force and effect it abolished slavery and established universal freedom. Still, legislation may be necessary and proper to meet all the various cases and circumstances to be affected by it, and to prescribe proper modes of redress for its violation in letter or spirit, and such legislation may be primary and direct in its character, for the amendment is not a mere prohibition of the State laws establishing or upholding slavery, but an absolute declaration that slavery or involuntary servitude shall not exist in any part of the United States.

Again, on page 23, the court says:

Under the thirteenth amendment, the legislation, so far as is necessary or proper to eradicate all forms and incidents of slavery and involuntary servitude, may be direct and primary, operating upon the acts of individuals, whether sanctioned by State legislation or not.

Again, on page 20, the court says:

But it has a reflex character also, establishing and decreeing universal civil and political freedom throughout the United States; and it is assumed that the power vested in Congress to enforce the article by appropriate legislation clothes Congress with power to pass all laws necessary and proper for abolishing all badges and incidents of slavery in the United States.

Whatever the contention may be as to the exact meaning of this language, there are two facts already established that makes its meaning of no importance to our contention. The one is that this same decision announced that without a law authorizing it there can be no slavery, and the other is that there is no law in Georgia recognizing slavery or peonage. It follows, therefore, that no matter what Congress may have the power to do, a citizen of Georgia can not be held guilty of an offense that he can not commit. Our real concern, however, is not what Congress might do under the language quoted, but what Congress has done.

No matter how broad the language quoted, it can not and does not add to the words and meaning of the act of 1867. I have already shown what that act is and what it means. I wish now to show that the very decision quoted from sustains my construction of the act and sustains further my proposition that the only individual in the State who can be acted on penally by the thirteenth amendment (and I care not how the amendment may otherwise affect him) is the individual who practices slavery or involuntary servitude as a part of a "system" and as an official or under and by virtue of a law or usage recognized and maintained by the State.

The first witness I will call is Mr. Solicitor-General Phillips, who filed the brief for the Government in the case under consideration and who speaks as to the system. On page 7 of the report his brief reads:

Granting that by involuntary servitude, as prohibited in the thirteenth amendment, is intended some institution—viz, custom, etc.—of that sort, and not primarily mere scattered trespasses against liberty committed by private persons, yet, considering what must be the social tendency in at least large parts of the country, it is "appropriate legislation" against such an institution to forbid any action by private persons which in the light of our history may reasonably be apprehended to tend, on account of its being incidental to quasi public occupations, to create an institution.

It is well to note that the court disagreed with the conclusion drawn from his premise.

The next witness I will call is Mr. Justice Harlan, who disagreed in part from the conclusions of the majority of the court. In his dissenting opinion (p. 36) he said, as to the individual:

Congress, therefore, under its express power to enforce that amendment (thirteenth) by appropriate legislation, may enact laws to protect that people (African) against the deprivation because of their race, of any civil rights granted to other freemen in the same State, and such legislation may be of a direct and primary character, operating upon States, their officers and agents, and also upon at least such individuals and corporations as exercise public functions and wield power and authority under the State.

I then call attention to the opinion of the majority of the court, holding that the first and second sections of the act of Congress under consideration were void. These sections provided a punishment for individuals who denied equal accommodations to all citizens at inns, theaters, on public conveyances, etc. The contention was made that denying the same accommodations to negroes as was given to whites was to affix or maintain a badge or incident of slavery upon the negro and was therefore in violation of the thirteenth amendment. The contention was, of course, also made that it was in violation of the fourteenth amendment. The majority of the court in their opinion adverted to the act of 1866, reenacted in 1870. This was the act intended to give full force and effect to the thirteenth amendment, and it may be well to quote it here. Said act reads:

That all persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States, and such citizens of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall have the same right in every State and Territory of the United States to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, hold, and convey real and personal property and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property, as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishments, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulations, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 2. That any person who under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom shall subject or cause to be subjected any inhabitant of any State or Territory to the deprivation of any right secured and protected by this act, etc., shall be punished, etc.

The court in the opinion we are quoting from says, on page 16, in speaking of this act of 1866:

But the penal part by which the declaration (in the first section) is enforced and which is really the effective part of the law retains the reference to State laws by making the penalty apply only to those who should subject parties to a deprivation of their rights under color of any statute, ordinance, custom, etc., of any State or Territory.

Further, in the same opinion, page 15, the court holds that the fourth section of the act it is then considering, which section provides a punishment against any person charged with summoning jurors in a State who shall exclude or fail to summons a citizen on account of race, color, or previous condition, is constitutional, but says:

But a moment's attention to its terms will show that the section is entirely corrective in its character. Disqualifications for service on juries are only created by the law, and the first part of the section is aimed at certain disqualifying laws * * * and the second clause is directed against those who in assuming to use the authority of the State government carry into effect such a rule of disqualification.

Note this language, "Disqualifications for service on juries are only created by the law," and therefore the man who acts under the authority of the State government can be punished. Note that the man who acts under color of "law, statute, ordinance" of State or Territory is punished under the act of 1866, and then note that the man who acts as an individual in denying equal accommodations at inns, theaters, etc., can not be punished. Then apply this to slavery. It, too, is "created only by the law." It follows, therefore, that only the person who practices slavery under the authority of his State government can be punished by Federal statute. He can not practice it in any other way. If, as an individual, he deprives another individual of his liberty, he commits a private wrong, for which he is amenable only to his State.

If anything more were needed to demonstrate the correctness of this contention it is found in the civil rights act of 1866, just quoted. The significance of this act lies in the language of the second section, which expresses the Congressional interpretation of the thirteenth amendment, to the effect that the power to punish under this amendment is limited to those individuals who act under color of law, statute, ordinance, etc., of any State or Territory. We are thus sustained in our contention by both Congressional and Supreme Court interpretation.

If it be suggested, however, that Congress did not recognize any such interpretation in the act of 1867 and did not limit same to individuals acting under color of law, the answer is that in that act Congress was legislating for the Territory of New Mexico, and the limitation was not necessary, for the power of Congress there was plenary.

The mere fact that Congress did not place the same limitation in the act of 1867 that it placed in the act of 1866, is in itself a powerful, if not convincing, argument that Congress in 1867 was not attempting to reach persons in the States. To give the act of 1867 the construction we insist upon is to maintain for New Mexico, the only part of the United States in which "peonage" existed, a just and wholesome law, but to give it the construction that some Federal courts have given it is to do violence to the legislative intent, to the ordinary meaning of words, to all rules of construction, to the Constitution itself, and is to defeat and annul an otherwise beneficent law.

But, pursuing the subject yet further, I invite attention to some other amendments of the Constitution to be considered in connection with the thirteenth amendment. The fifth amendment, among other things, says:

Nor shall any person * * * be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

The fourteenth amendment, among other things, says:

Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

Clearly this part of the fourteenth amendment is an inhibition against the States, but equally clear is it that the part of the fifth amendment quoted is not. Now, if Congress, under the thirteenth amendment, the same merely saying that involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, shall not exist within the United States, can punish a citizen of a State for holding another citizen of the same State in involuntary servitude, when in doing so he acts as an individual and without authority of law, why can not Congress punish the citizen of a State who wantonly takes the life of another citizen of the same State?

The victim of the murderer is deprived of his life "without due process of law," and the murderer has violated the Constitution just as much as the person has who holds another in involuntary servitude and, in addition, has committed a much more serious crime. To hold another in involuntary servitude is to deprive him of his liberty. Then why not punish the individual who does this by act of Congress under the fifth amendment, as well as under the thirteenth amendment?

You may well say you can not punish him under the fourteenth amendment, because that amendment is directed specifically against the States, but the fifth amendment is not so directed. Why not punish him under that? The reason you can not do so is stated in 123 United States, 166, as follows:

That the first ten articles of amendment were not intended to limit the powers of the State governments in respect to their own people, but to operate on the National Government alone, was decided more than a half century ago, and that decision has been steadily adhered to since.

To the same effect is 153 United States, 538; 164 United States, 158; 175 United States, 174.

In other words, the fifth amendment, being one of the first ten, is merely a limitation on the United States Government itself. It is a part of the bill of rights necessary to the liberty of a free people. It is the declaration of the people that their Government shall not deprive them of life, liberty, or property except by due process of law. I have called attention, however, to the language of the fifth amendment to show how easy it is to enter upon fallacious reasoning as to the thirteenth amendment.

Now I want to consider the fifth, the thirteenth, and the fourteenth amendments together. It is certainly competent to consider the thirteenth and fourteenth together, and, indeed, the fifteenth, for the Supreme Court has said that the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments are each part of one general scheme to give freedom and liberty to the negro race and to place this race on an equality with the white race in all civil rights.

Now, the fifth, the thirteenth, and the fourteenth amendments each deals with human liberty. The fifth is an inhibition against the power of the United States Government to deprive a person of liberty except by "due process of law;" the fourteenth is an inhibition against the power of State governments to deprive a person of liberty, except by "due process of law;" the thirteenth is but an enlargement of the inhibition contained in the fifth and fourteenth amendments—it applies to both the State and the National governments and says that neither of them, even with "due process of law," shall deprive a person of liberty, if such deprivation amounts to slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment of crime.

That the thirteenth amendment in its prohibitory phase is not directed against individuals, but is directed against government, State and National, must be true, because we have already seen that slavery can not exist except through law, and law necessarily means government. That the thirteenth amendment in its declaratory phase does not apply to individuals we have seen in the opinion of the Supreme Court in the civil-rights cases. The court says:

> The amendment is not a mere prohibition of the State laws establishing or upholding slavery, but an absolute declaration that slavery or involuntary servitude shall not exist in any part of the United States.

Also:

> The legislation so far as is necessary or proper to eradicate all forms and incidents of slavery and involuntary servitude may be direct and primary, operating upon the acts of individuals, whether sanctioned by State legislation or not.

In other words, the prohibitory feature is against laws, State or national, that uphold slavery. The declaratory feature ignores State lines, breaks down the barriers of police power, enters the States and declares freedom and liberty to exist there, and that any "proper" legislation operating upon the individual, and "necessary" to give him freedom, Congress may enact, "whether sanctioned by State legislation or not."

The declaratory feature says that notwithstanding a State has the power to regulate the intercourse of its citizens, the one with the other, and to prescribe a rule of conduct for them, whether or not a State declares its citizens to be freemen, they are freemen, "without the legislative sanction of the State" as well as with it.

When we deal, however, with the prohibitory feature of the amendment, we find, as already stated, that of reason and necessity this is directed against the States, and any punishment that Congress may enact in pursuance of the amendment must be under that phase of it which prohibits and can in reason, law, and logic be directed only against those who invoke, or claim, or in some way seek to justify their conduct by the laws, rules, regulations, or usage of their State government. It would be the veriest waste of time for Congress to pass a law that no State shall establish slavery or involuntary servitude. The thirteenth amendment has already said that, and under that "self-executing" amendment no State can legally and constitutionally establish slavery.

Congress can not say that whoever practices slavery shall be punished, for that would be to state no offense, because nobody can practice slavery without the help of his State. The thirteenth amendment makes such help by the State of no avail to him who invokes it, for it is this help that the thirteenth amendment prohibits, but it must be invoked for the amendment to apply.

What Congress can do and all that Congress can do is to say whoever practices slavery "by the help of his State" shall be punished, but Congress has never so much as said that. The act of 1867, if it were otherwise applicable to Georgia, does not read that way; and even if it read that way, a conviction could not be had in Georgia under it, because the offense, as thus defined, could not be proven.

Having thus demonstrated, as I think, clearly and satisfactorily that the prohibitory feature of the thirteenth amendment is directed only against the States, and that being the only feature of the amendment that concerns us in this discussion, I now want to direct attention to some further opinions of the Supreme Court that I think pertinent and applicable to the contentions herein made and conclusive of their correctness. These opinions relate largely to the fourteenth amendment, but I have already shown that both the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments relate to liberty and are each a part of one general scheme, and I think these opinions directly in point as to the effect, meaning, and power of Congress under any limitation or prohibition of power against the States that is expressed in the Constitution.

109 United States, 17:

> In this connection it is proper to state that simple rights, such as are guaranteed by the Constitution against State aggression, can not be impaired by the wrongful act of individuals, unsupported by State authority in the shape of laws, customs, or judicial or executive proceeding. The wrongful act of an individual, unsupported by any such authority, is simply a private wrong, or a crime of that individual.

The court was speaking of the fourteenth amendment, and speaking of this also, the court says (p. 11):

> It is State action of a particular character that is prohibited. Individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject-matter of the amendment.

Further (p. 11):

> It does not authorize Congress to create a code of municipal law for the regulation of private rights, but to provide modes of redress against the operation of State laws and the action of State officers, executive or judicial, when these are subversive of the fundamental rights specified in the amendment.

Also:

> It does not invest Congress with power to legislate upon subjects which are within the domain of State legislation.

Also (p. 13):

> Such legislation can not properly cover the whole domain of rights appertaining to life, liberty, and property, defining them and providing for their vindication. That would be to establish a code of municipal law regulative of all private rights between man and man in society. It would be to make Congress take the place of the State legislatures and to succeed them. It is absurd to affirm that, because the rights of life, liberty, and property (which include all civil rights that men have) are by the amendment sought to be protected against invasion on the part of the State without due process of law, Congress may therefore provide due process of law for their vindication in every case.

Further, the court said (p. 14), in speaking of the act of Congress requiring the furnishing of equal accommodations at inns, theaters, etc.:

> It applies equally to cases arising in States which have the justest laws respecting the personal rights of citizens and whose authorities are ever ready to enforce such laws as to those which arise in States that may have violated the prohibition of the amendment. In other words, it steps into the domain of local jurisprudence and lays down rules for the conduct of individuals in society toward each other and imposes sanction for the enforcement of those rules without referring in any manner to any supposed action of the State or its authorities.
> If this legislation is appropriate for enforcing the prohibitions of the amendment, it is difficult to see where it is to stop. Why may not Congress, with equal show of authority, enact a code of laws for the enforcement and vindication of all rights of life, liberty, and property?

In 16 Wallace, 78:

> The argument, we admit, is not always the most conclusive which is drawn from the consequences urged against the adoption of a particular construction of an instrument. But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions; when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character * * * the argument has a force that is irresistible, etc.

Harris case (106 U. S., p. 629): This case involved the constitutionality of section 5519 of the Revised Statutes, which section provided a punishment:

> If two or more persons in any State or Territory conspire or go in disguise upon the highway or on the premises of another for the purpose of depriving, either directly or indirectly, any person or class of persons of the equal protection of the laws, or of equal privileges and immunities under the laws, or for the purpose of preventing or hindering the constituted authorities of any State or Territory from giving or securing to all persons within such State or Territory the equal protection of the laws, etc.

This statute, in this opinion, is held unconstitutional, and the entire opinion is valuable and to the point. It is held that neither the thirteenth, fourteenth, or fifteenth amendments to the Constitution, or section 2 of Article IV of the Constitution, authorized this statute, and that no other provision of the Constitution authorized it.

As to the fourteenth amendment, the court says (p. 638):

> It is perfectly clear from the language of the first section that its purpose was to place a restraint upon the action of the States.

And again, on page 639, the court says:

> Where the State has been guilty of no violations of its provisions, where it has not made or enforced any law abridging the privilege or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor none of its departments has deprived any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of the law, or denied to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law; when, on the contrary, the laws of the State, as enacted by its legislative and construed by its judicial and administered by its executive departments, recognize and protect the rights of all persons, the amendment imposes no duty and confers no power upon Congress.

United States v. Cruikshank et al. (92 U. S., p. 542), the first headnote:

> The duty of a government to afford protection is limited always by the power it possesses for that purpose.

The third headnote:

The Government of the United States, although it is within the scope of its powers supreme and beyond the States, can neither grant nor secure to its citizens rights or privileges which are not expressly or by implication placed under its jurisdiction. All that can not be so granted or secured are left to the exclusive protection of the States.

The eighth headnote:

The duty of protecting all of its citizens in the enjoyment of an equality of rights was originally assumed by the States, and it still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right.

100 United States, 339:

Whoever by virtue of his public position under a State government deprives another of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or denies or takes away the equal protection of the laws, violates that inhibition. (Fourteenth amendment.)

136 United States, 436; 137 United States, 624; 127 United States, 678:

The fourteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution was not designed to interfere with the power of the State to protect the lives, liberties, and property of its citizens and to promote their health, peace, morals, education, and good order.

139 United States, 463:

By the fourteenth amendment the powers of States in dealing with crime within their borders are not limited, except that no State can deprive particular persons or classes of persons of equal and impartial justice under the law, etc.

We learn throughout these opinions that the protection of the lives, liberties, and property of citizens rests upon the States; that this duty was originally assumed by the States and remains there, and consequently was not assumed by and does not vest in the United States Government, and that so long as the States do not violate the inhibitions against them fixed by the Constitution these inhibitions impose no duty and confer no power upon Congress.

If the act of 1867 means what some of the Federal courts say it means, and if it be true that "mere scattered trespasses against liberty by private persons" may be punished in the Federal courts under an act of Congress that is valid, then we may well ask, in the language of the Supreme Court, "Why may not Congress, with equal show of authority, enact a code of laws for the enforcement and vindication of all rights of liberty and property?" And we may also ask, "Why not make Congress take the place of the State legislatures and succeed them?"

I think it entirely proper now to direct attention to the Georgia law on the subject of slavery and liberty; to show our constitution, our statutes, and their interpretation by our supreme court. Preliminary to this, however, I direct attention to a further expression of opinion by the Supreme Court of the United States. The court, in 103 U. S., 370, said:

A State must recognize as binding an amendment to the Constitution of the United States and enforce it within its own limits, without reference to any inconsistent provisions in its own constitution or statutes.

The State of Georgia has complied with this mandatory declaration. She has recognized the thirteenth amendment as binding, and she has enacted a constitution and competent laws to enforce it, and, in my judgment, has enforced her laws as well as any State in the Union.

The Supreme Court further, in the opinion quoted from (p. 389), said:

The presumption should be indulged in the first instance that the State recognizes as its plain duty an amendment of the Federal Constitution from the time of its adoption as binding on all its citizens and every department of its government, and to be enforced within its limits without reference to any inconsistent provisions in its own constitution or statutes.

This is an indirect, though none the less emphatic and correct, announcement that Georgia was looked to, under our system of government, to enforce the thirteenth amendment; that the duty of enforcing it devolved upon her; that the National Government should assume, in the first instance at least, that she would enforce it, and impliedly that it would be time enough for Congress to undertake its enforcement when Georgia failed to do it. The presumption was well indulged so far as Georgia is concerned. She has recognized and enforced the amendment.

So well has she discharged the obligations resting upon her, and so well have all the slave States done so, that Congress has not until this hour found any reason, necessity, or excuse for providing a punishment against anybody for using the power or authority of his State to practice slavery or involuntary servitude.

It has remained for certain of the Federal courts in their eager reach for power to not only ignore the presumption suggested and directed by the Supreme Court, but to ignore as well the constitutions and laws of their respective States and to ferret out a Territorial law that for thirty years and more has been recognized only as a Territorial law, and through and by what I believe to be misconstruction and misinterpretation—and I charge nothing more than this—to distort same into a law that Congress never dreamed of enacting, that Congress has never found any necessity for enacting, and into a law that, if Congress had enacted it, would clearly be invalid.

THE GEORGIA LAW.

The Georgia constitution prescribes (Code, sec. 5714):

Slavery.—There shall be within the State of Georgia neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, save as a punishment for crime after legal conviction thereof.

The constitution further says (Code, sec. 5718):

There shall be no imprisonment for debt.

Further (Code, sec. 5763):

Legislative acts in violation of the constitution or of the Constitution of the United States are void, and the judiciary shall so declare them.

In 72 Georgia, 69, third headnote, the court held:

If the plaintiff hired a person of full age to the defendant and received from him the note in suit for the services of the person so hired, this was an illegal transaction, and the note so given was void as being contrary to public policy and in violation of the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States and of paragraph 17 of the bill of rights in the constitution of Georgia.

In 74 Georgia, 247, the court held:

Besides, we are not aware of any power possessed by a court of equity or any other court to compel a party to perform personal service for another which he had contracted to perform but was unwilling to render. This would reduce him to involuntary servitude, not as punishment for crime, but for an alleged breach of contract, and would be directly in the teeth of the constitution

In 95 Georgia, 538, the court holds:

The county authorities have no power to hire out convicts sentenced under the provisions of section 4310 to a private individual, whether, being so hired, they be worked in chain gangs or otherwise, and so much of the acts of the legislature embodied in sections 4814, 4815, 4820, 4821 (e) of the code as authorizes such a hiring is repealed by the act of August 11, 1879. (Code, 4310.)

In 45 Georgia, 128:

Where A advances $20 to a laborer on the promise of the latter to work it out, and the laborer afterwards refuses to do so, he is not guilty of the offense of being a common cheat and swindler.

In part 3 of the code of Georgia, the same being the penal code, we find the following section (109):

Every person who forcibly abducts or steals away any person without lawful authority or warrant from this State or any county thereof, and sends or conveys such person beyond the limits of the State, or a county thereof, against his will is guilty of kidnaping.

The punishment (sec. 111) is not less than four years nor more than seven years' confinement in the penitentiary.

SEC. 106. False imprisonment is a violation of the personal liberty of a person and consists in confinement or detention of a person without sufficient legal authority.

And a penalty is provided therefor.

SEC. 123. If any person or persons, by threats, violence, or intimidation or other unlawful means shall prevent or attempt to prevent any person or persons in this State from engaging in, remaining in, or performing the business, labor or duties of any lawful employment or occupation, such offender or offenders shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 124. If any person or persons, singly or together, or in combination, shall conspire to prevent or attempt any person or persons by threats, violence, or intimidation from engaging in, remaining, or performing the business, labor, or duties of any lawful employment or occupation, such offender or offenders shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

SEC. 125. If any person or persons, singly or by conspiring together, shall hinder any person or persons who desire to labor, from so doing, or hinder any person, by threats, violence, or intimidation, from being employed as a laborer or employee, such offender shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

Sections 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, and 134 cover the law against employers blacklisting employees.

In the early part of this argument or discussion I quoted from the International Encyclopedia, but not with the intention or purpose of indorsing the reference therein to the convict-labor systems of the South. I apprehend that the "recent revelations" referred to by the writer were from the brain of some prejudiced or unduly biased person. Whether the convict systems of the South, however, are good or bad is not germane to the question that I have been attempting to discuss.

I have been endeavoring to present a purely legal question, and I made the quotation from the encyclopedia as an authority for whatever it might be worth, from one evidently none too friendly to the South, that even a convict system—a system necessarily founded on law and a part of government, and, according to him, a bad system—that even the worst features of this bad lawful system do not amount to "peonage."

How much less excuse is there, therefore, to call the act of an individual and the act of a mere private citizen "peonage?"

My attention has been called, since the preparation of this argument, to an opinion on "peonage," delivered by Judge W. T. Newman, of the United States district court for the northern district of Georgia, and I add same hereto, together with the "notes" of the reporter. I am glad to find in Judge Newman such excellent support of the views I have presented, or at least for some of them. The opinion of Judge Newman was rendered in the case of United States v. Eberhart et al., and is found in Federal Reporter, volume 127, No. 1, pamphlet form, issued March 10, 1904.

The following is the opinion:

The indictment charges the defendants with certain acts in restraint of the personal liberty of named persons of African descent, and characterizes these acts as peonage, and charges the defendants with holding the persons named as peons, and with returning them to a condition of peonage, in violation of the act of Congress of March 2, 1867 (chap. 187, 14 Stat. L., 546; Rev. Stat., sec. 5526; U. S. Comp. St., 1901, p. 3715). The act of Congress named, entitled "An act to abolish and forever prohibit the system of peonage in the Territory of New Mexico, and other parts of the United States," was aimed at a system.

Its purpose was to abolish and forever prohibit the system known as "peonage," as it existed in New Mexico and elsewhere. A full discussion of this system and how it came to exist in New Mexico will be found in the case of Jaremillo v. Romero (1 N. M. 190). It came with the territory ceded to the United States by the treaty with Mexico after the Mexican war. It was part of the system of the people inhabiting that territory. The clear purpose of the act was to deal with this system by abolishing it and prohibiting a return to it. An examination of the act will show that this is true beyond question. No such system as this ever existed in Georgia. African slavery existed, but this was the ownership of Africans and persons of African descent as chattels. There could not be, therefore, in Georgia, any such thing as holding persons under this system of peonage or returning them to it.

It would be the merest perversion of this act to attempt to apply it to an ordinary case of restraint of personal liberty, and the case is not strengthened by the charge that the person so restrained is of African descent. However wrongful and illegal some of the acts charged in the indictment may be, they can not be punished under the statute named. The purpose of this act, as stated, was to abolish this system of peonage and to render null and void all acts, laws, resolutions, orders, regulations, or usages in New Mexico or elsewhere which established or which sought to establish this system. The penal part of the act will not be enlarged beyond the scope and purpose of the act as above indicated. The penalty is for holding under, or for arresting or returning to, this condition of peonage. A person must have been held under this system or arrested and returned to it; that is, to a preexisting condition of peonage.

MEXICAN PEONAGE.

It may be added that even if the act of Congress on which this indictment is based could be held applicable in Georgia the acts set out in the indictment are nothing like the old system of peonage. That system seems to have been, even as it came from Mexico, a voluntary system of labor and of servitude. The individual, in the beginning at least, voluntarily assumed this service. He was afterwards, it is true, held to the service against his will until his contract was discharged, and he could be held under it or by the custom and usages of the country arrested and returned to it.

Certain it is that by the act of the Territorial legislature of New Mexico of 1852 (Laws 1851-52, p. 184), which was probably in force when the act of Congress was passed, the service must have been voluntarily entered into (Jaremillo v. Romero, supra.) So that both under the old system of peonage, as it came from New Mexico, and also as it was embodied in the statute law of New Mexico, the contract was entered into freely and voluntarily by the servant. The act of Congress on which this indictment is based is inapplicable in Georgia, and, even if applicable here, the facts set out in the indictment are not such as make a case under the act. To merely characterize acts in restraint of personal liberty as peonage is not sufficient to make them such—certainly not under this act of Congress.

REPORTER'S NOTES.

The foregoing opinion was filed in 1899, but has not before been published. Since this decision Judge Jones of the northern district of Alabama has taken what seems to be a different view of the matter, in some respects at least, as shown in his "Response to questions by grand jury." (In re Peonage cases, 123 Fed., 671.) It is understood that Judge Speer, of the southern district of Georgia, and Judge Swayne, of the northern district of Florida, have also held differently, but in cases which, so far as known, have not been reported. Circuit Judge Shelby had a peonage case before him on habeas corpus. (In re Lewis, 114 Fed., 963.) Judge Shelby states, however, in reference to the question involved here that it "need not now be decided." Cases on writ of error, from the northern district of Florida, are pending in the circuit court of appeals for the fifth circuit, but have not yet been heard.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Did the gentleman from Ohio make any remarks this morning?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did. This is the same document about which the gentleman from Mississippi and I have had conversation.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio and I had an agreement and I shall not object provided I have the same unanimous consent. I wish to insert an article in the RECORD and make a few comments in connection with it in reply to what the gentleman from Ohio is to put in.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this a request to print documents, or is it a general leave to extend remarks?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will state, Mr. Chairman, my proposition to the House. Some days ago the gentleman from Mississippi put into the RECORD properly a newspaper article from the Brooklyn Eagle, which was the product of a correspondent. I received an editorial from the same paper with a request that it might go into the RECORD. I consulted the gentleman from Mississippi, and he stated that he had an article from the New York World which he desired to put into the RECORD as an answer to that. That is our proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And to say a few words in answer to that article from the Eagle which the gentleman proposes to insert.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Mississippi, respectively, ask unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BURTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 14416, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and had directed him to report that the committee had come to no resolution thereon.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed to submit the report of the conferees on the army bill and a statement to be printed in the RECORD under the rule. I will state that it is only a partial agreement.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10670) making appropriations for the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 5, 6, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, 19, 20, 21, 24, 34, 35, 38, 42, 47, 54, and 57.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 8, 13, 17, 18, 26, 28, 30, 31, 32, 33, 36, 37, 39, 41, 44, 45, 46, 48, 53, 58, 59, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, and 74.

Amendment numbered 14: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 6, line 14, of the bill strike out the word "fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 15: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the matter inserted by said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following: "eighty-one thousand and six hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 7 of said amendment strike out the following: "the Adjutant-General's section and the Record and Pension section of," and in line 31 of said amendment, before the word "military," insert the word "the," and after the word "brigadier-general," in line 34 of said amendment, insert the following: ": Provided further, That when the office of Military Secretary with the rank of major-general shall hereafter become vacant, it shall not be filled with said rank, and thereafter the chief of the Military Secretary's Department shall have the rank of a brigadier-general with the title of the Military Secretary, and there shall be only one officer above the rank of colonel in the said department," and in line 42 of said amendment strike out the words "Adjutant-General" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Military Secretary: Provided further, That the chief of the Military Secretary's Department shall be a member of the Board of Commissioners of the United States Soldiers' Home;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 40: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the words "seventy-six thousand two hundred" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "forty-five thousand eight hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 43: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 43, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "audit," in line 14 of said amendment, insert the following: ", and the Secretary of War may hereafter authorize the assignment to duty in the office of the Paymaster-General of such paymasters' clerks, now authorized by law, as may be necessary for that purpose;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 52: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 52, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word inserted by said amendment insert a comma; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 55: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 55, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all the matter inserted by said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following: ": Provided, That of the appropriation for construction and repair of hospitals not more than forty thousand dollars shall be used for the enlargement or construction of a hospital at any one post;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 56: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 56, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the word "thirty-nine" and insert in lieu thereof the word "forty-five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 60: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 60, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 5 of said amendment strike out the words "direct that the same;" and in the same line, after the word "presented," insert the following: "by direction of the President and;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 73: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 73, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "accounts," in line 14 of said amendment, strike out all of the matter inserted by said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

Your conferees report a disagreement on the following amendments: Nos. 16, 22, 23, 25, 29, 49, 50, and 51.

PRINTING OPINIONS IN NORTHERN SECURITIES COMPANY VS. UNITED STATES.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House of Representatives 14,000 copies of the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, with concurring and dissenting opinions, in the case of the Northern Securities Company and others v. The United States, delivered March 14, 1904.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order for the purpose of asking the gentleman if he will not amend the resolution so as to include the opinion of Judge Thayer and his associates in the court below?

Mr. PERKINS. The resolution provides only for printing the opinions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the copies under this request go to the folding room, so that Members will get their share of them? If not, I will ask the gentleman to amend his resolution so that they may go to the folding room.

Mr. PERKINS. Under the resolution 14,000 copies are for use of the Members of the House, to be divided equally, which will give each Member about thirty-five copies.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And they will go to the folding room?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman to amend his resolution so as to include the opinion of Judge Thayer and his associates?

Mr. PERKINS. I can not do that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is not valuable.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is valuable, as the Supreme Court of the United States has affirmed it, and the opinion is able.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 29, 1904.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD EVERETT HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on the request of Mr. HOAR, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will stand approved.

THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the Judiciary Committee be allowed to hold sessions during the sessions of the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, schedules of papers, documents, etc., on the files of the Interior Department December 31, 1900, not needed in the transaction of public business and of no permanent value or historical interest which have not been disposed of, together with a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, showing the accumulation of such papers in his office since that time. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, and the Chair appoints the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] as the committee on the part of the Senate.

PRINTING FOR DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COMMITTEE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Some time in February there was an order passed authorizing the printing of certain documents for the use of the Committee on the District of Columbia. The order did not include certain plans, specifications, and maps which the committee is desirous shall also be printed. Is there objection to the printing of those specifications and maps? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4955) to provide for the appointment of an additional assistant appraiser at the port of Boston, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, reported an amendment providing that all limitations as to the amount of subsidiary silver coinage that are outstanding are hereby removed, intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

L. S. WATSON MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5188) for the relief of the L. S. Watson Manufacturing Company, of Leicester, Mass., to report it without amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may now be put on its passage. It is only three or four lines long.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to the L. S. Watson Manufacturing Company, of Leicester, Mass., $423.17, being the amount of the fines paid by them by reason of an undervaluation of certain heddles imported by them.

Mr. HOAR. I understand it is desired that a brief statement of the bill should go into the RECORD. I can state it in about two sentences if I may be allowed to do so. I know all about it.

The gentlemen named in this bill are near neighbors of mine. I have known the family for three generations. They are men of the very highest respectability. They made a small importation of heddles, a device used in manufacturing machinery which they manufacture, and after the heddles came over they received a letter from their correspondent in England that the price had fallen very much, and they did not know whether to make out the invoice at the higher price which the goods had hitherto borne or at the lower price.

These people went to the collector of the port and told him the facts, and said they would like to make their invoice at the higher price and then apply for a remission of the duty. The deputy collector at Worcester, where I live, said: "You can not do that; there is no law that permits you to do it. You put in a pro forma invoice at the lower price, and then if it turns out that you are not entitled to import the article at that price, you can afterwards pay the difference." So they did, and the matter went on, and they learned afterwards that they were mistaken in supposing that they were entitled to the benefit of the fall.

This matter never would have been heard of or thought of by the collector or anybody else, but the importers went voluntarily to the custom-house and paid the deputy the difference in duty. It was sent to the custom-house in Boston, of which Worcester is a branch, and the collector there said: "There is not any discretion whatever in the law. You will have to pay a fine. The only way to be will be for me to report the matter to the Secretary of the Treasury and ask him to remit it."

The Secretary of the Treasury, on examining the matter, said the law was imperative; that they had made too low a valuation, and that there was no power, except in an act of Congress, to prevent him from exacting a fine, but that he would write a letter stating that the matter was without their fault; that the fine ought not to be exacted; that there was no blame on their part whatever, and that he only exacted the fine because the letter of the law was imperative. The amount is only two or three hundred dollars.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 5299) granting an increase of pension to Ellen F. Fish; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

An amendment proposing to appropriate $200,000 for the construction of buildings necessary for an immigrant station at the port of San Francisco, Cal.;

An amendment providing for the establishment of a life-saving station at Nome, Alaska, and extending the thirteenth life-saving station district to include the coast of Alaska;

An amendment proposing to appropriate $5,500 for the construction of quarters for a light keeper at Cape Mendocino, California;

An amendment providing that the light vessels now being built in New York and New Jersey shall be delivered to the inspector of the twelfth light-house district at San Francisco, and providing for the payment of the unexpended balances for building the same; and

An amendment proposing to appropriate $12,000 for establishing a fog-signal station at Quarry Point, Angel Island, Bay of San Francisco, California.

Mr. BARD submitted an amendment proposing an appropriation for the purpose of acquiring title to certain land in California in order to preserve the groves of mammoth trees known as the Sequoia gigantea, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of Idaho, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $90,000 for constructing, equipping, and outfitting a light-ship to be placed at the outer bar of Brunswick, Ga., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment providing that the Light-House Board shall arrange the ocean, Gulf, lake, and river coasts of the United States into light-house districts, not exceeding eighteen in number, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $130,000 for the construction, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, of a light-house and buoy tender for use in the eleventh light-house district, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FORAKER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $180,000 for the purchase of a military post at or near Columbus, Ohio, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. QUARLES submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $75,000 for establishing, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, at or near the city of Milwaukee, Wis., a depot for the engineer of the ninth light-house district, including the purchase of a site therefor, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCOMAS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $30,000 for acquiring, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, a suitable site for a depot for the Revenue-Cutter Service, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $200,000 for continuation of building of the custom-house, Baltimore, Md., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SISSETON AND WAHPETON BANDS OF INDIANS.

On motion of Mr. GAMBLE, it was Ordered, That the decision of the Court of Claims No. 22324, the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Dakota or Sioux Indians v. The United States, be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, to accompany S. 5178.

ADULTERATED FOODS, DRUGS, ETC.

Mr. HEYBURN. I offer a resolution which I ask may be read and lie on the table, subject to call.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, directed to make a report to the Senate of all investigations of adulterated foods, drugs, and liquors made under the provisions of paragraph 2 of the act of March 1, 1899, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho asks that the resolution may lie on the table subject to his call. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

Mr. HEYBURN. I offer a resolution, which I ask may also lie on the table subject to call.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to send to the Senate a statement as to all examinations of medicines and drugs made under the provisions of sections 2933, 2934, 2935, 2936, 2937, 2938, and 2939 of the Revised Statutes of the United States at the port of New York during the last calendar year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho asks that this resolution may lie on the table subject to his call. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

PEEDEE RIVER (S. C.) IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. LATIMER submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause to be made forthwith a survey of that portion of Great Peedee River, in the State of South Carolina, lying between the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad bridge, in Marion County, and the city of Cheraw, with a view to improve the navigation of that part of said river by cutting across several bends or loops, thereby shortening the length and deepening the channel at those points, and that report be made as to the practicability of said work and its probable cost.

REGULATION OF BATHS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill H. R. 10063, "An act to regulate the issue of licenses for Turkish, Russian, or medicated baths in the District of Columbia," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

J. H. GALLINGER,
H. C. HANSBROUGH,
THOMAS S. MARTIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. W. BABCOCK,
S. W. SMITH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

MISBRANDING OF SALMON FISH.

Mr. FULTON. I ask unanimous consent to call up and have considered at this time the bill (S. 220) prohibiting the introduction into any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, from any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or from any foreign country, or shipment to any foreign country, any misbranded salmon fish prepared or intended for use as an article of food. The bill has been heretofore read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the bill had better be read again. I have certainly forgotten it, if it was ever read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has heretofore been amended. The bill, then, will be read as amended.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Alger,	Dolliver,	Kean,	Newlands,
Allee,	Dryden,	Kearns,	Overman,
Allison,	Dubois,	Kittredge,	Perkins,
Bacon,	Elkins,	Latimer,	Pettus,
Ball,	Fairbanks,	Lodge,	Platt, Conn.
Bard,	Foraker,	Long,	Proctor,
Beveridge,	Foster, La.	McComas,	Quarles,
Blackburn,	Foster, Wash.	McCumber,	Quay,
Burnham,	Frye,	McEnery,	Scott,
Burrows,	Fulton,	McLaurin,	Simmons,
Clay,	Gallinger,	Mallory,	Smoot,
Cockrell,	Gamble,	Martin,	Spooner,
Culberson,	Gibson,	Millard,	Stewart,
Cullom,	Hansbrough,	Mitchell,	Stone,
Daniel,	Heyburn,	Money,	Teller,
Dick,	Hoar,	Morgan,	Warren.
Dillingham,	Hopkins,	Nelson,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will read the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the introduction into any State or Territory or the District of Columbia or Alaska, from any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia or Alaska, or from any foreign country, or shipment to any foreign country, of any salmon fish prepared or intended for use as an article of food which is misbranded within the meaning of this act is hereby prohibited; and any person who shall knowingly ship or deliver for shipment from any State or Territory or the District of Columbia or Alaska, or to any State or Territory or the District of Columbia or Alaska, or to any foreign country, or who shall knowingly receive in any State or Territory or the District of Columbia or Alaska, or who, having knowingly received, shall deliver in original unbroken packages for pay or otherwise, or offer to deliver to any other person, any such misbranded salmon fish, or any person who shall knowingly sell or offer for sale in the District of Columbia or Alaska or the Territories of the United States any such misbranded salmon fish, or who shall knowingly export or offer to export the same to any foreign country, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and for such offense be fined not exceeding $200 for the first offense, and for each succeeding offense not exceeding $300, or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. That for the purposes of this act salmon fish shall be deemed to be misbranded if the package containing it, or its label, shall bear any statement regarding the species of the salmon fish therein contained, or the river or other body of water or locality where the fish therein contained was caught or the season when caught, which statement shall be false or misleading in any particular, or if the same is falsely branded as to the State or Territory or District or locality therein in which such fish was caught or canned, pickled, cased, boxed, barreled, or otherwise packed.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, is the bill before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole under unanimous consent. An objection can be made at any time.

Mr. TELLER. I do not desire to object to this bill. I desire simply to say a word or two whenever the Senate is in a condition where one can be heard. I know something of the bill, because I have a copy of it before me. Otherwise I should not know anything about it, nor could anyone else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will please be in order. The bill was read as amended. Quite a large number of amendments were made on a former day.

Mr. TELLER. I merely wish to say that I presume the amendments will be acceptable. I do not intend to enter into any discussion of the bill. It is in keeping with other legislation before the Senate now, which I suppose we will have up in a day or two. I only want to call the attention of the Senate to the bill as it came from the committee, which indicates to me that at least the committee which had the bill in charge reported it without any serious consideration whatever.

The bill as it came from the committee, and as it would have passed the Senate but for an objection, would have made it possible for every person buying a can of salmon anywhere in the United States to be proceeded against by the General Government for buying a misbranded can of salmon. It would have enabled any informer, any person so disposed, to have brought every purchaser of salmon and every seller of salmon in the United States before some officer of the United States for an infringement of this law.

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. TELLER. I will.

Mr. FULTON. Do I understand the Senator to say that the bill applies to purchasers of salmon at retail?

Mr. TELLER. The bill speaks for itself.

Mr. FULTON. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that it applies only to those who purchase salmon in bulk; and I also call the Senator's attention to the fact that the amendments have, I think, removed every objection to the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I am not speaking about the amendments, if the Senator will allow me to proceed.

Mr. FULTON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. TELLER. I could have objected to the bill and have put it over. I did not propose to do that.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator, then, is not objecting to the bill as amended?

Mr. TELLER. I am speaking of the bill as it came from the committee. I am speaking of the bill as it came very near passing the Senate. I am speaking of it as I am going to refer to other bills that have passed or will pass the Senate without any attention whatever on the part of the Senate.

This bill is called up this morning, and not 3 per cent of the Senate are paying any attention to the bill; and they would not if it should have passed. The bill has been amended because there was objection to it the other day. The committee can take no merit to themselves for the amendment. The amendment has made a great improvement in the bill. The bill made it possible to prosecute any person who should not knowingly sell a misbranded can of salmon, whether it was in bulk or whether it was not. In my judgment, Mr. President, the seller of a single can of salmon might have been brought in and prosecuted under the measure as it came from the committee. I do not affirm that the mover of the bill intended any such purpose, but the careless way in which these things are done is what I want to call attention to this morning.

Mr. President, for myself I do not believe in national legislation that interferes with business and commerce in the buying and selling of the products of the country unless it is a case where there is a considerable demand for it. Because there may be an abuse in some section of the country it does not justify us to fill our statute books with statutes that are practically statutes in restraint of trade and commerce.

Of course it will be an offense under this statute, when it becomes a law, for a man who catches salmon in some stream in Alaska to brand it as coming from the Columbia River. That is a fraud, of course, on the purchaser. It may be that the salmon is just as good when taken from that stream as when taken from the Columbia River, but the Columbia River salmon may have a reputation that the other does not have. No great harm is done in such a case. It is not a case of misbranding food that has been poisoned or improperly put up. It is not one of those cases where, in my judgment, the evil to be remedied is one that calls for national legislation.

The bill as amended will doubtless remove some of the objections that I and other Senators who looked at it had; and yet, notwithstanding that, in my opinion, it is a class of legislation which ought to be avoided.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon what is the specific evil, if there be one, sought to be remedied by this bill?

Mr. FULTON. The evil sought to be remedied is this: As the Senator is aware, all along the Pacific coast there are many streams frequented by salmon, and on each of those streams, or most of them, will be found packing houses engaged in the business of canning the salmon and packing it. Several of the streams are noted for the superior quality of the fish that frequent their waters, and those fish have a high reputation in the market, while other and smaller streams are frequented by a very inferior quality of fish; they are easily taken and taken at little expense. The takers and packers of the inferior fish have for many years—I do not say that all of them, but some of them—been engaged in the practice of packing the fish and labeling them as being the superior quality of fish.

For instance, Columbia River salmon are the best known and admittedly the finest salmon in the market. Those are the Columbia River royal chinook salmon. The next grade to that, and scarcely inferior, is what is known as the Puget Sound sock-eyed salmon. Both of these fish have a high standing in the market and command a better price than any other salmon fish. Yet there are put up every year thousands of inferior salmon which are labeled as being these superior fish.

Now, the false labeling is not confined to the packers, but the purchasers in the East buy the salmon by carloads unlabeled. They have the salmon shipped to them unlabeled. They then furnish their own labels, and they represent them as being the first-class fish, when, of course, they are inferior. A fraud is thereby perpetrated on the consumer and on many of the retail sellers of the salmon. I have in mind a case that came within my own personal knowledge a few months ago, where a grocery firm in one of the eastern cities contracted with a firm of packers of salmon in Alaska to pack them 2,500 cases of Alaska salmon and to label them "Puget Sound fancy sock-eyed salmon."

As the Senator from Colorado says, the evil to be remedied is not so great as one where poisonous articles are put in food or articles deleterious to health, but the evil is a very considerable one; and it seems to me there can be no legitimate objection to the bill, because it is simply in the interest of honest trade and honest representations and branding.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I agree very much with the Senator from Colorado that Congress is passing too many laws rather paternalistic in their character and tending somewhat to restrict trade in articles which are innocuous in themselves.

I have had some difficulties about this bill, which I looked over at the request of the Senator from Oregon. So far as the misbranding of Alaska salmon is concerned, that is a matter with which Congress may very properly deal in a criminal enactment, because there is no legislature in Alaska, and we legislate as completely for Alaska as we do for the District of Columbia. I think an act ought to be passed prohibiting, with adequate penalties, the misbranding of Alaskan salmon as Columbia River salmon, to prevent the fraud which was suggested by the Senator from Oregon.

Of course, so far as the State of Washington is concerned, and so far as the State of Oregon is concerned, those States are absolutely supreme in their legislative power as to police regulations, and those States do not need at all to invoke the exercise of Federal power to prevent the misbranding of salmon or other commodities within those States by citizens of those States. That is strictly the business of the State.

Now, the Senator suggests another difficulty. He wants to have this bill passed in order to prevent consignees in the East who have received salmon properly branded from perpetrating a fraud upon the local markets by misbranding there. That is not interstate commerce, as I understand it.

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. The large houses in the East—we will say in Chicago or New York—buy in large quantities, and then they distribute throughout the different States. A New York house may buy 10,000 cases of salmon. That house distributes those cases of salmon throughout the South, the East, and the North in different States. There is where the interstate-commerce principle would be involved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair takes this opportunity to remind Senators that on any bill which is taken up from the general Calendar between the close of the routine business and 2 o'clock discussion is to be limited under Rule VIII to five minutes, and only one speech by one Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I have exhausted, I infer from the gentle intimation of the Chair, my five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator had not.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, can the bill be objected to under the rule now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At any time.

Mr. TELLER. I object to the further consideration of the bill, if that rule is to be applied.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill retains its place on the Calendar.

Mr. FULTON. I appeal to the Senator from Colorado to allow the bill to be proceeded with.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to suggest to the Senator that if he wants his bill to be proceeded with, he must move to take it up, and then it will not be under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FULTON. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, notwithstanding the objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. That does not displace the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that the Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I had about concluded what I intended to say. The whole subject—I do not speak with respect to this bill only, but of the constant attempts to pass bills of this nature—leads me to think that we ought to very carefully scrutinize such bills. I am not certain at all that this bill does not need an amendment, which I have not had time to draw.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should like to call attention to one clause in this bill for the purpose of having it explained. I shall have to read more than I wish to call attention to. Beginning on line 2, page 2, I find this language:

> And any person who shall knowingly ship or deliver for shipment from any State or Territory or the District of Columbia or Alaska, or to any State or Territory or the District of Columbia or Alaska, or to any foreign country, or who shall knowingly receive in any State or Territory or the District of Columbia or Alaska, or who, having knowingly received, shall deliver in original unbroken packages for pay or otherwise, or offer to deliver to any other person, any such misbranded salmon fish—shall be punished, etc. That is, the persons in a State who have received salmon, which has been sent into the State, knowing it to be misbranded, will be punished under United States laws, and not under State laws.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. One moment, please. What I wish to call attention to is this: Whether we can enact laws to punish in the States persons for offering to sell or for selling misbranded fish which they know to be misbranded? I wish to call attention to that. I do not say whether we can or not.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. May I just answer the question propounded by the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I shall be very glad to have the Senator from North Dakota do so.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it has been decided in a large number of cases that the jurisdiction of Congress, under the clause of the Constitution which gives Congress control over interstate commerce, gives it authority not only over the moving of an article from one State to another but over the article itself during the time it is being transferred from one State to another, as long as it remains in the original unbroken packages, and may prohibit its sale in the original unbroken packages; that after the original package has been broken, then it becomes the property of the State and subject to the local jurisdiction of the State; but so long as it remains in unbroken packages Congress, by appropriate legislation, may control its disposition.

Mr. TELLER. I have a general objection to this kind of legislation. I do not care to go into it in detail, because it seems to be the policy nowadays to indulge in such leg slation.

Even if the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] is correct about the evils to be remedied, this bill is certainly a violation of the rights of the States. He suggests that it is the custom to send large quantities of salmon to New York and there they are misbranded. When a consignee has the salmon in his control, all power, so far as the United States Government is concerned, ceases, and it has nothing further to do with it, whether it is in an unbroken package or a broken package. If they send the salmon into Connecticut, then they may bring themselves within the interstate-commerce act or the power of the General Government in that particular. But suppose they sell the salmon in New York City—it would not be an unusual thing for a large dealer to sell a carload there—and whether it is sold to wholesalers or to individual purchasers it would be the same thing; there can be no offense against the United States law by such an act as that.

Mr. President, this bill is not properly drawn; it is not carefully drawn; it is not drawn with that care that we should take in dealing with such important questions.

This is not a mere technical question; it is not a very small question when Congress assumes the power to interfere with the commerce of a State, when Congress says to the people of a State you can not sell under this condition, that, or the other. We have no control over that, unless we can bring the matter under the provisions of the Constitution with reference to commerce between the States. This bill goes beyond that. Of course, it may be true that the courts would say if anybody was indicted under this bill, if it should become a law, that it was invalid in that particular.

But, Mr. President, the Congress of the United States ought to be careful as to the character of its legislation touching the rights of the States and the rights of people within the States. This is a sample, and a fair sample, of the modern system of legislation. We have had some other legislation of the same character at this session.

I have no doubt, Mr. President, that this bill will pass, though it is aimed at an evil of which nobody ever heard, except perhaps it might be the Senators from Oregon and possibly the Senators from some other States in that vicinity. It may be very questionable whether there is any evil in it or not.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does the Senator from Colorado deny that an unbroken package, which comes within the purview of the commercial clause of the Constitution, on its way through several States, does not still remain under the purview of that provision after it reaches its destination so long as it remains an unbroken package?

Mr. TELLER. I do not deny that.

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well.

Mr. TELLER. I do not deny that courts have decided as to that——

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. TELLER. I was going to say that it was not where the party buys it with the intention of shipping it, but where the party buys it for his use, for the purpose of breaking the package or selling it in the package if he sees fit. The interstate commerce ceases when it gets into his personal possession. I understand that.

Mr. SPOONER. I understand the courts to hold that where a package has been in interstate commerce and has been delivered to the consignee in a State Congress has no legislative control over it so as to punish within the State for any misuse of it. My recollection is that the decision went to that extent.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was as to liquor. We have a statute on the statute books to-day, and an attempt is now being made to amend it, perhaps a proper one, which relates to liquors. The Supreme Court of the United States held that as to one of those interdicted packages after it arrives within the State boundary it can be by the State destroyed, but this only by virtue of an act of Congress permitting it, or for the moment conceding this power to the State.

Mr. TELLER. Under the State law?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is after the liquor has been received by the consignee. But without this provision of Congress given the State the package unbroken would remain an interstate package. In other words, an interstate package remains subject to the commercial clause of the Constitution after it reaches its destination State, so long as the original package is unbroken.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator refers, I suppose, to the original-package decision?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. But the court held in that case that after the article reached the consignee in the State, until the original package was broken it was subject to the interstate-commerce law, and after the passage of the Wilson bill it was under the State law. But I never heard of any decision of the Supreme Court of the United States that it was within the power of Congress, after an article had been carried from State to State and had been delivered in the original package to the consignee, to impose penalties for its use or misuse by the consignee in the State.

Mr. TELLER. That is, while it remains in his possession; until he puts it in transit again.

Mr. FULTON. I ask if the original-package decision was not to this effect: First, that so long as the article remains in the original package it is still the subject of interstate commerce and not subject to State control and regulations. That was the law until Congress passed the act consenting that when the original package has reached the State it might become subject to its police regulations. That is my recollection.

Mr. SPOONER. The courts long ago held that an original package, after it had been received by the consignee, became subject to the taxing power of the State. That decision has never been departed from at all; but it is true that under that decision the State has the right to impose taxes under the legislation of Congress.

Mr. FULTON. They held that the article was not subject to seizure until delivered to the consignee.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; then Congress passed the Wilson Act, under which the decision of the Supreme Court was made—I have always doubted the correctness of it—that after the article was delivered to the consignee in the original package it was subject to State law, if he offered it for sale in the State, but never beyond that.

Mr. TELLER. And subject to the police powers of the State.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not think there is any authority anywhere that would say that when a man buys salmon and delivers it into his warehouse it is any longer subject to the interstate-commerce laws or under the control of Congress. It can be founded on no principle whatever. If such goods are in the warehouse but temporarily and the consignee starts them again, thus placing them in interstate commerce, the interstate law comes in and takes effect.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is, if he starts the goods to go out of the State.

Mr. TELLER. If he starts them out of the State; say from New York to Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But he can send them anywhere in the same State.

Mr. TELLER. He can send them the length and breadth of the State of New York without any interference from anybody except the State.

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will allow me, I do not think there is anyone who is making any different contention. I do not think it is contended, and I do not think the language of this bill would justify the contention, that the consignee would incur any of the penalties of this law by falsely labeling after receiving the salmon and selling it within the State where he received it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But he incurs a penalty by selling it within the State where he receives it without any false label.

Mr. FULTON. Not by this bill.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let us see. The bill reads—or who shall knowingly receive—

That is, from outside of the State or Territory—shall deliver in original unbroken packages for pay or otherwise, or offer to deliver to any person any such misbranded salmon fish—

Shall be punished.

Mr. FULTON. That is, if the Senator will allow me, salmon that was shipped to him misbranded, which was an article of interstate commerce when he received it and was misbranded.

But I was speaking a moment ago to the illustration offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], when he was suggesting that a man might receive salmon properly branded or nonlabeled, falsely label it, and then sell it within his own State. I say this bill does not reach such a case as that. This bill does cover the case, however, of a person receiving from another State falsely branded or labeled articles, then offering to sell them or receiving them for sale or offering to sell them.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator a question somewhat in the line of what the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] was saying. I ask whether, under the language in lines 9 and 10, when this thing passes through ten hands in a State, could not each one of those ten persons, under this bill as it is now, be punishable under it, if he has knowingly received misbranded fish, or even if any one of those people has put a false brand on those received from another State? The bill says where a man may have received salmon fish from another State, anywhere——

Mr. FULTON. That relates back to another State.

Mr. HOAR. I know that is what it means to do, but I want to see whether it does. I am afraid the Senator is wrong.

Mr. FULTON. I think not. This is the language of the bill:

And any person who shall knowingly ship or deliver for shipment from any State or Territory or the District of Columbia or Alaska, or to any State or Territory or the District of Columbia or Alaska, or to any foreign country, or who shall knowingly receive in any State or Territory or the District of Columbia or Alaska, or who, having knowingly received, shall deliver in original unbroken packages for pay or otherwise, or offer to deliver to any other person, any such misbranded salmon fish, or any person who shall knowingly sell or offer for sale in the District of Columbia or Alaska or the Territories of the United States any such misbranded salmon fish, etc.

The language is "any such"——

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me my honorable friend is awfully overworking that word "such."

Mr. FULTON. I think that word "such" is performing a good and proper function, and a very plain one, because it relates back strictly to the salmon which has been prohibited, and the prohibited salmon is the salmon that has been misbranded. If the shipment is into another country, it says, "any such salmon"—that is, any such misbranded salmon.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that. In other words, any person who introduces into a State a misbranded article, or any person who knowingly ships from a State a misbranded article, or any person who sells within a State to another man such misbranded article—the word "such" would not grammatically imply that it was a misbranded article that had already been once subject of an offense.

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator allow me right there?

Mr. HOAR. In a moment. The fact of misbranding an article implies that it is a fraudulent article. It seems to me, with all deference to the Senator, that it is hardly worth while to resist the introduction of a single word where the introduction of such a word might prevent difficulty and doubt about the matter.

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will offer such language as will accomplish that, I shall be very glad to accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] inform the Chair whether or not he has the floor?

Mr. TELLER. I supposed I had it.

Mr. HOAR. May I have the opportunity of moving an amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. HOAR. I move to insert after the word "fish," in line 10, the words "so unlawfully imported into any State or Territory." That will cure the whole difficulty.

Mr. FULTON. I will accept that amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, if a man knowingly receives misbranded salmon under this proposed act, he incurs a penalty. He pays that penalty. The property is his absolutely. Now, what right does Congress have to say, "It is true this article was unlawfully transported, but the man has paid the penalty for that; and if he sells this property to anybody in his neighborhood, he shall pay another penalty?"

I submit, Mr. President, to the lawyers of this Senate that this bill is not one that ought to be passed.

Mr. FULTON. I do not understand the Senator's point. Will the Senator please be a little more clear?

Mr. TELLER. I do not know that I can make it any clearer than I have done.

Mr. FULTON. It is doubtless due to my own dullness; but if the Senator will restate it, perhaps I may be able to understand it.

Mr. TELLER. The trouble grows out of the fact that there is not a disposition here to maintain the distinction between the right of this Government to make offenses in the States and offenses in the Territories. We are unlimited in our power over Alaska, but we are limited absolutely in our power over the States. The only power that we can assert in a matter of this kind is where an article is the subject of interstate commerce. When it ceases to be the subject of interstate commerce it is no longer under the jurisdiction or control of the United States, and the man who has illegally transported it to his warehouse and paid the penalty for such illegal act can not, because it was illegally transported there, in addition to that be compelled to pay a penalty for selling it. That is what you have provided for in this bill.

Mr. President, no bill of this character should pass until it has had the careful consideration of this Senate and the careful consideration of a committee. We are filling our statute book with laws that can not be defended; and when another proposed measure comes here, we are cited to another statute that we have passed on some other occasion by unanimous consent and practically without any consideration of this body; and I assume, Mr. President, it receives, if anything, less consideration in another place.

The enactment of this bill may not lead to a great deal of commercial disturbance; it may be one of those things that will be a violation of law on our part and yet no great disaster follow; but step by step we are destroying the relations between the States and the General Government in reference to commerce, as we ar in reference to almost everything else.

Mr. SPOONER. Just a word, Mr. President. I agree with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] in his contention and with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] as to what I think the unconstitutionality of one provision of this bill, although I would not say that all the provisions of the bill are obnoxious to constitutional requirements. I do not understand that the Supreme Court of the United States ever has held, and I do not believe that the Supreme Court of the United States ever can hold, that it is in the power of Congress, after an article has been transported into a State and delivered to the consignee, so as to become commingled, as the court in many cases has said, with the general mass of property in the State and subject to taxation by the State, to punish a man for anything he does with reference to it in the State, unless, perhaps, it be when putting the article immediately again into interstate commerce.

About that there might be question; but it seems to me very clear, assuming this bill to be entirely constitutional so far as it relates to interstate commerce proper, that after these misbranded salmon have arrived at their destination, have been delivered to the consignee, and have become his absolute property, so that he can be taxed on them, so that they are subject to levy for the payment of his debts, it is beyond the power of Congress to prohibit him by a penal law, enforcible in the Federal courts, from selling them or giving them away in the State.

Mr. FULTON. Does the Senator mean that the power of Congress ceases to regulate or control an article of merchandise that has passed from one State into another after it has been delivered to the consignee?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; after it has been delivered to the consignee.

Mr. FULTON. Then it seems to me, according to the Senator's contention, the only time Congress has any control over it is when it is in transit.

Mr. SPOONER. Congress has control of it until it has ceased to be an article of interstate commerce.

Mr. FULTON. That would practically leave Congress without power to enforce any law that it may pass, if it can not deal with an article from the point of starting. For instance, Congress may say that a certain article may not enter into interstate commerce——

Mr. SPOONER. Congress may punish——

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will allow me, there certainly are some articles which Congress has the power to prohibit from entering into interstate commerce, or at least from entering into interstate commerce in certain conditions. If Congress can not provide for the seizure of that article on its delivery, then any article that can run the gantlet and get from one State to another over the transportation lines is perfectly safe.

Mr. SPOONER. No, Mr. President; Congress has a right to regulate interstate commerce. Congress has a right to punish the violation of a law which Congress may lawfully enact as to interstate commerce, no matter where or in what State the person may be found who has violated the Federal law. That is unquestioned.

Mr. FULTON. I will ask the Senator, then, if that be true and the article is sent in violation of that act of Congress, why may not Congress seize the article or deal with the party who knowingly violated the law?

Mr. SPOONER. Congress may deal with an article so long as it is interstate commerce.

Mr. FULTON. Or deal with the party who knowingly receives and sells such an article.

Mr. SPOONER. Or deal with the party who has violated the act of interstate commerce. But how long is the article to be considered a part of interstate commerce?

Mr. FULTON. Well, certainly as long as we can go to the other end and say when does it begin. The Supreme Court has just held that interstate commerce begins in one instance when you invest money in the stock of a corporation that is engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the Supreme Court has decided over and over again where interstate commerce, dealing with the article of commerce itself, began. They decided it in the New Hampshire case. They decided where it begins, and they decided where it ends. Let me ask the Senator this question: Congress makes certain regulations relative to the transportation of nitroglycerin. That is a very dangerous article—dangerous to commerce while it is being transported—dangerous to life. It is a part of commerce while being transported from State to State. Does the Senator contend that Congress would have the power to provide the manner in which nitroglycerin should be stored in the State after it has been delivered to the consignee?

Mr. FULTON. No, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. And had ceased to be a part of interstate commerce?

Mr. FULTON. No, sir; because that is entirely aside from the question——

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator claim that if the pure-food bill passes, as I presume it will——

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator allow me to say why the instance he suggests could not be credited to interstate commerce? In the case of nitroglycerin, the Senator asked, can Congress provide how it shall be stored after it arrives in the State to which it is destined?

Mr. SPOONER. Why not?

Mr. FULTON. I say no. Why——

Mr. SPOONER. Why not, so long as it is in the original package?

Mr. FULTON. It has gone through pursuant to the rule of interstate commerce; and if it goes there in compliance and in conformity to those rules, Congress has nothing further to do with it; but if it shall go there contrary to the rules of interstate commerce, Congress may prohibit the keeping of it there.

Mr. SPOONER. Take misbranded butter. Butter lasts longer than fish; sometimes too long. If this is proper legislation to apply to salmon, it is proper legislation to apply to all food and other products transported from State to State or from a Territory to a State.

Mr. MCCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. On what ground did the Supreme Court hold in the Bowman case that the State of Iowa had no authority by its legislative act to prohibit the sale of liquors in original, unbroken packages? Was it not upon the ground that Congress had legislated upon the matter, and that the article itself was a subject of interstate commerce so long as it was in its original, unbroken package? Was it upon any other ground than that? And if that be true, does it not establish the fact that Congress has control over it as long as it is in the original, unbroken package and not resold in the State?

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator states the opinion with fair accuracy, not, I think, with entire accuracy, although I have not read it for a long time, but I have always supposed that that decision had some relation to the subjects which ordinarily come within the police power of a State, the manufacture and sale of liquor being one of them.

Mr. HOAR. That applies only to the original consignee, as I recollect it.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly, it applies only to the original consignee. It did not attempt to prevent, as I recollect it, a disposition by the original consignee of the original package.

Mr. FULTON. That is all this does.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think that is——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator do me a great favor by permitting me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SPOONER. I am very happy to do so.

Mr. HOAR. Possibly it may clear up the situation, at least in my own mind. Do the Senators from Oregon and North Dakota contend that a box of Cuban cigars, imported into this country five years ago, sold by the original consignee, given by the purchaser to a friend, put in his drawer for six months, and then given to somebody else, and then sold perhaps a half dozen times over, is still within the jurisdiction of the United States?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say for one that I do not maintain that contention. I do contend——

Mr. HOAR. Then, if that be true, the doctrine which the two Senators have maintained is only that the State can deliver to the original consignee, and that the original consignee has a right to receive it as a part of interstate commerce, and that that right would be fruitless and the interstate commerce destroyed unless he were permitted to sell it in the original package or to keep it. When he breaks the original package himself, or when he parts with the ownership or control of it, then interstate commerce is over and State commerce begins, and that is precisely the rule.

There is an old New Hampshire case—and although I do not remember its name, the Senator from Wisconsin, who remembers the decisions so accurately, will—where the question came in this wise. Judge Bradley delivered the decision. A farmer was driving some cattle which he had bought in Canada, and was delaying so that they would not get to his farm until after the 1st of May in order to escape taxation. I do not remember how the case was decided. It was not a package in that case, but a drove of cattle. It was held that until that drove of cattle had got to the town which was the end of their journey and had become scattered they could not be taxed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator that one must draw his conclusions not from a single decision, but from the tendency of all of the cases decided by the Supreme Court on this subject. The Supreme Court did hold in the Bowman case that as long as the property was in the hands of the original consignee in unbroken packages it was not subject to the police power or the law of the State of Iowa. They so held upon the only ground I can possibly conceive they could hold it, that so long as it was in unbroken packages and in the hands of the original consignee—that is, before it had been disposed of and had gone into the mass of the property of the State—it was a subject of interstate commerce, and therefore the laws of Congress would control it.

Now, to meet that very point Congress passed another law making liquors, for instance, subject to the jurisdiction of the State law as soon as they passed into the State, and under that law another case came up. It was the Rahrer case, with which I am certain the Senator from Wisconsin is familiar. In that case the Supreme Court, following its original reasoning, held that while an article was in an original unbroken package and in the hands of the original consignee the power of Congress to deal with it could not be denied; that notwithstanding the fact that this was a power of Congress, Congress could declare, and it had declared, by that enactment that the moment the article reached the State it should become subject to the laws of the State.

It seems to me impossible to draw any other conclusion from these two decisions than that, considering them both together, the Supreme Court has held that so long as the article which has been transported from one State to another is in the hands of the original consignee and is in an unbroken package and has not become scattered and become a part of the property of the State, Congress still has control over it. That is as far, I think, as the Supreme Court has gone; but I think it has clearly established that, because in the Rahrer case the decision states clearly that the question on which that case is decided is when an article is an article of interstate commerce and when it ceases to be interstate commerce, and they held it ceased to be interstate commerce when it had been scattered and had gone out of the hands of the original consignee or when the original package was broken, and until that time Congress had control of it. That is my understanding of the rule of those two cases.

[At this point Mr. FULTON yielded to several Senators for the transaction of morning business.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The Chair will state to the Senator from Oregon that there is an amendment pending to the bill under consideration, which was offered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts. No action has been taken upon it.

Mr. HOAR. That was agreed to.

Mr. FULTON. To which bill does the Chair refer?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill now under consideration.

Mr. FULTON. That was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. It was accepted.

Mr. FULTON. It was accepted and agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was informed by the clerks at the desk that no record had been made of the agreement to the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Let the Chair now state that the amendment is agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts is agreed to. The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am informed that there is upon the President's desk a communication from the Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, which will be read for the information of the Senate. It is in response to Senate resolution 151.

The Secretary proceeded to read the communication.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I ask how long is the communication?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that it will take about ten minutes to read it.

Mr. FULTON. Then, if I understand my rights, I have the floor, and that can not be interjected. I may be mistaken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can, of course, insist upon his rights, but it has always been a courtesy that has heretofore been observed in the Senate to lay before the Senate a communication called for by a Senate resolution and responded to by the head of a Department. It has always been regarded as being in order. However, the Chair will be pleased to entertain suggestions on the subject.

Mr. FULTON. If I may have ten minutes' additional time, I have no objection. But the time is very limited in which this bill can be considered.

Mr. ALDRICH. Of course, if the Senator wants to proceed, and have the communication read after he has finished his argument, there is no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator objects, the communication will temporarily lie on the table.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I am not going to take up much time. I merely wish to submit a few observations. I am very anxious, if possible, to have this bill submitted to a vote before the hour of 2 o'clock. I simply wish to say that I have not contended, nor do I think the bill would bear the construction, that any article mentioned therein will be subject to its penalty after it has left the hands of the consignee; but to contend that Congress, under the power to regulate interstate commerce, may not deal with articles of merchandise after they have been delivered to the consignee in the State in which they have been shipped, and while yet in the unbroken package, is simply to strip Congress of all power and authority to exercise the grant or delegation to it to regulate interstate commerce.

The very fact that the Supreme Court has held that Congress can protect the consignee to the extent of allowing him to receive the article before the State laws can take hold of it shows that the authority of Congress extends to the time of the receipt of the article of interstate commerce by the consignee. And if it extends that far, then it follows, it seems to me, logically that Congress may regulate still the manner in which the article shall be disposed of within certain limitations by the consignee. That is, if Congress has the power to say that the consignee has the right to receive these goods and not be interfered with in the reception of them by the operation of any State law, then it follows that the jurisdiction of Congress extends over the goods up to the time they are delivered to the consignee. If that be true, then it follows that Congress has the power to punish the consignee if he shall receive them in violation of the regulations of interstate commerce.

Can it be said that Congress has the power to protect the consignee in his right to receive the goods shipped under interstate commerce, and yet that Congress has not the power to punish the consignee for receiving them in violation of the rules of interstate commerce?

Mr. SPOONER. I have not so contended.

Mr. FULTON. No; I do not understand that the Senator has contended for that, but it seems to me that that is the logical deduction from some of the contentions which have been made.

I wish to call the attention of Senators to what was said by the Supreme Court in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden:

> That the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations is the power "to prescribe the rule by which the commerce is to be governed;" that such power "is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution;" that "if, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress though limited to specified objects is plenary as to those objects, the power of commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States."

Then again:

> In Cohens v. Virginia (6 Wheat., 264, 413), this court said that the United States were for many important purposes "a single nation," and that "in all commercial regulations we are one and the same people;" and it has since frequently declared that commerce among the several States was a unit and subject to national control.

Now, Congress has the same power over interstate commerce that the States have over domestic commerce. To the same extent that a State may regulate domestic commerce or the commerce within its own territory the General Government may regulate interstate commerce.

I said a moment ago, and I wish to correct that, too, because I went too far, that the Supreme Court had lately held that interstate commerce commenced in one instance when parties subscribed to stock in a corporation. Of course, that was an exaggeration of what the court held. The court held in that case that, where they were proceeding against the parties for a conspiracy, subscribing for the stock in the Northern Securities Company and taking that stock was an overt act which is one step in furtherance of the conspiracy which had been entered into to restrain interstate commerce.

The court dealt with those parties and restrained them from holding that stock under the provision of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to regulate interstate commerce.

Now, it seems to me clear that if Congress may say to individuals, "You shall not subscribe to shares of stock in a corporation, or at least you shall not vote the shares of stock in a corporation which you entered into and formed for the purpose of restricting or restraining interstate commerce, because under our power to control interstate commerce we must of necessity have the power to restrain you from taking any initiatory steps that will tend to restrain it," it follows conclusively and logically that the Congress may go to the other end of the route and say: "If you shall receive any goods that are shipped as articles of interstate commerce in violation of the laws of Congress, you shall be subjected to a penalty."

That is all this bill does, and nothing more. I submit that there can be no good reason—I say it in all deference to the Senators who seem to be opposed to it—offered why this legislation should not be had. It is simply in the interest of honest trade, honest commerce. Why there should be any objections to it I can not understand. There is no penalty imposed here for any person unless he shall knowingly violate the provisions of the proposed act. If he knowingly violates them he ought to be punished. If he knowingly puts forth goods branded falsely or labeled falsely he ought to be punished, and under no other circumstances can he be punished if this bill shall become a law.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I do not care to take any time in the discussion of this matter, but——

Mr. ALDRICH. There is an executive communication which ought to be read, if it would not delay the Senator too much.

Mr. SPOONER. I think it ought to be read, Mr. President.

PENSION ORDER OF THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of the Interior; which was read:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 28, 1904.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
United States Senate.

SIR: Replying to Senate resolution No. 151, I have the honor to state that an order has recently been issued regulating the administration of the act of June 27, 1890. It is not considered, however, that this Department has the authority to enlarge the provisions of that act or in any way to affect its just interpretation or that the order referred to does either. A copy of the order is contained in the report of the Acting Commissioner of Pensions, transmitted herewith.

As some misunderstanding with reference to the interpretation and purpose of this order has existed, a brief review of pension legislation and the administration thereof in this Department is submitted for the purpose of showing that the order referred to is clearly within executive authority and in conformity with existing law and the methods which have heretofore prevailed in its administration.

Before the act of June 27, 1890, no pensions were granted except upon proof that the death or disability for which the pension was sought resulted from actual service. This act, however, provided that any person who had served ninety days or more and who had been honorably discharged should receive a pension of not less than six nor more than twelve dollars per month, if proof were furnished that he was suffering from a permanent disability, not the result of vicious habits, which incapacitated him "from the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render him unable to earn a support."

Disability, partial or complete, to perform manual labor is the sole measure of the right to a pension under this act. The element of manual labor is fundamental. If, in the adjudication of a pension claim, it shall be determined that the applicant's pensionable disabilities render him wholly incapacitated for manual labor, his pension rating will be accordingly, even though the applicant may be then occupied, with distinguished usefulness, in some field of intellectual endeavor.

It is well understood that there is a natural decay of the physical powers, due solely to age, which impairs man's capacity to "earn a support" by his own manual labor.

Not only does the act itself provide that "each and every infirmity shall be duly considered," but the decisions under it uniformly recognize the principle that disabilities due to senility alone are pensionable.

By an order (No. 241) issued by the Pension Bureau in September, 1893, a copy of which is transmitted herewith, it was determined that "in a case in which the pensioner has reached the age of 75 years his rate shall not be disturbed if he is receiving the maximum ($12), and if he is not a pensioner he shall receive the maximum for senility alone, if there are no special disabilities shown."

In the case of applicant Patrick Carroll the Department in February, 1893, decided that "old age or senility is a legal disability under the act of June 27, 1890, and the surgeons should have given their estimate of the amount of disability arising therefrom for the performance of manual labor and the earning of a support thereby."

In July, 1895, in the case of applicant Jacob Rinkle, the Department affirmed the above named order No. 241.

Later, in July, 1897, in the case of Francis Frank, it was held by the Department that "a claimant for pension under the act of June 27, 1890, who has attained the age of 65 years shall be entitled to at least the minimum rate of pension provided by that act."

Although age, in connection with other disabilities, has always been considered in determining pension ratings under the act, there has never been any uniform rule for rating the infirmities due to the element of age with the exception of the two classes named. Such ratings therefore seem to have been governed by the varying opinions of the many who have been occupied with that duty, thereby imparting to that feature of pension administration something of uncertainty and inequality.

To this fact, together with the growing importance of age conditions, is due in considerable measure the necessity for action on the line of this order specifically defining, as far as practicable, ratings from the best attainable data for infirmities due to senility.

In the administration of the pension laws and the consideration of the immense number of cases that are pending under every act it is impossible to secure uniformity and expedition in decisions without laying down convenient rules for the weighing of evidence and prima facie presumption which long experience justifies. This has been the uniform course of the Pension Bureau since its establishment.

The order in question merely lays down as a convenient rule of decision and a rebuttable presumption of fact that one who is otherwise entitled and is 62 years of age is partially disabled from earning a livelihood by his hands, that one who is 65 is more disabled for manual work, that one who is 68 is in a still greater degree incapable of earning a support by manual labor, and that one of 70 is completely disabled in this regard. Certainly such a presumption is justified by general experience in actual life.

When it is understood that in the adjudications under this act age has always been considered a factor in connection with other disabilities, and when it is further considered that for more than ten years there has been an established rating (the maximum allowed by law) based solely on the age of 75 years, and that for nearly seven years there has been an established rating (the minimum provided by law) based alone on the age of 65 years, it will be apparent how largely problematical must be any estimate of increase of expenditures under the order of March 15, 1904.

The Acting Commissioner of Pensions has given attentive consideration to the second paragraph of the resolution, and by reference to his report it will be seen that he estimates that the order of March 15, 1904, will result in an increased expenditure annually of $5,400,000.

Attention is particularly invited to this branch of the Commissioner's report, which, while it shows the processes by which this result is reached and that it is the best approximation to accuracy practicable, reveals the fact that the calculation is to some extent necessarily speculative.

Respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., September 2, 1903.

Order No. 241.

The circular of June 12, 1893, in respect to rating case under the act of June 27, 1890, is withdrawn.

Hereafter in affixing rates under this act the medical referee or the medical officer in the board of revision shall weigh each disability and determine the degree that each disability or the combined disabilities disables the claimant from earning a support by manual labor, and a rate corresponding to this degree shall be allowed.

In cases in which the pensioner has reached the age of 75 his rate shall not be disturbed if he is receiving the maximum, and if he is not a pensioner he shall receive the maximum for senility alone, if there are no special pensionable disabilities shown.

WM. LOCHREN, Commissioner.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, March 21, 1904.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SIR: In compliance with the accompanying resolution of the United States Senate I have the honor to inclose a copy of the order dated March 15, 1904, which is probably the one referred to by that honorable body.

This order does not, in the opinion of this Bureau, enlarge "the pension act of June 27, 1890, and amendments as to disabilities of applicants for pension," but simply construes said act in its application to the granting of pensions thereunder.

Inability to earn a support by manual labor, from any cause, is the guide to rating. "Pensions not exceeding $12 per month and not less than $6 per month, proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support," is the wording of the law.

Special diseases and disabilities are not the only factors that produce inability to perform manual labor. The bodily infirmities natural to advancing age must be recognized in considering claims under the law. Manual labor alone enters into consideration, and to determine the degree of inability to earn a support thereby is a difficult problem to solve in such a way as to distribute pensions equitably to deserving applicants unless some rule for the guidance of the Bureau is adopted.

While it is an established fact that men of great age retain their intellectual capacity and mental activity in the highest degree, it is also an established fact that the man who earns his support by hard manual labor finds, at the age of 62, his ability diminishing and employment difficult to obtain.

The amount the order will "increase pensions annually, and particularly when the same shall become fully operative," can be only roughly estimated.

There are supposed to be living to-day about 875,000 ex-Union soldiers of the civil war. Of these are pensioned under the act of July 14, 1862, known as the "general law," about 265,000, and under the act of June 27, 1890, about 428,000, aggregating 693,000, which, deducted from the whole number of survivors, leaves 182,000 who have not applied for pension. To state definitely how many of this number failed to serve the required ninety days and receive final honorable discharge would be impossible. One-fourth seems a fair estimate and reduces the number to 136,500. To say that 75,000 of these have reached the age of 62 and will apply seems a reasonable estimate. If these 75,000 are all placed on the rolls at $6 a month, or $72 a year, the output for pensions will be increased $5,400,000 annually.

The pension roll is diminishing rapidly, owing to deaths of beneficiaries; and in all probability this decrease will offset any gains caused by claims of soldiers who have reached the age of 65 and upward.

I have the honor to remain, your obedient servant,

J. L. DAVENPORT, Acting Commissioner.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
March 15, 1904.

Order No. ——.

Whereas the act of June 27, 1890, as amended, provides that a claimant shall "be entitled to receive a pension not exceeding $12 per month and not less than $6 per month proportioned to the degree of inability to earn a support, and in determining such inability each and every infirmity shall be duly considered and the aggregate of the disabilities shown to be rated;" and

Whereas old age is an infirmity the average nature and extent of which the experience of the Pension Bureau has established with reasonable certainty; and

Whereas by act of Congress in 1887, when thirty-nine years had elapsed after the Mexican war, all soldiers of said war who were over 62 years of age were placed on the pension roll; and

Whereas thirty-nine years will have elapsed on April 13, 1904, since the civil war, and there are many survivors over 62 years of age: Now, therefore,

Ordered, (1) In the adjudication of pension claims under said act of June 27, 1890, as amended, it shall be taken and considered as an evidential fact, if the contrary does not appear, and if all other legal requirements are properly met, that when a claimant has passed the age of 62 years he is disabled one-half in ability to perform manual labor and is entitled to be rated at $6 per month; after 65 years at $8 per month; after 68 years at $10 per month, and after 70 years at $12 per month.

(2) Allowances at higher rate, not exceeding $12 per month, will continue to be made as heretofore, where disabilities other than age show a condition of inability to perform manual labor.

(3) This order shall take effect April 13, 1904, and shall not be deemed retroactive. The former rules of the office fixing the minimum and maximum at 65 and 75 years, respectively, are hereby modified as above.

E. F. WARE,
Commissioner of Pensions.

Approved.

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

[Senate resolution No. 151, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session.]

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate:

First. Whether an order has recently been issued enlarging the pension act of June 27, 1890, and amendments, as to disabilities of applicants for pensions; and if so, to send to the Senate a copy of said order.

Second. By what amount, if any, will said order probably increase pensions annually, particularly when the same shall become fully operative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair had it placed on the table for the reason that the question is as yet unsettled as to which committee will act upon this matter. The resolution of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] proposes that the Judiciary Committee shall act upon it, and there is a motion pending that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CARMACK. The resolution is still on the table, and I ask that the communication be separately printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed, and if there is no objection it will lie on the table, which will give Senators everything they wish without referring it to either committee.

Mr. GORMAN. That is right.

MISBRANDING OF SALMON FISH.

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 220) prohibiting the introduction into any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, from any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or from any foreign country, or shipment to any foreign country, any misbranded salmon fish prepared or intended for use as an article of food.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I assure the Senator from Oregon that I have no hostility to this bill, but as a legal proposition it has attracted attention in debate here this morning, and I should like to give it further examination. I hope the Senator will not press it to passage this morning.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I am certain the Senator has no design regarding the bill other than to get it perfected, and I am not going to press the bill any further this morning for several reasons. In the first place, I shall not press it because the Senator has asked me not to do so; and, in the next place, I could not if I would, because the hour has arrived when I shall have to let it go over. I wish to ask the Chair, however, whether, if the bill now goes to the Calendar, an order can be made so that it can be called up hereafter?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It goes back to the Calendar.

Mr. MITCHELL. My colleague can give notice that he will call it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can, of course, be called up from the Calendar in the same way the Senator called it up to-day, whenever the Calendar is before the Senate.

Mr. FULTON. Then I will at some future time move to take up the bill again.

INDIANA STATE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. There are a few minutes remaining before the morning hour expires, and I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7402) for the relief of the Indiana State board of agriculture.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear an explanation of the bill.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The buildings and grounds of the Indiana State board of agriculture——

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read. It is a short report.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Very well, the facts will be found in the report, which may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. WARREN on the 2d instant.

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred an act (H. R. 7402) for the relief of the Indiana State board of agriculture, have considered the same and hereby report it back to the Senate, recommending its passage without amendment.

The act proposes to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to cause to be investigated by the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army the circumstances, character, and extent of the alleged use, occupation, and damage of the buildings and grounds of this claimant by the military authorities and forces of the United States during the war with Spain, and to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount, if any, equitably due the claimant from the United States.

House Report No. 24, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, is adopted by your committee and made a part of their report, as follows:

"The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7402) for the relief of the Indiana State board of agriculture, submit the following report:

"A favorable report on this case was made by this committee in the Fifty-seventh Congress. The facts involved are set forth in that report, which is adopted and made part of this report, a copy being hereto appended.

"Your committee recommend the passage of the bill."

[House Report No. 867, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11781) to appropriate money to pay the claim of the Indiana State board of agriculture, submit the following report:

It is alleged that in 1898, during the war with Spain, United States military authorities took possession of the buildings and grounds of the Indiana State board of agriculture and used them for quarters for volunteer soldiers from April 26, 1898, until December 1, 1898; that the property was kept in good condition down to the use and occupation by United States troops; that when the property was vacated by the said soldiers the buildings and grounds were greatly damaged, and for which the said board of agriculture asks an appropriation of $9,037.50 to reimburse them for the use, occupation, and damage to the property.

The claim was filed in the War Department under the provisions of the act of June 6, 1900, but after the time had expired for filing claims under the terms of said act.

It seems to your committee that an investigation by the Secretary of War, or under his direction, is a matter of necessity before intelligent action can be had upon this case. The history of the transaction is susceptible of proof, and, while this is true, the committee desire the benefit of such proof outside of the ex parte statements of the petitioners.

The committee report herewith, as a substitute for H. R. 11781, a bill conferring power upon the Secretary of War to have the case investigated through the Quartermaster's Department and to report the result, with his recommendation thereon, to the Secretary of the Treasury for his action in the premises, and recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BUILDING FOR DEPARTMENT OF STATE, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1508) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection thereon of a public building to be used for a Department of State, a Department of Justice, and a Department of Commerce and Labor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire

[Mr. GALLINGER] to the amendment of the committee, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, on page 6, line 8, after the word "architects," insert:

The successful architect shall receive compensation in full, for plans, specifications, and detailed drawings, not to exceed 2½ per cent of the total cost of said building, and shall also—

So as to read:

That the construction of said building shall be in charge of the Secretary of State, the Attorney-General, and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, who are hereby authorized and directed to select and adopt plans for the said building, and to make contracts for its construction, after proper advertisements and the reception of bids; and, if they shall invite plans by competition among architects, the successful architect shall receive compensation in full, for plans, specifications, and detailed drawings, not to exceed 2½ per cent of the total cost of said building, and shall also pay to the person submitting the two sets of plans next in order of merit to those selected such sums as, in their judgment, shall be proper compensation for their preparation. The cost of said building, exclusive of site, shall not exceed $5,000,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further amendments to be offered to the amendment?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us hear the amendment read that has just been agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read.

The Secretary again read the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire the amendment to the amendment to be regarded as an open question?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. I think we had better leave it open for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be regarded as an open question.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana a question.

This bill, to which I have given no attention, provides for the construction of a building to cost, exclusive of the cost of site, not to exceed $5,000,000, for the use of the Department of State, the Department of Justice, and the Department of Commerce and Labor. I wish the Senator would tell me, if he will, what is the sum of the rent paid by the Government now each year for the buildings occupied by the Department of Justice and the Department of Commerce and Labor, and also, if the Senator will be good enough, what necessity exists for a new building for the Department of State or additional accommodations for the Department of State.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I will be very glad to inform the Senator. The report which accompanies the bill gives——

Mr. SPOONER. I was absent when the bill was debated on a former occasion.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I was going to say the report of the committee is very complete. It shows fully the urgent needs of the principal Departments for additional accommodations.

The State Department, as every Senator knows who has had occasion to visit it, is in very inadequate, cramped quarters, and there has long been a demand by that Department that more ample and suitable accommodations should be provided.

The State Department, as everyone knows, occupies a part of the War, State, and Navy building. The space occupied, when vacated by it, could be occupied by either the War or Navy Department, both of which are obliged to rent considerable space. If they are permitted to occupy the quarters now occupied by the State Department, there will be less rent to be paid to private landlords.

The Department of Justice is now paying rent at the rate of $25,200 per annum. The Attorney-General has for several years called attention to the fact that that great Department is improperly provided for. Very valuable records are in imminent danger of destruction by fire. Records, the loss of which would involve an immense sum to the United States, are in continual peril.

The Department of Justice is occupying several different buildings. If the Senator will indulge me a minute, I will turn to the report of the Attorney-General. He says:

The Department has been occupying rented quarters since 1899, when its building on Pennsylvania avenue was condemned and torn down.

During the past year it became necessary to rent an additional building, and the Department now has its official force distributed in seven buildings, including the quarters occupied by the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission and the space in the Court of Claims building occupied by the library.

The Department of Commerce and Labor is a new Department, as all are aware, and is now paying an annual rent amounting to $59,359.84. We are advised by the Secretary of this Department in his report to the Secretary of the Treasury as follows:

At the beginning of the coming fiscal year the Department of Commerce and Labor will consist of twelve organizations, transferred to it from other branches of the public service, two new bureaus, and the office proper of the Secretary—in all, fifteen organized offices.

Mr. SPOONER. How many has it now?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. In all, fifteen organized offices.

Mr. SPOONER. Now?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Now; that is, at the beginning of the fiscal year. I read from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury dated February 23, 1903.

Mr. ALLISON. That is on July last.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Yes; the Senator is correct.

Mr. SPOONER. It is fifteen now.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Are they accommodated by the proposed building?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Not fully. It would require an entire building to accommodate the Department of Commerce and Labor. The proposed building will be insufficient to fully accommodate the three Departments.

Mr. SPOONER. Has the Senator ever known of a public Department of the Government in Washington that was adequately accommodated?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I think the method in which the business has been transacted heretofore will bear me out in the statement that it never has been adequately accommodated; and if the opposition to this bill prevails, it will be a good many years before it will ever be adequately accommodated.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is endeavoring to correct the great evil that has long existed. As the Senator, of course, very well understands, there is no reason in the world why Congress should not make adequate provision for all the Departments of the Government.

The Senator was not here, I think, the other day when this question was before the Senate. The statement was then made that the Government is now paying out for rent of quarters in the District of Columbia $316,249.84 per annum, and it goes on increasing.

Not only that, but it is well understood that with the various Departments scattered here and there throughout the city it is impossible to get as good, efficient work out of the clerical force of the different Departments as it is where the forces are all housed in one building, where the work can be systematized and properly overlooked.

It will take some years before the building contemplated can be completed and ready for occupancy. Another building should soon follow this one. The Government should go on with the construction of public buildings in the District of Columbia so as to save the enormous drain upon the Treasury that is now going on and which has been going on for several years in the way of extravagant contributions to private property owners. It is a shame that the Government is obliged to appeal to private property owners to house its Departments. Do I answer the Senator sufficiently?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, the Senator answers me, and the Senator must not assume, because of my question, that I am in disagreement with him as to the policy of constructing adequate buildings for the discharge of the public business.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Oh, no, Mr. President. I knew the Senator by his question was not suggesting any opposition to the policy I have outlined. I simply took occasion, in answering his very proper question, to call attention anew to the general subject.

Mr. SPOONER. I was ill when this bill was under consideration heretofore by the Senate. I wanted to know something about the amount of money which the Government is paying each year for the accommodation of these three Departments outside of the public buildings.

I have had some doubt, Mr. President, about the comparative merits of different propositions; I do not mean different sites, but as to the buildings to accommodate public business which ought first to be entered upon by the Congress. I had supposed, until otherwise informed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS], that the State Department, while not having perhaps sufficient quarters such as the Department of State of a Government like this should have, was fairly well accommodated. The Department of Justice, I suppose, is not. The Department of Labor, which is a newly established Department—what it is doing outside of the bureaus which were transferred to it, I am not advised; it is young, and probably is not as large as it will be—but I had supposed that it is adequately, within fair limits, provided for.

I think there is an imperative necessity, Mr. President, for Congress to engage in the erection of buildings on Capitol Hill. I do not know of any Department of this Government, the members of which work more hours, and work harder, than the legislative department; and there certainly is no department of the Government which is so inadequately provided for as to office accomodation, and all that, as the legislative department of the Government. Of course a building is being erected which will provide adequate office accommodations for Members of the House of Representatives, but the provision for the Senate is a disgrace to this country. I wish more Senators were here to hear that statement.

Mr. HOAR. The absent Senators are, I suppose, down in the terrace.

Mr. SPOONER. I presume some of them are down in the lunch room looking after their stomachs; which I think is all proper enough.

Mr. ALLISON. Many of them are engaged in committee work.

Mr. SPOONER. Some of them are in committee rooms. But, Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I was not present when the Senator from Wisconsin made the statement to which he refers, and we all did not hear it. So I should be obliged to the Senator if he would make the statement again. I always follow him as closely as I can, but sometimes, as the Senator knows, we are unavoidably interrupted in our attendance here on the floor.

Mr. SPOONER. I made the statement that the provision, or rather the want of provision, for the accommodation of Senators as to offices is a disgrace to the country. We have a large number of Senators—more on the Democratic side probably than on the Republican side, though I am not certain as to that—housed in the Maltby Building. They are obliged to walk from that building to attend roll calls. While I do not wish to say anything in regard to that building which would cause a feeling of discomfort or disquiet among the men who occupy it, I venture to say—for I think it ought to be said—that it ought not to be occupied. A report which has been made to the Senate by the Superintendent of the Capitol shows it. As chairman of the Committee on Rules, which assigns accommodations to Senators, I have been anxious and disturbed from day to day by the occupancy of that building under existing circumstances.

As to Senators who are in the crypt below, I have only to say that it is not a good place for men to work. There may be here and there a room which is free from dampness, but I believe it is not a fit place for Senators to do the work which presses upon the Senators who do work, and most of the Senators do work. I believe that one of the most important duties for Congress to perform, and that, too, before it adjourns, is to set in motion, by adequate appropriation, a plan to erect a building, whether it be by enlarging the Capitol, which can be done so as to enhance its architectural beauty, and afford thirty-three additional rooms in which Senators can, without detriment to their health or danger to life, transact the public business; or by the erection of a building relatively situated to the Capitol and to the Senate Chamber as is the building which is to be constructed for the accommodation of the Members of the other House to that end of the Capitol.

Senators will find a model complete—the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], and I inspected it the other day in the Capitol—of this enlargement which has been planned. I will ask the Senator from Iowa, who is the author of it?

Mr. ALLISON. The plan is the original plan of the architect of this Capitol, Mr. Walter. It has been brought out in miniature for the purpose of showing what the building would be when completed.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not myself take kindly to it, for I have had an opportunity to see some——

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin whether the model to which he refers for the extension of the middle east front of the Capitol is Mr. Walter's plan?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. I am told—if the Senator from Wisconsin will excuse me once more——

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. That that whole question has been thoroughly considered by the House of Representatives on a resolution which has resulted in the collection of material for a document, which will be printed and on our tables on next Saturday, which covers the entire question of the enlargement of the Capitol under the plan of Mr. Walter—the original sketches and the final plan made by him.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether this extension of the Capitol will accommodate all Senators who are now occupants of the Maltby addition or of the basement below this building?

Mr. SPOONER. The extension of the Capitol will furnish thirty-three rooms, and, with such improvements as might be made, would enable each Senator to have a room in this building. I am not speaking, however, about the Maltby Building simply with reference to its inconvenience to Senators. It is a graver matter than that, as Senators will see if they will read the report made by Mr. Woods, and I have also talked with him on the subject.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would ask the Senator whether it would not be better to enlarge the Capitol building than to construct a new building to accommodate Senators?

Mr. SPOONER. I am not mentioning this for the purpose of antagonizing this bill, but I felt it to be a duty to bring it to the attention of the Senate; and if we are not to enter upon any very elaborate or costly plan of public buildings just at this time, I think that perhaps this might be deferred, and certainly there is an overwhelming necessity for added provision as speedily as possible for the safe accommodation of Senators.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I have not seen or heard of the model to which he has referred. Is it too large to be brought in here during the consideration of this question in order that we might see it?

Mr. SPOONER. It is too large. It is a perfect model of the whole Capitol as it would be with this proposed enlargement.

Mr. HEYBURN. I feel a keen interest in this question, inasmuch as I am one of those unfortunate folk located so far away that we can not retire to our committee rooms for the purpose of doing any work while the Senate is in session.

Mr. SPOONER. I was located there nominally for two years, but would not spend any time there.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I simply rose to observe that the bill before the Senate does not in any wise antagonize that proposition.

Mr. SPOONER. It does not antagonize that proposition unless it involves so much money and our committal to the expenditure of so much money as in the judgment of Congress to perhaps preclude Congress, having reference to the present condition of the finances of the country, from at the same time making provision for Senators.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I would direct the honorable Senator's attention to the fact that it will in effect cost the Government nothing to erect the buildings necessary for the accommodation of the business of the Departments. We are now paying out enormous sums as rent. If the Government were to issue 2 per cent bonds to the amount of fifteen millions and erect buildings for the accommodation of the Executive Departments of the Government in the District of Columbia, the interest on the bonds would be less than the annual rentals now paid out. This is not a case where the Government is spending money and getting nothing in return.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I am tired—I have been here for nearly fifteen years—of appropriations, appropriations for public buildings in the city for the Executive Departments of the Government and leaving the Supreme Court, the head of one of the three great coordinate, independent branches of the Government, housed as it is housed here, and leaving members of the Senate without either adequate, safe, or convenient accommodations to enable them, practically at their own expense, to transact public business of the most complicated character and requiring the most constant labor and attention. I do not think——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. I do think—if the Senator will permit me a moment longer—referring again to this enlargement of the Capitol, if we could enlarge the Capitol, and properly provide for the Supreme Court of the United States at the same time, perhaps, providing for the Department of Justice, there would be, without an additional building outside of the Capitol, adequate and safe accommodations for all the Senators now and, I hope, hereafter ever to come into this Capitol, and I never want any to come here from outside of the United States. I hope, Mr. President, while not perhaps strictly germane to the bill, and while not intended to antagonize the bill—it is for Senators to decide what they will do—I hope sincerely this Congress will not adjourn until it has made some provision for the accommodation of Senators.

Now I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. I rose at the time I did, in the first place, to get some information, which I am hoping the Senator will give us.

Mr. SPOONER. I beg the Senator's pardon for not having yielded before.

Mr. FORAKER. That is all right. What I wanted to know was whether or not any estimate has been given as to the cost of this proposed enlargement?

Mr. SPOONER. The estimate is $2,500,000.

Mr. FORAKER. Then why can we not provide for that enlargement at almost any time? I think every Senator and almost every Member of the House of Representatives would approve a measure of that character. I have heard it talked about ever since I have been in the Senate, and always only in one way—that is, favorably. We know what the manifest necessity is.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish Senators would take the trouble to look at that model.

Mr. FORAKER. I know in a general way about it. I have not seen that model, but I have seen pictures of it, and I know that it is an improvement that ought to be made. I felt mortified and humiliated when I heard a Senator who has a room in the Maltby Building tell us the other day that for a considerable period now that building has been condemned, that it is liable to fall, and that they have been prohibited from carrying books up into their rooms which they wanted to use in their work because it would endanger their lives and put in jeopardy all who are connected with that building.

Mr. SPOONER. The building, I think, is in no danger of falling. I think at one time it was a dangerous structure in that regard; but improvements have been made there, and I am told by the Superintendent of the Capitol that his fear is not from that, but if fire should occur in that building there would be very little chance of escape for those who were in the upper stories of the building.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SPOONER. I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator permit me to state that my impression is that at the last session of Congress the House of Representatives provided in the sundry civil appropriation bill an appropriation for the extension of the Capitol, and I believe that provision was stricken out of that bill at the instance of the Senate conferees. So I understand that the House is quite disposed to go on with the extension of the Capitol, and in that view there will be no trouble at all about securing legislation if it is desired by the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. I think that is true; but it is for the Senate to consider what is the best plan. The extension of the Capitol would not absolutely provide for Senators.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understood from the Senator that the enlargement of the Capitol would furnish sufficient additional rooms to meet the requirements of Senators.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, it could be done. The rooms, however, would not be large, but with the Supreme Court removed from the Capitol the space would be ample.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then would it not be better to provide that Senators should have rooms in the Capitol and the Supreme Court an additional building somewhere on an adjacent square?

Mr. SPOONER. I have always believed that it was the obvious duty of Congress to not neglect the Supreme Court any longer, but to afford them a building that would befit the dignity and power of that tribunal—the head of the judicial department of the Government. But that, of course, would take a long time in construction. The enlargement of the Capitol, I think we were told, could be made in two years.

Mr. TELLER. How long?

Mr. SPOONER. In about two years; and that it would cost $2,500,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would state to the Senator that there are thirty-two Senators housed in the Maltby Building; so that the addition would provide for all of them.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I want to indorse what the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] has so well said about the necessity of providing suitable accommodations for Senators. I have myself had some experience in this connection. I spent two years in the Maltby Building and two years in the basement of the Capitol. When I first came to the Senate I did not have any room at all. We are in a somewhat better condition than we were twenty-five years ago; but still Senators are not properly provided for.

A great many people seem to think that to provide a room for a Senator is a sort of luxury. No Senator can do his duty here properly unless he has a place where he can go to consult books and to prepare himself for the ordinary duties of the Senate. He must do that at home if he has not a place in the Capitol. It is often convenient to come here in the morning to committee meetings, and if, perhaps, the committee gets through before the Senate convenes, the Senator may retire to his committee room and complete considerable work before it is time to come to the Senate. If the Senate adjourns at an unusually early hour, he can retire to his committee room and do his work there. I have myself found that it is an absolute necessity to have a place where I could have a library of some kind, not only here, but in my quarters, wherever they may be, what I consider my home in this city.

I do not know anything about the plan for the Capitol—that is to say, I am not familiar with it, and I do not express any opinion in regard to it; but I think there ought to be something done that will give every Senator a reasonably respectable room, where he is not in danger of being burned up or in danger of the building falling on him. If there should happen to come up a big storm, I think any man who was in the Maltby would have to take his chances of injury in that regard.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator is a member of the Committee on Appropriations. I saw a statement in the newspapers—I do not know about its correctness, and I am asking for my own information—that when provision was made for a building to accommodate the Members of the House of Representatives provision was also inserted in the same appropriation bill looking to the construction of a building on this side of the Capitol for Senators. I ask the Senator what is the reason that that item was dropped at that time?

Mr. TELLER. I will leave that to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who can speak more intelligently as to it than I can, as I was not a member of the subcommittee.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the Senator's inquiry?

Mr. GORMAN. I interrupted the Senator from Colorado to inquire why it was that the provision inserted in the sundry civil appropriation bill, as I understand, for the construction of a building on the north side of the Capitol was left out at the time provision was made for a building for the House of Representatives at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. ALLISON. Senators will understand that in the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill last year in the Committee on Appropriations the time was very limited. There was a difference, I will say—I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Colorado——

Mr. TELLER. I wish the Senator would go on. I think this matter ought to be taken up and ought to be discussed.

Mr. ALLISON. There was a difference in the Committee on Appropriations, and I think in the Senate, as to what should really be done with reference to furnishing additional facilities for Senators. Although at that time, as has been so well expressed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], the situation seemed to be urgent, the Senate Committee on Appropriations, as I remember, recommended that the House provision for the extension of the Capitol should be stricken out, and that there should be inserted a provision looking to a building separate and distinct erected northeast of the Capitol, fronting the square. That provision was stricken out by the Senate, and a provision was inserted for the preparation of a general plan for a separate building to be erected northeast of the Capitol.

When the bill came into conference the House conferees very much desired that the construction of the building for the House of Representatives should be entered upon; and while they were providing in that bill for the construction of that building on the south side of the Capitol, the reason given by them was that it was impossible under any circumstances for the Members of the House to be accommodated by an extension of the present Capitol building. They stated that a separate building for the House of Representatives was necessary in any event; but they also favored the extension of the Capitol as a method of providing for the Senate rather than a separate building, and they went so far as to say that of the estimated seventy rooms in this extension of the Capitol the Senate could be provided with a sufficient number of them to accommodate every Senator, including those in the Maltby Building and those in the terrace.

So that when these two propositions came to the conference it was agreed and a provision was inserted either in the sundry civil bill or in another bill—I think in another bill—that a carefully prepared plan and model of the Capitol extension should be made, and that also there should be a compilation of the several plans and projects of the old Architect, Mr. Walter. In accordance with that provision in the bill of last year the model has been completed, which has been referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin, and is now visible to Senators in the upper part of the Capitol where the old library was once housed. An estimate, I am told, has been made covering the cost of this extension, amounting to in the neighborhood of $2,500,000, as was stated by the Senator from Wisconsin.

There has also been prepared a complete history of the details respecting the construction of the Capitol and, I believe, with illustrations. That document will be laid upon our tables, I think, on Saturday next. I had occasion to make an inquiry about it a few days ago in connection with some other matters in the sundry civil appropriation bill, and I was told that that document would be printed so that we could receive it here on Saturday next.

The situation as respects the Capitol extension last year was such that the Senate committee was not in possession of sufficient information regarding the effect of the extension upon the general appearance of the Capitol. It was stated by some members of the Senate that it would have the effect to impair the general exterior appearance of the Capitol and injure to some extent the east front, but so far as a layman or a nonexpert could judge, I think it would add very greatly to the east front of the Capitol to make this extension. That is the situation about it, as I understand, at this time. I am sorry to have interrupted the Senator from Colorado so long.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator whether this plan of extension makes any provision for the elevation of the Dome?

Mr. ALLISON. No; it does not.

Mr. TELLER. It leaves it as it is?

Mr. ALLISON. The plan makes no change in the Dome.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Do I understand the Senator from Iowa to say that about seventy rooms will be added by this extension?

Mr ALLISON. The detail plan discloses sixty-six very comfortable rooms, and I understand, without having official information upon the subject, that the House, being provided with this large building below, are willing to give us more than the number which would be allotted to us if we made the center of the Dome the line between the two Houses.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The arrangement, then, would contemplate the Senate having more than one-half of the rooms?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Would it be sufficient, then, for the new States of Oklahoma and Arizona, if they are admitted?

Mr. ALLISON. Of course, with that detail I am not quite familiar. There will be sufficient room for the Representatives of one or two States; and I would not like to go into the question whether we are going to have two or four States, or whether we are to have any of our outlying possessions converted into States in the near future. But there certainly would be room enough for any probable increase in the number of Senators.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I simply inquired for the purpose of ascertaining whether beyond any contingency the extension of the Capitol would do away with the necessity of building an office building at the northeast corner.

Mr. ALLISON. I think there is no doubt that we shall have room enough without at any time in the near future building a structure on the northwest corner.

Mr. COCKRELL. I find in the sundry civil appropriation bill, at the last session of the Fifty-seventh Congress, February, 1903, that the Committee on Appropriations struck out the entire provision for the House building, and in order to put the whole thing into the hands of the conference committee inserted this provision:

Provided, That the Superintendent of the Capitol is directed to prepare a general plan for the construction of a separate building for the use of the Senate for offices and committee rooms to be located northeast and near by to the Capitol, and to estimate the cost of the same, a report thereon to be made to Congress on the 7th day of December, 1903.

That put the whole matter into conference between the two Houses.

Mr. ALLISON. And both provisions, I will remind the Senator, went out in conference and another provision was inserted providing for a model of this extension.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that the House building is going on now?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. The House will be provided by existing legislation with a proper place for Members' rooms.

This question, Mr. President, has been before the Senate for at least twenty-five years. I recall very well years ago, when there was a propcsition to extend the west side of the building, before the present improvements were made. Subsequently the present scheme was adopted. I think that cost us about a million dollars, if I am not mistaken. More than a million dollars, Senators say.

Aside from the fact that it has been useful as a place to put in machinery, I do not think anybody has ever had any use for it or any idea that it was an improvement to the Capitol. At least I have never found anybody who did when they were questioned on the subject. The Senator from Nevada suggests to me that it may have been an architectural improvement. I am not a judge of those questions. I do not know that I care to go into it, except to say that I myself always felt that it dwarfed the Capitol and was of no benefit whatever to the Capitol. I thought the Capitol was much more handsome from that side before the addition than it is now, and a little change could have been made then, I believe, to the front which would have made it very much more in taste, or, at least, what I believe to be in accordance with good taste, than it is to-day.

The Senator from Indiana says that this bill which we are considering, or at least which we will consider pretty soon, does not antagonize the proposition which the Senator from Wisconsin and others favor, that there should be some arrangement for the accommodation of the Senate. That has been the cry every time we have brought up this question—that there was something more important. Evidently the Committee on Public Buildings thinks it more important when it brings in here a bill to expend five or six million dollars on a building and probably a million or a million and a half on the ground for the accommodation of Departments that are very much better served to-day than the Senate is served. And the only excuse is that the Government is paying out a large amount of money for rent. That is true. Three hundred thousand dollars is a great deal of money. But when you consider the vast expenditures of this Government it sinks into utter insignificance. I would willingly save it, and I believe it my duty to help save it, even if it were very much less than that, if it is possible to do so, but there are other things of more importance than the question of saving money.

In the first place, I do not think it is wise to carry out the scheme of this bill, which is to take the square immediately north of the State Department, or the square immediately north of the Treasury Department, and I do not know which is to be taken, and nobody else knows or will know, I suppose, until the commission consisting of the Attorney-General and the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall determine. This bill leaves it absolutely to those three officers.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I wish to correct the Senator a little at that point.

Mr. TELLER. If I am in fault, I desire to be corrected.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Of course the Senator would not intentionally misstate the provisions of the bill. There are four additional members of the commission on location. The President pro tempore of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate, the Speaker of the House, and the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House are members in addition to the three Cabinet officers mentioned by the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. That is immaterial, because this commission will settle where the building is to be. We abandon our right to determine that question, and turn it over to this committee. I am not in favor of doing that. I admit that there ought to be some additional buildings built. I do not hesitate to say that we have been derelict for many years in not building them. It seems to me a great deal more important that the Supreme Court of the United States should have a reasonable place in which to do its business, which it has not to-day, than it is that the newly created Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor should have a place to discharge his multifarious duties, which the Senator from Wisconsin seems to think are somewhat in the clouds, and I guess they are, for if anybody will take the pains to look at the law under which that Department was created he will see that the extent of the jurisdiction and authority of that Department is limited only by the amount of money Congress may appropriate.

It has fifteen bureaus, of fifteen divisions now, and if the ambition of the head of that Department is carried out and he faithfully executes the provisions of the law itself, he will have a hundred divisions in the next five years, and then he will not exceed at all the provisions of the act, which is the most liberal of all the acts that have ever passed since I have been in public life.

If there is anything that the Secretary of the Department of Commerce can not do it would take a man with a search warrant to find what it is, provided Congress will give him the money. He can supersede, and he is attempting to supersede, and he will supersede, if he carries out the plans of the Department as I understand them, the law department of this Government and the consular bureaus. He will have the world traversed by men getting information which hitherto the consuls and consuls-general and commercial agents of the Government under the State Department obtained. So, if there is a necessity to provide for this particular Department, you want to strike out everything else in this bill and allow that Department to take possession of this whole building, for it will not be too big.

I have never known authority to be given to anybody since I have been in public life that they did not increase it and want more. I have never known a Department of the Government that had a large force that did not want more. I have never known a Department to come to the legislative branch of the Government at any time for authority that it did not get it, or for an additional appropriation, if they wanted it. So I assume we are going on to extend not only the Department of Commerce, but undoubtedly the State Department and the War Department and everything else, and I do not believe that anybody now here is justified in saying that this building, when put up, will afford accommodations such as we ought to provide.

That brings me to the suggestion whether it would not be good, wise business for us to have a commission composed not of the heads of these Departments alone, but of some of them, with some of the architects of the country, and with some men who are not architects, but have common sense, to determine what will be the probable necessities of this country not only for buildings to-day, but what they will be in the next fifty years.

That is why I now object to passing this bill creating one building for three Departments. I do not know but that there is a necessity for a building; but at all events we can rent buildings, and if we pay the rent the Departments will be better housed and better protected in their interests than we are here. Of course if we would not rent rooms for them there might be a necessity for haste in this matter. I do not know how many buildings are going to be built, but I should say from my experience since I have been here that there will be a great many million dollars invested in public buildings.

When I first came to Washington the State and Navy Department building, which had cost ten or twelve million dollars, was not yet completed. I believe one part of it was occupied and a part of it was still in process of construction. That is a little more than a quarter of a century ago. Now that building is not big enough for two Departments of the Government, and it was supposed when we built it that it would be big enough, practically, for all.

The Navy Department was then considered a small Department, spending a few million dollars a year. It has become a great Department, spending now a hundred million dollars a year, and next year it will spend a hundred and twenty-five million dollars, and if the plans already laid out by the Navy Department are carried out, Senators who are on this floor will live to see it $200,000,000 a year.

Mr. President, it seems to me it would be the course of wisdom to create a commission and say to them: "Now, at the next session of Congress tell us something about the wants and necessities of this Government. Look back and see what the Government has been doing in the last fifty years, and see what its growth and extension have been, and determine what it will want in the next fifty years." Of course I know it will be a difficult question to determine what is to be the future growth of this land of ours. I know we may continue to progress and grow in wealth and numbers, and it seems to me that that is the normal and proper thing to expect. Since we escaped threatened dissolution in this country it seems to me that when you look to the future—and when I speak of that I do not mean in my lifetime or in yours, but in the next one hundred and fifty or two hundred years—we ought to increase in numbers; we ought to increase in wealth; we ought to increase in everything that makes a nation great and strong and gives it a proper place in the world.

This, Mr. President, is our national capital. It is the place that was founded as the seat of government by the consent of the States and was withdrawn from the operations of State laws, and Congress alone was given power to regulate affairs in this District. It was believed when it was laid out that it would be the great capital of a great nation, and yet I doubt whether there lived then a man who, if he had been called upon to tell us what would be the power and wealth of the nation to-day, would have dared to predict the condition that now exists. It ought to be the greatest capital of the world. It not only ought to represent the wealth, but it ought also to represent the intelligence of this great country of ours.

When I came here twenty-seven years ago last fall, having but a slight acquaintance with this capital, having been here only a few times in my life, I said to my associate who came with me, "While I am in this body I intend to vote for every appropriation that comes before the Senate that will make this the handsomest and best city in the world;" and in the years that I have served here I have never failed to give a vote looking in the direction of making this city such that every American who came here would look upon it with pride, and feel that he had a capital city that represented the great strength and wealth and intelligence of the American people. I want a capital city so that whenever a man comes from abroad he will be properly impressed, and I would not have any other city in the world exceed us in beauty and loveliness, if I had my way.

Since I have been here I have heard complaints of the expense of this District. I have heard complaints of the expense of building streets and avenues and opening avenues of intercourse with the outside suburban towns. I have heard some complaint of the extravagance of the buildings. I remember that a few years ago there was in the Senate much feeling that we should retrench and that we were spending too much money, and this body then instructed the Interior Department to build a building for the use of the Pension Office alone, and they said it should be built of brick and of iron, and it should have no ornamentations, and no expense should be incurred in that direction. It was provided that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior and General Meigs should locate it upon some public ground.

It was thought that the Government could not afford to buy a place to put the building. And so the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior hunted through this city and found themselves simply confronted with the question, "Shall we put it down where the market now is, or in that neighborhood, or shall we put it upon Judiciary Square?" Then we marred that square with a building which in its architectural character is a disgrace to the city of Washington. In its inside it is the best building for the public service in the city. With respect to the outside, if I had my way I would pull it down, or I would adorn it with a better roof, and I would spend a little money in making a handsome building of it.

Mr. President, I have said this leading up to the question whether we are not premature when we insist now upon going on and determining that this building shall be built where this bill provides; whether there is not a necessity that we should do something toward getting rid of a condition on the great Avenue that is absolutely disgraceful to this capital. Walk down from here to the Peace Monument. Cast your eye to the right. In front of this Capitol, in sight of it, there are insanitary buildings—buildings that would be torn down in almost any second-class city in the country because of their unhealthy condition and character.

I do not know whether we ought to take hold of this thing and compel the citizens who have such buildings to tear them down and build others, but I do believe it would be wisdom on our part to buy that square, not simply to get rid of those old buildings, but in part to get rid of them. I believe it would be wisdom on our part to commence at the Botanical Gardens and buy every square until you reach the Sherman Monument below the Treasury Department. Nay, more, if I had my way I would remove every building on the lower side of the Avenue. I would take every one out, and when the depot shall be taken away I would make one continuous mall, save and except the buildings that might be put on the line of the Avenue for the use of the Government.

Senators will say that is a great expense. Mr. President, it will not cost a tithe of what Paris spent to beautify that city under Louis Napoleon, and there is not a Frenchman anywhere who is not proud of that act. Nobody has ever regretted it. The French tore down old buildings of hundreds of years' standing and put up buildings of fine character, and made great, wide streets where there had been narrow ones. I do not know how much it would cost. It will not cost much more than this scheme—I do not say that the committee have adopted it; I do not say the chairman has espoused it—to put all these buildings around Lafayette Square. In my judgment it will cost less; and if you put them there you will have the contrast between these worthless buildings on the Avenue and these fine buildings up there. What does the foreigner who comes here, when he walks or rides up the Avenue, think of the buildings on the left-hand side?

Contrast them with the Treasury Department and the State Department and the White House, which, even with some objections that I have to it just now, is a creditable building.

I should like to have a commission tell us what it would cost. I should like to have a commission tell us what kind of buildings we ought to put there. Then, Mr. President, one by one, as we need them, I would build them there. I am not alarmed if some one tells me it would cost $25,000,000. It will not, except for the buildings. I should like to see lining that avenue buildings which would comport with the dignity and character of this nation. I know that when the Avenue was laid out it was expected that it would be lined with fine buildings. It has not been. When you have removed the buildings on the lower side and replaced them by respectable buildings of the Government, the buildings on the other side will be removed, and they, too, will be replaced by buildings for business purposes worthy and creditable to the city.

Mr. President, I think myself that we want in this immediate vicinity a place for the Supreme Court of the United States. I believe the Supreme Court ought to be on the square where this great Library of ours is.

That brings me to say a word about the Library. I see in the committee's report that eleven years after the Library movement was inaugurated the Library was completed. When I entered the Senate the Library question was a rife one. It was then being considered, and again and again the House sent us bills for a cheap library, and the records will show that every time any of those cheap bills came over I gave my vote against it, because I believed when we built a library it should be a library upon which the world could look with pleasure. I think I can say to-day that of all the libraries of the world there is not one that compares with it in elegance. There are some greater ones, but none can exceed it in appointments for the proper dispatch of business. It cost six million three hundred and some odd thousand dollars.

Not an American citizen has walked into it since it was built who has not felt that the money was well expended; and if you distribute the great amount you are paying here for buildings and for beautifying the city, there is not a self-respecting American citizen anywhere who will not approve of it.

So I do not intend to vote for this bill. I intend to vote for the amendment submitted by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who I regret is now ill and unable to be here, and I hope it may be adopted. We could get a commission. I do not know whether that commission is just such as it ought to be.

I have not paid much attention to it, but let a commission come here with a report, and let us determine the question—not a committee of this body alone, not this body in the hour of an expiring Congress, but this body and the other body, representing the great intelligence of the nation and the will of the American people. Let them say what shall be the character of this city. Now is the crucial and critical time. If you do not do it now you will not do it at all. If we go on in the way we have been going, erecting buildings here and buildings there, and especially if you attempt to put these buildings around Lafayette Square, the condition that I think is disgraceful to the American people will continue indefinitely here.

I know there are things more important to a nation than even its capital, but, Mr. President, a nation that does not have pride in its capital is on the downward road to death. A nation that does not feel an interest in the place where its legislature meets and where its executive lives is not a healthful people.

Mr. President, I sometimes get discouraged. I sometimes think that we are departing from the lessons and the teachings of the fathers. But after all I have a hope and a belief that if for a little while we shall forget some of the fundamental principles of government, we will not forget them in the long run, and my hope in that is in the pride of the American people in their country. Patriotism, it is said, consists in love of country. Mr. President, there is no patriotism if there is not love, and pride goes with love. You do not love a nation unless you can respect it.

So, Mr. President, I say I believe this is a question that ought to attract the attention of the Senate. It is a question that we ought to put our best effort on. It is a question that the American people will back us up in if we but do our duty as it ought to be done.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, in many respects, it seems to me, we have been very prodigal in the management of some of our public affairs in this District. We have in many instances rented buildings where we had no occasion to rent them, and we have put up buildings where we ought not to have built them. Of the first I will give you an illustration.

A few years ago the Department of Justice occupied quarters to the north of the Treasury Department near Riggs Bank, close to the Lafayette Theater. We had a very good building there, owned by the Government and occupied by the Department of Justice. For some inscrutable reason it was pulled down, and since that time we have been paying an enormous rent for the Department of Justice.

But, Mr. President, what I rose to call particular attention to is this scheme, which in one form or another has appeared here in Congress, of putting all our public buildings in the swamp on the south side of the avenue. Some days ago I took occasion to go over to the chart room or the map room in the Congressional Library, and I found King's topographical map of the city of Washington of 1803. I wish Senators would go and examine that map and look at it. From that map it appears that there was quite a stream here at the foot of Capitol Hill, known as the Tiber, crossing the Avenue between First and Second streets, going south as far as B street SW., making a loop and then back again up toward the Avenue and down to the river. From Sixth street down to the river it was a wide, open estuary, where the tide ebbed and flowed, and a part of the ground where the market stands to-day was in the bed of that stream. That stream was first canalized—made into canals. They made one canal running south with two forks leading into the Eastern Branch. Then they made the main branch down into a canal and covered it.

As a matter of fact, nearly all the territory between Fourteenth street and the south side of Pennsylvania avenue and the Mall is either the bed of the old Tiber or it is swampy and made ground. On the west of it, somewhere between Thirteenth and Fourteenth streets, there was a litttle stream that came in from the west. All that bog has been built up; the river has been filled up; the Tiber has been filled up, and the swamps adjoining them. And now Senators propose calmly and deliberately that we shall put all our public buildings on that swampy and made ground when we have such an abundance of good firm ground in the city of Washington.

I venture to say that quite a fortune, enough to put up a respectable building, was spent in securing a foundation for the building for the Post-Office Department. A great fortune was spent there in getting foundations. If you go to the southeast corner of the White Lot, you will find there engraved how high the flood came up. If we should ever have such another flood, all the basement of the Post-Office Department building would be flooded.

To me, with the fact that we have so many places of good high ground in this city, it is perfectly monstrous. If that unsightly place below the Avenue ought to be purged, and I concede that it ought, it ought not to be purged by putting costly public structures down into that muddy hole. We ought to raze the buildings so that the grass may grow on all of it, and let the Mall run up clear to the Avenue. But, for God's sake, let us put our buildings on terra firma, on good ground.

Look at the Post-Office building now, in that region down there. It is a big building. If it had been on suitable ground it would have been a commanding building, an imposing structure, and we would all have been proud of it. Down there, with its surroundings, in the midst of a lot of hobos of buildings, as I might say, it looks to be a very poor and dilapidated building indeed. Why should we put the Government to the task of going down there and building great, immense, expensive buildings right in that swampy, made ground.

Mr. President, it seems to me, if we have the welfare of our country at heart, if we want to do what is just, if we want to be economical and manage our public trust as becomes us, the last thing we ought to do in the world is to pile up our buildings in a row in that swampy, made ground along the Avenue. We have plenty of good high ground here where our public buildings can be erected.

As I said a moment ago, if that space south of the Avenue ought to be purged to make the city look better, let us clear off the buildings, sow it in grass, make a beautiful mall of it, plant fine trees there, and extend it. That will be the proper way, but not to inject all of our public buildings in a row down on that swamp and in that muddy place.

That is the way it looks to me, Mr. President. I do not care about taking up the time of the Senate. I ask Senators to go over to the Library and look at the old topographic map of King of 1803, and they can see that what I have said to you is correct.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, we have already put two buildings on the Avenue. We have the Post-Office building on the Avenue, and we have the municipal building planned for the Avenue—that is, close to the Avenue; it fronts on the Avenue.

Mr. QUARLES. If it will not disturb the Senator, I wish to ask him, referring now to the building which he speaks of as the municipal building, on the lots we have known in our committee as the "power-house-site lot," does he know what it cost to get a foundation there for that power house?

Mr. TELLER. I know it cost a good deal. It cost a good deal for the Post-Office Department. I understand that.

Mr. QUARLES. If I may add, our committee was informed that it cost over $100,000 to get a foundation there for the old power house.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I know something about the old canal. I recollect very well when there was a canal there. I know something of the character of the ground around the market, because, as Secretary of the Interior, in connection with the Secretary of War and General Meigs, we were required to find out whether we could put a foundation there. We found that we could, but it was in a place where we felt we could not afford to put a public building, and much as we disliked to invade Judiciary Square, we had to do that.

Now, Mr. President, there is not any trouble to get foundations, and good foundations. The foundation of the Post-Office Department building is a perfect one. There has been no settling of the building. It is somewhat expensive, but, then, large buildings always are expensive in their foundations.

And it is not a swamp, as the Senator from Minnesota says. There was some swamp down there, but as to an overflow, it never need overflow if we do our duty to this city and take care of the river as we ought to take care of it. The overflow came from the penurious treatment of this District by Congress.

Mr. President, as to the great flats down there, since I have been here a distinguished citizen of this city offered to build them up and bring them up to grade if the Government would give him the land when he got through, and they would not do it. If there has been a flood here we are to blame for it, and it is within our power to prevent a recurrence of that kind. That is one of the things we ought to do, and it is one of the things we will certainly do if we tear out those old buildings and extend the Mall down to the neighborhood of the Avenue and then line it with proper buildings.

Mr. President, I should be willing myself to pull out the buildings on the lower side of the Avenue and bring them all up to it if we did not put a building upon it. Having commenced putting buildings upon it, it would mar it as a mall, and it ought to be, in my judgment, lined with buildings of such a character that the Government of the United States will be able to conduct its business in them and that the citizens who come here will be proud of the Government buildings.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, I wish to say but a word.

The debate thus far has disclosed a great diversity of opinion as to what should be done to meet a condition which must be met. It has always been difficult to secure buildings in the District of Columbia because of the great divergence of opinions.

The debate upon this bill has not been singular in that it has disclosed many contrary opinions, for every bill that has been brought in with respect to buildings in the District of Columbia has disclosed the same conflicting views.

What we propose may not be the best thing to do. It seems, however, to a committee that is charged with the responsibility of providing buildings for the Government service that this is, on the whole, the best that can now be done.

As I said the other day, my judgment is that the Government owes it to itself to secure square 167, immediately west of Lafayette Place. That square is either to be occupied by the Government or for private or corporate business purposes. A dignified, classic building, such as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] would construct, will be built there, or apartment houses or business houses, which will detract seriously from the beauty and the majesty of the very heart of the Republic.

The purchase of that square, Mr. President, does not exclude the possibility of carrying out the very enterprise which the honorable Senator suggests and prefers. This one building is but a small step toward providing for the reasonable demands of the Government.

Whenever a proposition like this is made, one of the ways to sidetrack it has been to suggest a commission. It is an easy way of avoiding the practical question. It postpones it. It leaves it open for further debate.

Mr. President, I believe I am not discharging my duty unless I do all that I can do to build buildings imperatively required by every consideration of sound business policy and stop the drain of over a quarter of a million dollars a year upon the Treasury of the United States for the rental of inadequate buildings in the District of Columbia.

In order to be liberal in this matter, I offered an amendment upon the floor of the Senate on behalf of the committee providing that the commission should take into consideration the feasibility and the desirability of acquiring property south of the Avenue and east of Fifteenth street upon which to locate this building. I have no prejudice whatever in the matter; I simply want to be making progress according to the best lights I can command.

There is a difference, an honest difference, of opinion as to whether we should locate this building north of the Avenue or south of it. The differences of opinion are not for the mere purposes of disagreement; we all understand that.

The Senator speaks about accommodating the Senate with office rooms and committee rooms. I thoroughly agree with him as to the necessity and the advisability of so doing. This does not stand in the way of anything of that sort.

I agree also that it is the part of wisdom to provide accommodations for the Supreme Court, one of the great departments of the Government, a department of great dignity and great power. There should be a building provided for that great tribunal in full keeping with its dignity and power. The honorable Senator and I do not disagree as to that.

The difficulty that confronts us is this: We all know that it is impossible to provide for all these urgent necessities at the same time. We have got to go at these questions in a practical way. We have got to approach them in a way to accomplish results. If we can not provide for all at once, let us provide for some. We may disagree as to which is the most urgent. There is ample ground for honest difference there. The committee, exercising its best thought and its best judgment, has determined it to be the part of wisdom to provide first for the accommodation of those great Departments that are paying out thousands and tens of thousands of dollars a year for the rent of insufficient accommodations for the public business.

The committee of which the honorable Senator is a distinguished member—a committee commanding the unquestioned confidence of the Senate—in 1903 authorized a building for the National Museum to cost the sum of three and one-half million dollars. By the construction of that building not a dollar is saved to the Government in the way of cutting off rents. Our committee does not believe that that was the wisest policy.

The Appropriations Committee believed it the best policy. If our committee had exercised its judgment upon that question it would have taken the three and one-half million dollars and put up a building for some of the Departments for which we are paying out as rent these enormous sums upon appropriation bills at each session of Congress. It is a mere matter of opinion. It is an honest difference of opinion.

The bill before the Senate comes from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. There is no divided opinion among the members of that committee with respect to it. The committee is a unit earnestly in favor of its passage.

Mr. President, without detaining the Senate unduly, I ask permission to incorporate as a part of my remarks extracts from the report of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in support of the bill before the Senate, and also an extract from the estimate of appropriations for the present Congress, showing the enormous sums that are paid out in the District of Columbia for the rent of property for the accommodation of the public business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The committee adopted the report it made to the Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, in support of a bill to acquire block 167 to be used for executive offices and for the Department of State and the Department of Justice. The following are among the most material portions of the report:

At a hearing before your committee the Supervising Architect estimated that the building and site together would probably cost not to exceed $7,000,000.

STATE DEPARTMENT.

Accompanying the report as an appendix is a letter from the Hon. David J. Hill, Assistant Secretary of State, pointing out the necessity of immediately providing additional space for that Department.

He says:

"The general offices of the Secretary of State and his assistants have long been felt to be entirely inadequate for the purpose for which they are intended. At present the Secretary of State occupies an office to which there is no anteroom and in connection with which there is no provision for his private secretary or for private conferences. As a consequence of this deficiency of accommodations it is impossible to carry on private or confidential conversations with Senators, Representatives, or other officers of the Government without the danger of constant interruption. The only provision for those who await an interview is the common corridor, where the awaiting visitor, whether lady or gentleman, must stand in full public view, surrounded by the messengers and others moving through the building."

And further:

"What has just been said of the accommodations provided for the Secretary of State is true also of those provided for his three assistants, who, with the subdivision of the business of the Department, which is a necessary consequence of its growth, and in view of the necessity of receiving large numbers of callers, should be provided each with a waiting room, a retiring room, and a room for the private secretary, in addition to the principal office room. The most awkard situations have grown out of the conditions at present existing, and officers of the Government have been obliged to depart without communicating their private business because they could not communicate it without giving it publicity."

Up to the present time the State Department has been able to conduct its business in the present quarters without renting outside space, but valuable records and files are crowded out into the corridors, and within a few weeks the Secretary of State found it impossible to accept a deposit of valuable records because there was no safe place in the Department not occupied in which they could be stored.

This is only one instance of the embarrassment that has resulted from the present overcrowded condition of the Department—an embarrassment that must necessarily be increased as the Department grows. There is no question with the committee that it is the duty of the Government to provide for keeping safely the valuable records of the State Department within that Department's own building. The Department is reduced, however, to the extremity of having to rent additional space, and that step is now under consideration. A safe depository will have to be found outside the building for important state papers.

In a recent report of the work of the State Department, William H. Michael, chief clerk, says:

"The work of the Department has increased over 80 per cent in the last ten years without any essential increase in its working force. Both the force and the available working space in the Department will have to be increased very considerably within a short time in order to meet the absolute necessities of the service."

In this connection it was authoritatively stated that whenever this increase in the force is made additional space will have to be rented, for the present building can not accommodate the increase.

The Department has long considered it wise and proper that provision should be made for the holding of international commissions. It has found great difficulty and embarrassment in securing suitable private accommodations when necessary.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

In the Fifty-fifth Congress, third session, Congress provided for the erection of a new Department of Justice by an act approved March 3, 1899. The necessity for this action was recited in the preamble, as follows:

"Whereas the building now occupied by the Department of Justice is too small for the purpose and is unsafe, overcrowded, and dangerously overloaded and has been so pronounced after examination by the proper officials of the Treasury Department."

If the necessity existed at that time for a new building for that Department, it has been emphasized since by the fact that the old quarters have been vacated and torn down, and, because of unforeseen complications, no steps have been taken toward the erection of a new building. The act has, by common consent of the executive officers, remained unexecuted, and the Department of Justice is located in private quarters not suited to the purpose, and for which high rent is paid. The principal difficulty in the way of executing the act of March 3, 1899, was the inadequate appropriation. It was found that $1,000,000, the limit of cost fixed in the act, was not sufficient to construct a building adapted for the purpose.

The Attorney-General asked for an increase of the limit to $1,900,000, but Congress did not deem it advisable to increase it, and the officers charged with executing the law regarded it wiser to wait until such time as Congress in its judgment should see fit to provide more money than to erect a building that must prove insufficient to meet even the immediate needs of the Department, and which made no provision for the future. A letter from the Attorney-General is appended to this report.

WAR AND NAVY DEPARTMENTS.

As suggested elsewhere, by providing for the State Department in the new building, the War and Navy Departments will be enabled to occupy to good advantage the space thus to be vacated. The increase in the official and clerical forces of these two Departments has been such during recent years that both are greatly congested and urgently require additional accommodations. The condition in the Navy Department has become so serious that the Secretary of the Navy recently created a board to investigate and report upon the necessity of additional space. The report of the board shows that more space is imperatively required. The letter of the Secretary of the Navy is appended hereto.

The letter of the Secretary of War appended to this report directs attention to the overcrowded condition of the War Department and shows that the health of the employees is endangered by existing conditions, and that the convenient and ready dispatch of the public business is interfered with. Corridors are occupied by clerks and public documents to the confusion and embarrassment of the public service.

In the event the building proposed is erected and the space occupied by the State Department is divided between the War and Navy Departments in proportion to their respective forces "it would enable the War Department," says the Secretary of War, "to give up some of its rented buildings and relieve its present overcrowded condition in that building."

It is obvious that the War and Navy Departments will not be fully accommodated by the removal of the State Department, as contemplated, but each will be enabled to secure some considerable measure of relief.

It is interesting in this connection, by way of comparison, to consider the cost of sites of several of the principal public buildings erected by the Government.

The site for the post-office and subtreasury at Boston cost $1,329,095; at Cincinnati, $708,026; post-office and court-house, Chicago, Ill., $1,259,385; post-office and court-house, Philadelphia, $1,573,867; St. Louis, Mo., custom-house and post-office, $368,882; New York custom-house (old) site, $1,000,000; New York custom-house (new) site, $2,240,718; Washington City post-office, $651,215.

It will be instructive to compare the estimated cost of the building provided for by the accompanying bill with the cost of some other Government buildings. The United States Treasury building cost $6,470,090; the post-office building in the city of Washington, D. C., $2,585,835; the Congressional Library building, $6,343,000; the State, War, and Navy Department building, $10,038,482. The estimated cost of the building contemplated in the accompanying bill is from $5,000,000 to $6,000,000. It should be borne in mind that the cost of site is not included in the amounts above mentioned.

It should be observed that the cost of the building for the Department of Justice authorized by act of Congress March 3, 1899, was limited to $1,000,000. But subsequently, as heretofore observed, the Attorney-General found it was impossible to construct a creditable building within this limit, and an increase of $500,000 was asked. The accompanying bill is intended to provide for the accommodation of three great Departments of the Government at a cost, exclusive of site, of from $5,000,000 to $6,000,000, or, in round numbers, from $1,000,000 to $4,000,000 more than has been found necessary to erect a suitable building for the Department of Justice alone on the present site, which occupies but a fraction of a block, the residue of which is occupied by private and corporate interests.

An examination of the history of some of the great Department buildings in Washington discloses the fact that they have been constructed after the most tedious and protracted delays.

About fourteen years elapsed from the time discussion began for the erection of the extension of the Treasury building until it was completed and occupied.

It was about eleven years after the discussion of the necessity for a new Congressional Library building began until the building was ready for use.

Some seventeen years elapsed in considering the necessity of the construction of the State, War, and Navy building and in the actual construction.

It should be borne in mind that even after the requisite authority of Congress is granted much time will be consumed in actual construction. It required about eight years to construct the Washington City post-office; three and a half years to build the Philadelphia mint, where the conditions were exceptionally favorable; six years to build the New York post-office, and the Chicago post-office, authorized about six years ago, is still incomplete.

It would seem that the time had come to take some decisive step toward making better and ampler provision to meet the necessities of the great Executive Departments of the Government. Entire relief will not be secured by the passage of the measure before the Senate, but that very considerable relief will be afforded is manifest. Competent architects have advised the committee that the three Departments contemplated by the present bill may be well accommodated for the present, and for a reasonable time in the future at least, in the same building.

The committee is of the opinion that no more suitable dedication of block 167 could be made than is proposed in the pending bill, bringing into close communion with each other those Departments of the Government most closely allied.

It may be well to remember that in providing for the actual needs of the Government service in the accompanying bill the building proposed is in entire harmony with the plans of the park commission for the permanent improvement of Washington, as is shown by a letter from Senator McMillan, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, which is appended to this report. It should be borne in mind, however, that the building to be erected is not to be constructed for the purpose of promoting such plans or committing the Government to them in any measure. The committee merely adverts to the fact that in acquiring the site proposed to meet the immediate and imperative necessities of the public service the property acquired will be in harmony with and not contrary to the plans mentioned, and that should such plans be approved in the future nothing will have been done under the pending bill which will conflict with or impair them in any respect.

The rapid growth of the country has naturally greatly increased the necessity for additional accommodations for the transaction of the public business in Washington. This is perfectly manifest to everyone who has had to do with public affairs. Efficiency and economy require that the facilities should be at all times adequate. A prudent and successful business concern keeps pace with its expanding necessities, but the Government has pursued a contrary policy, and almost every Department in Washington is greatly crowded, and private property is occupied and has been occupied for many years in various portions of the city to accommodate the overflow.

If the Government were to spend a reasonable amount annually to provide for the increasing and reasonable requirements of its own business, the amount would seem to be comparatively small, but when the necessities are allowed to accumulate, the appropriations when finally made seem to be unnecessarily large. Delay in making needed improvements is not wise economy. They must ultimately be made, and when made the Government must pay the enhanced cost of property required therefor.

It is poor policy for the Government to pay tribute to the owners of private property for the accommodation of its business—property which is poorly suited to the speedy and economical dispatch of the public business.

The committee is of the opinion that buildings erected in Washington for the accommodation of the executive business of the country should be so built as to stand for many years to come. They should be of such architecture and of such material as will be in entire harmony with the strength and dignity of the nation. There will be comparatively few such buildings, and they should be made to reflect credit upon the country and be objects of admiration to the people and physical manifestations of the country's progress and grandeur to those from abroad who may visit the national capital.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., February 4, 1902.

SIR: Your letter of the 31st ultimo asks me, on behalf of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, for any information I may be able to give it "as to the necessity of additional accommodations for the Department of Justice and as to the advisability of accommodating the Department in a building to be devoted to the chief executive offices, the Department of State, and the Department of Justice, the same to be erected upon block 167, Washington, D. C.," and I reply to the two points in the order given:

First. As to the necessity for additional accommodations. As to this, I think nothing more is required than has already been said, unless I say, in addition to what was presented to Congress at the time the original bill for the erection of a new building was under consideration, that at the time temporary quarters were provided for the Department of Justice and its old building torn down it was supposed that the erection of a new building would be begun within a reasonable period. Since then, however, it was found necessary to relieve the crowded condition of the temporary quarters by renting the building adjoining that occupied by the Department on K street NW., known as 1000 Vermont avenue, as well as a suite of rooms in the Bond Building. With these additions the quarters now occupied by the Department will probably be sufficient to accommodate it until the proposed new building can be erected.

Second. As to the advisability of accommodating the Department in a building to be occupied by the chief executive offices, the Department of State, and the Department of Justice, to be erected upon block 16., I say that it would greatly facilitate the transaction of public business to have the Department of Justice so close to the executive offices and the Department of State, with both of which it has occasion to communicate frequently. The proposed site is a convenient of access to the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, with which the Department of Justice is also obliged to be in constant communication, as that in which the site of the former Department building is located on the east side of Lafayette Square. It seems evident, also, that it should be cheaper to erect one building of the proper character in which to house these three Departments than to build three buildings of the same character, though smaller, to accommodate them separately.

Respectfully,

P. C. KNOX, Attorney-General.

Hon. CHARLES W. FAIRBANKS,
Chairman Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, United States Senate.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 19, 1902.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of the 18th instant, I have the honor to advise you that since the beginning of the Spanish-American war we have had a temporary force which now consists of about 600 persons, of which only about 40 belong to the insular division, the remainder being distributed elsewhere in the Secretary's Office and among the various bureaus of the Department, excepting the office of the Chief of Engineers and the Record and Pension Office. Our annual estimates for the ensuing fiscal year contemplate the continuation of this force, and it is not believed that it will be practicable for a long while to come to decrease this number materially.

This increase in the force necessitated the renting of three buildings outside of the State, War, and Navy Department building—to wit, the Lemon Building, New York avenue, between Seventeenth and Eighteenth streets; premises No. 532 Seventeenth street, for the depot quartermaster's office and others, and the premises known as No. 1744 G street, for the Ordnance Department and others. In addition we have for a number of years rented for the Record and Pension Office premises Nos. 610 Seventeenth street and 1712 G street, and 1814 G street for the Army Dispensary.

The space now allotted to the War Department in the State, War, and Navy Department building is crowded to an extent that is believed to be detrimental to the health of the employees and is known to be unfavorable for administrative purposes. For a long time we have been compelled to use portions of the corridors on nearly every floor from basement to garret, not only for the storage of records and publications, but as well for the use of clerks. If provision should be made for the State Department in the new Executive, State, and Justice building, and assuming that the space thereby vacated in the State, War, and Navy Department building would be divided between the War and Navy Departments in proportion to the numbers of their respective forces, it would enable the War Department to give up some of its rented buildings and relieve its present overcrowded condition in that building.

Very respectfully,

ELIHU ROOT, Secretary of War.

Hon. CHARLES W. FAIRBANKS,
United States Senate.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, February 20, 1902.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of February 18, I have to state that the Navy Department and Marine Corps now pay $9,960 per annum for quarters outside of the State, War, and Navy Department building.

Since the rooms now occupied by the Navy Department in this building were assigned to it the number of officers, clerks, draftsmen, etc., has been doubled, the number employed when assigned being 276 and the number employed at the present time 550. The recapitulation of reports from various bureaus as to the necessity for providing additional room shows that there is required for—

	Square feet.
Officers and clerks	28,370
Draftsmen	5,500
Storeroom	4,400
Blue-printers	1,400

Making a total of 39,770 square feet of additional space.

The Department has appointed a board to thoroughly look into this subject, and I will take pleasure in sending you the result of this board's finding as soon as prepared.

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG,
Secretary.

Hon. CHARLES W. FAIRBANKS, Washington, D. C.

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., February 22, 1902.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have read the substitute bill which you propose to report, authorizing the construction of a building for the Executive offices, the Department of State, and the Department of Justice on the side immediately west of Lafayette Square.

In response to your request for a statement it gives me pleasure to say that the proposed site is entirely in harmony with the plans that have been reported from the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia for the improvement of the park system of Washington. Further, the construction of a building on the site proposed has many advantages, not only because of the proximity of the site to the other executive buildings, but also because the location will provide for an adequate setting for the building and will be one more step in the development of a group of executive buildings so placed that each will enhance the dignity of the others.

The design for the proposed new building, as prepared by Mr. George B. Post, of New York, is said by Mr. Charles F. McKim, a member of the park commission and the president of the American Institute of Architects, to represent in a remarkable degree those qualities of plan and façade which should characterize our Government architecture.

In conclusion, I know of no one thing that will advance the proposed improvement of Washington to a greater extent than will the construction of such a building as has been planned on the site selected.

Very truly, yours,

JAMES MCMILLAN.

Hon. CHARLES W. FAIRBANKS,
Chairman Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds,
United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR.

Since the preparation of the foregoing report, the Department of Commerce and Labor has been created and is now occupying temporary quarters. This Department is an important one, and it is very essential that adequate preparations should be made, and at an early date, for its accommodation. Its needs have been fully set forth by the Secretary in a communication to the Secretary of the Treasury, under date of February 23, 1903, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR,
Washington, February 23, 1903.

SIR: I have the honor to request that the following estimate for the construction of a suitable building for the Department of Commerce and Labor be transmitted to Congress:

At the beginning of the coming fiscal year the Department of Commerce and Labor will consist of twelve organizations, transferred to it from other branches of the public service, two new bureaus, and the office proper of the Secretary—in all, fifteen organized offices.

These offices will be housed, under present arrangements, in ten or more different buildings. The Census Office is on B street, between First and Second streets NW.; the Coast and Geodetic Survey is on New Jersey avenue, near B street SE.; the Bureau of Foreign Commerce is in the State, War, and Navy building. Between these limits of about a mile and a half east and west and about one-third of a mile north and south are distributed the remaining organizations of the Department.

The Light-House Board and the Bureau of Navigation are at 719–721 Thirteenth street NW.; the National Bureau of Standards on New Jersey avenue, near B street SE.; the Immigration Bureau, the Steamboat-Inspection Service, and the Alaska Seal and Salmon Fisheries in the Treasury building; the Commission of Fish and Fisheries at Sixth and B streets SW.; the Department of Labor at Fifteenth street and New York avenue NW.; and the Bureau of Statistics at 1333 F street NW. Quarters for the office of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor and for the new Bureaus of Manufactures and Corporations have not yet been chosen. The delay, inconvenience, and expense in the transaction of daily business by so scattered an organization will be evident at once both to Congress and to the commercial and industrial interests of the country.

The annual rent during the current fiscal year for only four of these organizations (Department of Labor, Census Office, Bureau of Statistics, and Light-House Board) amounts to $44,544. Rented quarters are now provided, or soon must be provided, for nine of the remaining organizations in the Department of Commerce and Labor.

On July 1 the Department of Commerce and Labor will employ in the city of Washington about 1,300 men and women. The precise number can not be stated until the new bureaus have been organized.

The present needs of the new Department have been briefly mentioned in order to show the importance of early action by Congress to supply them. In any project for the building which Congress may approve it is earnestly recommended that provision be made for the future growth of the Department, which will accompany the development of the commerce and industry of the United States.

The site to be secured should not only suffice for the structure required to house under one roof the branches of the public service to be assembled in July under the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, but should be ample for extensions of the edifice from time to time, in harmony with original plans, and with requirements of the increasing artistic sense of the people. The building for the Department of Commerce and Labor at the national capital, it is suggested, should be so planned in advance as to be not inferior in convenience or beauty to the structures which commercial and financial institutions in the great centers of American trade are erecting for the transaction of their daily business.

It should be designed on a scale large enough to provide for the reasonable growth for some years to come of the various branches of the public service, comprising at the outset the Department, and to supply quarters for such other branches of the service as by creation or transfer may hereafter be brought under its jurisdiction.

It should have at least one hall suitable for conferences or congresses, international or national, which, by invitation of the Government of the United States, have met in this country in the past, and doubtless hereafter will assemble frequently at Washington. To secure light and ventilation inner courts open to the sky are necessary. The edifice should be fireproof.

Such a Department building is needed to meet the requirements of progressive business methods. It is needed to give adequate expression to the country's advance in the art of architecture. It is a proper part of any general project to render more beautiful the national capital. It is in the line, furthermore, of true economy.

The Treasury building cost $7,250,540, but it is already inadequate for the needs of that Department, which this year, according to the estimates, will spend $18,894 in rents for outside offices. The State, War, and Navy building cost $10,071,916, but the Departments it houses will this year spend $25,200 for rented offices, and more offices must be secured for the coming fiscal year. The Patent Office cost $3,652,705, but this year the Interior Department will be required to spend $80,680 for rented buildings (including $26,680 for the Census Office, transferred to the Department of Commerce and Labor). The new post-office cost $3,306,490, but from the beginning was inadequate for the Post-Office Department, which this year will spend $36,406 for rented offices.

Probably none of the Department buildings mentioned could be enlarged without a departure from original plans so radical as to destroy its symmetry and thus to forbid such enlargement. Had the growth of the business of the country and of these Departments been foreseen, doubtless at the outset larger sites and different plans would have been provided. On the other hand, in the case of the Capitol, built and extended for $17,071,849, increased accommodations in consonance with original plans at a cost of about $6,000,000 are now proposed. In the case of the Library of Congress, recently completed at a cost of $6,920,081, such extensions are also possible.

I earnestly recommend, therefore, that Congress provide for the construction of a building for the Department of Commerce and Labor to cost, exclusive of the site, the sum of $7,000,000.

Very respectfully,

GEO. B. CORTELYOU,
Secretary.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

The Report of the Attorney-General for the year ending June 30, 1903, sets forth the urgent necessity of providing a new building for the Department of Justice, as follows:

"NEW DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

"During the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress a bill was introduced in the Senate on January 7, 1902 (S. 2462), 'to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection thereon of a public building to be used for a Department of State and a Department of Justice,' which was reported back from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, April 12, 1902, but no further action was taken upon it.

"By 'An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings,' etc., approved June 6, 1902, section 23, the act approved March 3, 1899, to provide for the erection of a building for the Department of Justice was repealed and the Attorney-General directed to cover into the Treasury of the United States the balance of the appropriation carried in that act and unexpended.

"The Department has been occupying rented quarters since 1899, when its building on Pennsylvania avenue was condemned and torn down.

"During the past year it became necessary to rent an additional building, and the Department now has its official force distributed in seven buildings, including the quarters occupied by the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission and the space in the Court of Claims building occupied by the library. The total rental now paid by the Department is $25,200 per annum.

"The library of the Department is several squares distant from the main offices. Much inconvenience and annoyance are experienced owing to the lack of room and facilities for proper arrangement of the various offices.

"The buildings are not fireproof. There is not a vault in any of the buildings occupied by the Department, and all office records, documents, papers, and books are exposed to the ravages of a fire. Under the supervision of the chief engineer of the fire department additional appliances for extinguishing fires have been installed, and all possible precautions are being taken to protect the buildings and their contents."

It is obvious that the growth of the business of the great Executive Departments will make additional buildings necessary at no distant day. In the course of time, no doubt, each will require a separate building. For the present, however, the requirements of the three Departments most urgently in need of additional accommodations will be met by the construction of the building contemplated by the pending bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have no disposition to delay a vote on this bill, although I am very strongly opposed to many of its features. I sympathize, Mr. President, very strongly with the view that has been so well expressed to-day in this debate, that before we engage in lavish expenditure for public buildings for Cabinet officers or other officials of the Government we ought to take care of our own membership. I have held to that view every day from the time that I occupied an apartment in the so-called "Senate Annex," and I really believe it would be the part of wisdom for the Senate to stop appropriating money for public buildings until that want is supplied. Whether it should be done by the erection of an independent building as an offset to the building the House of Representatives is to erect or by an enlargement of this Capitol, according to the plans that have been drawn, I am not prepared to say; but that it ought to be done goes without the saying.

Mr. President, I have strong convictions in certain other directions, and one is that we ought to commence (notwithstanding the objection which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] so strongly urged) the erection of buildings, if we are to erect them, on the south side of the Avenue, and that we ought to acquire either in bulk or by piecemeal that triangle between Pennsylvania avenue and the Mall.

The Senator from Minnesota has painted a picture of the conditions that existed in the city of Washington a long time ago. It was a time when no adequate provisions were made to prevent overflow from the Potomac River, and Pennsylvania avenue was sometimes flooded. I have been here for twenty years and have not at any time wet my feet on Pennsylvania avenue except in rain storms. The time the Senator from Minnesota alluded to was when there was no drainage system in the city of Washington. We are now spending hundreds of thousands of dollars for the purpose of securing a proper sewerage system, which is almost completed. Under existing conditions there is no very serious objection to placing buildings on the south side of Pennsylvania avenue. The most beautiful part of the city of Boston, covering miles, was reclaimed from the ocean, and great structures are placed there upon filled ground.

To my mind it is inconsequential to talk about the small amount of money that will be required to make foundations on the south side of Pennsylvania avenue. Of course it will cost something, but that cost is not sufficient to deter any of us from voting to redeem Pennsylvania avenue from the unsightly condition and undesirable environments that are there to be found at the present time. The Southern Railway has erected its great building on the south side of Pennsylvania avenue. We have our magnificent Post-Office building there, and we are about erecting a municipal building at a cost, I think, of nearly $2,000,000 upon that avenue I see no reason why we should not, for the purpose of beautifying this city, take the grounds south of that magnificent avenue as sites for the public buildings which are to be erected during the next twenty or twenty-five years.

Mr. President, we are confronted at the present time in our legislation with some very serious problems so far as the expenditure of money is concerned. We are a rich government; we have to-day a large balance in the Treasury of the United States, and we have been proceeding heretofore upon the assumption, I take it, that we would always have a large balance to our credit. That may not be so in the near future. We have already provided for the construction of a building for the House of Representatives—a very costly structure; we have provided for the construction of a municipal building; we have provided for the construction of a building for the Department of Agriculture and for another building for the National Museum. We have made large contributions from the funds of the Government and from the funds of the District of Columbia toward the construction of a magnificent union station, which is to be a great ornament to the capital of this country.

We have many other projects pressing upon us at the present time—high-pressure fire protection, hospital buildings, and many other measures of expenditure—the friends of which are clamorous for the appropriation of very large sums of money, which we shall have to make in the near future. I am not at all sure, Mr. President, that with the money which we have already appropriated and the money we shall have to appropriate during the next two or three years we ought not to call a halt in the construction of any building in the city of Washington that we can get along without for the next few years.

Mr. President, I turn my attention for a moment to the pending bill. I have objections to it. Those objections I will state, not for the purpose of occupying a single moment of unnecessary time, but to put myself right on the record.

I do not believe that we ought to erect a composite building, a building for three Departments of the Government. We have one building of that kind now, and there has been contention, as I understand, from the day it was erected, so far as the division of room is concerned. If there is an urgent demand for a building for the Department of Justice, let us construct a building for that Department. If there is an urgent demand for a building for the new Department of Commerce and Labor, which I do not think is an urgent matter, let us in due time construct a building for that Department. If there is necessity for a building for the State Department, which I do not think exists, let us at the proper time construct a building for that Department.

So, Mr. President, when the stage is reached where I can offer amendments to this bill I propose to offer two amendments. One is that this commission shall select ground on the south side of Pennsylvania avenue for the building in contemplation, and the other will be that we provide, if we are to provide any building, simply for a structure for the Department of Justice.

If those amendments shall be voted down, then my work will have come to naught, but I shall at least have put myself on record in favor of building on the south side of Pennsylvania avenue and not invade that beautiful part of the city which is already improved by fine buildings, and that we ought to provide for a building for one Department instead of a composite building for three Departments.

Mr. President, there is a great deal of agitation about beautifying this city. If it has any foundation in fact, let us commence to do it now.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] very clearly and earnestly pointed us to the condition at the foot of this Capitol, on the north side of the Avenue. Why, Mr. President, I have been of the opinion for a great many years that the Government ought to take hold of that matter and purchase the north side of the Avenue from First to Third or Fourth or Sixth street; and I am gratified to be able to believe that a private citizen has in contemplation the purchase of those old ramshackle buildings that are a disgrace and a peril to the health of the city and an eyesore to every citizen of the Republic who comes to the capital. The erection of a fine building on the site of those old structures I hope is to come in the near future, and thus the improvements which the Government might wisely have made will be made by an enterprising citizen of the District of Columbia.

Mr. President, I have an opinion that we ought to remove the Supreme Court from this building, and that by an enlargement of the building we should provide adequate accommodations for every member of the Senate. I trust that that very desirable result may be secured in the near future. I know that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS] will say, and with propriety, that no such proposition is before the Senate at the present time; and yet I trust that, either through the instrumentality of his committee or some other committee of this body, we may be permitted to vote upon that proposition before many years and before some great fatality shall overtake a portion of our membership in consequence of occupying a building that has been declared unsafe.

With these observations, Mr. President, I am prepared to vote upon this bill. If it is thought desirable to pass it, it ought not to be passed in its present form. If a majority of the Senate shall see fit to vote for the amendment that I shall offer, placing this building on the south side of the Avenue, it will be a personal gratification to me as the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, earnestly desirous to do everything in my power to beautify Washington and to remove from this city some of the unsightly structures that are, in my opinion, a reproach to the Congress of the United States and a reproach to this magnificent capital of this great and rich nation.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I agree with what the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has said. I agree heartily with him in his objections to putting up a building and gathering two or three different Departments in it. What little interests I have are in the immediate vicinity of the proposed location, and they would be benefited by such a structure. I wish they were larger; but they are not large enough to tempt me to vote against what I believe to be for the best public interest.

With this structure, five or six of the Departments would be clustered about the White House—the Treasury east of it, the War and Navy Departments west of it, and these three Departments on the square north of the War Department. That square is a very valuable one, and I do not think it is good sense or good judgment to take it. It is too valuable to be put to any use that will mar that location; it is altogether too valuable for any cheap structure, for anything but the very best.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Would the Senator regard its use for apartment buildings as preferable to this?

Mr. PROCTOR. I think it is altogether too valuable and too expensive for the use of an apartment building.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I will say to the Senator that one of the property holders advised me a short time ago that within six months speculators have attempted to get a location for an apartment building upon that very block.

Mr. PROCTOR. That is very natural, Mr. President. It is very probable that the owner of the real estate was anxious to stimulate the committee to go on with this project, when of course he could get a much better price for his property than he could from any promoter of an apartment house.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If the Senator is familiar with the record he will know that a stimulus was not required, because long before that time this bill was brought to the attention of the Senate with a unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President——

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If the Senator will allow me just a word, as I do not want to take the floor again——

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The Senator spoke about the number of Departments that will be clustered about this square—the War and the Navy Departments in the building now occupied. Does not the Senator realize that that building will be occupied by either one or the other of those Departments, either wholly by the War or by the Navy Department, and the building now under contemplation will ultimately be occupied not by three Departments, but by one Department?

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, for one I am opposed to massing all the Executive Departments around the Executive Mansion. As I said, this measure would place six Departments there. Then there would be left the three squares fronting on Lafayette Square. The legitimate result of the adoption of this measure would be to take those three squares for the three remaining Executive Departments, one between Sixteenth street and Connecticut avenue; one between Sixteenth street and Vermont avenue, where the Arlington is located, and one east of the square, where the opera house is located. That would just provide for all the Executive Departments, and I think it is a legitimate result to be expected from the passage of this measure.

What should we have in the shape of a city then? We should have a town with two great ends—the executive at one end, and, a mile and a quarter away, the legislative branch at this end, and a most wretched middle separating them. I am afraid, Mr. President, with that massing of the Executive Departments the executive end would be the heaviest, and this end would tip over in the scale.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. PROCTOR. I do.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If I may have the Senator's attention for a moment, I wish to say that just exactly what the Senator fears with reference to the grouping of the Executive Departments is what has been recommended by the most eminent architects of the country.

The committee says in its report that this measure is not for the purpose of promoting those plans; it calls attention simply to the fact that it is not in opposition to them. What the committee contemplates does not reach beyond the construction of a building upon one of these blocks.

Mr. PROCTOR. Well, Mr. President, I am neither eminent nor a landscape gardener, but I try to apply what little common sense I have to the decision of this question; and I think it would be a very unwise step to locate at this time any further Department buildings in that locality. I think we have been hurried here in these last days of the session. We are all anxious to get away, and it is, to my mind, the part of wisdom to let this measure rest over until another session. I hope we shall have more light, and I believe we may have different views upon it then.

Mr. GORMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me to make a single observation?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS] called attention to the fact that eminent architects—and the Senator, I take it, refers to the so-called "park commission"—had recommended the grouping of these buildings around the Executive Mansion. The Senator will remember that they did suggest that block 167, which is one of the three blocks named in this bill, might properly be utilized for that purpose, but they likewise added the suggestion that the south side of Pennsylvania avenue would be equally as desirable for this purpose.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, in the consideration of a question so important as this, not only for the convenience of the public offices, but looking to the beauty of the city, I regret exceedingly, and it is somewhat embarrassing, that we have to discuss it in the form in which it is presented. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds having reported this bill as their best judgment as to what ought to be done in the premises, have provided in the bill for a commission to consist of the Secretary of State, the Attorney-General, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, the President pro tempore of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate, and the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives.

I observe that the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS] seemed to be laboring under the impression that it was a matter in which his committee ought to be sustained, and compared the treatment of that committee to another great committee of this body—the Committee on Appropriations. I want to say to the Senator that so far at least as I am concerned—and I have no doubt that it is so universally—it is not at all a question between the committees of this body; and for one I express the opinion that it is unfortunate that the bill should be so framed that we could not altogether divorce the personnel from the subject itself. But notwithstanding that, and believing as I do that in fact there is not a gentleman who is named on this commission who will have any other view of it or attribute to any of us who oppose the proposition any other motive than that which I have stated, first, is it a proper location for a public building, and second, can such a building be constructed and the property acquired with regard to due economy?

Mr. President, the whole idea in laying out the city of Washington was that no public buildings should be located north of G street in this city on the high ground spoken of by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. None has been so constructed, except by the unfortunate act which Congress passed permitting the Carnegie Library to be located upon a public square, thereby obstructing the view down three or four of the great avenues of this city. With that exception all are south of G street.

It is unquestionably a fact that the promoters—I mean by that the architects, the landscape gardeners, and the property owners—have been at work for years past trying to induce Congress to select the two squares on either side of the square in front of the President's House—that is to say, the square upon which the Riggs Bank is located and square 167, west of Lafayette Park.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. GORMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Have not those same architects also been eager to have the Government acquire the ground south of Pennsylvania avenue to which I understand the Senator is directing his attention?

Mr. GORMAN. That is true, Mr. President, yet the fact remains that it will be utterly impossible for us to select and acquire both squares at this time, or within any reasonable time in the future. Therefore the question, and the only question—not one as between committees and the personnel of this commission—is which of the two propositions we should begin with, whether south of the Avenue or north of the Avenue.

If the Senator will go back and look at the old records, the correspondence, and the debates in Congress, he will find that the two squares north of the Avenue that are proposed to be taken now were specially designated as the choice residence sites of the District. Upon those two squares have been constructed, or were constructed in the early days, residences that are historic. They have been owned and kept in the families of the original owners, and they are most earnestly opposed to parting with their property.

There are others who have been more fortunate in the affairs of the world, who within the last ten or fifteen years have acquired property elsewhere for their residences in the more fashionable part of the city, as the fashion seems to have moved to the Northwest, who have been anxious to sell those squares, and to sell them to the Government at a very high price.

We began with the square on which the Riggs Bank is located, and the same influences and the same reasons that are now given induced Congress, after the failure of the Freedmen's Bank, to take that building, so that we might acquire a foothold in that square, with a view of taking the entire square at a tremendous cost—$20 a square foot, I believe—for the property, which would make the cost of that entire square two and a half million dollars, if we were to acquire it.

Then, for the purpose of relieving the Corcoran Art Gallery, whose accommodations were insufficient for them, came the proposition that we acquire a corner of the square west of Lafayette Park, which is now proposed to be taken at $18 a square foot. Under condemnation proceedings in this city that will be about what we will pay for that square if it is acquired. That will amount, in round numbers, to $2,000,000 for the square alone. If the Riggs Bank square is taken, at least as much, and possibly half a million dollars in addition, will be required, because the buildings on that square are very valuable.

You can take the same amount of money down on Pennsylvania avenue, beginning with the square immediately east of the Treasury Department, or any other square on the line between the Botanic Gardens and Fifteenth street, and acquire at least three times as much ground for the same money, and at the same time beautify the city.

So, upon the score of economy, as well as of convenience and beauty, Pennsylvania avenue is the place to begin, in my judgment; because, as has been well said by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], if you acquire the square west of Lafayette Square now, the one north of the Treasury Department must come hereafter, or else you will have a condition of affairs there as unsightly as is the outlook from the east front of this Capitol.

I supposed when we acquired the site for the Congressional Library southeast of the Capitol—and it was the conviction and statement at that time of nearly everybody who discussed it—that under the lead of that very distinguished Senator from Vermont, Mr. Morrill, who so long presided over the committee of which the Senator from Indiana is now chairman, we would acquire the square opposite the Library building and immediately in front of the Senate Chamber for the Supreme Court, and then the plans for public buildings would place them down on the Mall, along the line of Pennsylvania avenue.

We began that by acquiring sufficient ground for the Post-Office Department, and later on for the District municipal building, but there was no system about it. We acquired the squares with streets running not at right angles with Pennsylvania avenue, and, therefore, the building that has been constructed for the Post-Office Department does not look well on the Avenue.

For that reason the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is under the impression, after looking at the old maps, that to secure proper foundations was a matter of great inconvenience, trouble, and expense in that locality. So it is, Mr. President, to some extent; but such difficulties will occur in all cities and in all communities.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. GORMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator know how much we paid a square foot for that ground?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. How much?

Mr. GORMAN. We bought that entire square for about $600,000.

Mr. NELSON. How much per foot did we pay for it?

Mr. GORMAN. Without being entirely accurate, my impression is that we paid for it about $8 per square foot.

Mr. NELSON. I have understood it was $9 a square foot.

Mr. GORMAN. Well, possibly nine.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will bear with me, is it not a fact that that building has been flooded in the basement since it was constructed; that the water has come into the basement?

Mr. GORMAN. I have no knowledge of that, Mr. President; but when I came here as a boy through the whole of the territory running from the foot of the Monument through to the Eastern Branch was a canal, constructed by the Government of the United States or the city of Washington at that time, and running in front of the Capitol, on Third street, where the arch still remains. It was a very comfortable little stream called the "Tiber," heading out beyond the Government Printing Office.

Mr. HOAR. The name of the stream which the Senator calls the Tiber was Goose Creek.

Mr. GORMAN. That was before my time. I think the Senator has in mind another stream, running north and south.

But this entire valley, up to the beginning of 1861 or 1862, was a very unsightly affair, and General Washington and those who had laid out the city of Washington all anticipated that the great structures of the Government would be in front of the Capitol on this high ground. But the high price of land held by the Carrolls and General Washington and others, who held all this property to the eastward, compelled the construction of private buildings in the west and down on Pennsylvania avenue, reaching out to Georgetown, which in the beginning was the great city of the District.

Then the White House was located on its present site, and finally the other buildings were built, all going in that direction. The same rule applies here that applies in every city in the course of its construction. If it is possible to do so, the whole trend is to the northwest and not to the east. So the conditions with respect to the land and the possibility of erecting buildings there have all been overcome in the matter I have recited. There can be no trouble. It is true that in the past we have had floods that passed through this valley before the Potomac River was improved. That condition has passed away. The construction of a building on the Avenue now is a matter of no concern. Private individuals do not hesitate to construct them there. The great Southern Railroad, with its engineers, did not hesitate to select a point at the corner of Thirteenth and Pennsylvania avenue and put up a very fine structure. There has been no trouble about that foundation or any in the vicinity, except that as a matter of precaution they have used piles and cement, as they do now everywhere when the ground is low.

But if the foundation does add to the cost of construction of the building, it is not one-tenth of the additional cost you would have to pay for land upon high ground. You gain nothing whatever by going to the north, while on the other hand you incur additional expense and you destroy the beauty of the town, or, rather, you do not add to the beauty of the town to the extent that you could by removing these unsightly structures down on Pennsylvania avenue.

I want to say again to the Senator from Indiana that I should be delighted to be able to follow him and his committee in their recommendations. Let them have entire charge of the selection of a square if they will agree to select it between Third street and Fifteenth street.

There is no desire on my part or on the part of anybody else with whom I have talked to take it from their hands; but this is a matter as to which each of us must determine what is best, looking to the future of this great city, and I trust that the Senator and his committee after this discussion will agree, as we are now informed by the Senator from Vermont that we are in the closing hours of the session, that the bill may go back to his committee or that he will remodel it now on the floor and permit us to have these structures made—not one, but two or three, if it be necessary, on this avenue front.

I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I have had the same experience that other Senators have had, that a building intended and required by law to accommodate three Departments has always produced trouble.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is the Post-Office building.

Mr. GORMAN. Take the Post-Office building down on the Avenue. We spent weeks listening to the contentions of the different persons who were to occupy the building. It was so with the State, War, and Navy building and so with every one we have had to deal with.

I think in addition, that any building you might construct in any one of these squares will not, at the time of its completion, four or five years hence, be more than sufficient for a single one of these Departments, particularly this new Department, which has been described by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. I believe that if the Senator from Indiana, if he will pardon the expression, will take a broader view and remodel his bill and provide for the acquirement of a sufficient number of squares of ground for the three Departments, he will render a great service and end all controversy hereafter as to the sites for public buildings.

I remember perfectly the great debate in the Senate when the new part of the Capitol was being constructed. The distinguished Senator from Illinois, Judge Douglas, who was then a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, had a great view of taking all the property extending from here to where the Baltimore and Ohio depot is, and including the land on which are the very houses described by the Senator from Colorado, running to Third street west, and then all the property on the south side of the Avenue to Fifteenth street. But the condition of the Treasury was not such that that great scheme, which ought to have been carried out and which it is manifest to everybody to-day was most desirable, could be carried out. The construction of this building was going on, costing millions and millions.

Now, we have reached a point where a general system should be determined upon, and I should be delighted to cooperate with the distinguished Senator from Indiana in making it broad enough and fixing the policy so that we shall not have any controversy hereafter about this square or that lot when it is necessary to acquire property for a public building. Above all things, I want to see some provision made so that we shall not in the future despoil the city as we have in the matter of the Carnegie Library at K street, New York avenue, and all the other avenues that center at that square, or as we did in Judiciary Square, so well described by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. He will, in my judgment, render a very, very great service if he will only agree to take it up during the recess, if we are to adjourn, as the intimation comes now, without much further delay, for some reason unknown to me, and bring the matter up when we come here, if it is in December, and let us determine it on these broad lines.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I should like to have read from the desk a brief editorial from the Washington Post of February 24, 1904, which I think discusses this matter as intelligently as it has been discussed by any newspaper or individual.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Washington Post, February 24, 1904.]

AS TO THE NEW PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

There are many reasons why Congress should reject the proposition contained in Senate bill No. 1508. This proposition involves the condemnation of several blocks north of Pennsylvania avenue and immediately adjacent to Lafayette Park for the purpose of erecting thereon a number of much-needed public buildings. The arguments against this plan are so potent as to call for little if any elaboration, but it may be well to point out a few of the more obvious objections, which speak for themselves.

In the first place, the areas in question are already handsomely improved, in some instances very handsomely, indeed, so that their acquisition by the Government would entail an enormous outlay of the people's money.

In the next place, this outlay can not be defended, even on the ground of expediency, since there is abundant space already owned by the nation and quite as conveniently located. Why, then, expend millions to obtain building sites north of the Avenue, when equally available sites south of the Avenue can be utilized without cost other than that of the actual construction of the new offices? It would seem, indeed, and leaving the question of expense entirely aside, that to destroy a great number of useful and ornamental structures, some of them very interesting historical landmarks, for the purpose of replacing them with Government buildings which might be placed elsewhere with much better results, will be unpardonable in every sense. The whole south side of Pennsylvania avenue, for example, from the Capitol to the Treasury is an eyesore. If we are to condemn private property anywhere, we should by all means select localities in dire need of beautification, especially where the result will be quite as satisfactory in a purely practical sense.

It has always hitherto been understood that the south side of the Avenue would eventually be acquired by the Government, cleared of the hideous and ramshackle buildings which now occupy it for the most part, and merged in the general park scheme of which the Mall is an important but somewhat inaccessible feature. With a row of public offices next to the majestic thoroughfare, and with the park brought up to the line thus formed, the beauty of Washington would be wonderfully enhanced and without the smallest sacrifice of utility. To leave this forlorn neighborhood as it is, however, and to destroy blocks of private buildings north of the Avenue and west of Fifteenth street would be to accomplish a minimum of adornment at a maximum of expense, and at the same time to secure no superiority in the matter of convenience. One locality sadly needs improvement. The other is ornamental enough as things already are. Why, then, spend millions unnecessarily, and this while neglecting an opportunity to remove a spot of ugliness—a reproach to the capital and the nation?

It seems to us that there can hardly be two opinions upon this point. Every consideration urges the improvement of the south side of the Avenue and the protection of the north side from undesirable innovations.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, I should like to have the first paragraph read again.

The Secretary read as follows:

There are many reasons why Congress should reject the proposition contained in Senate bill No. 1508. This proposition involves the condemnation of several blocks north of Pennsylvania avenue and immediately adjacent to Lafayette Park for the purpose of erecting thereon a number of much-needed public buildings.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. That is sufficient. The statement made is inaccurate. I do not have frequent occasion to disagree with so carefully an edited paper as the Washington Post. It is very accurate and conservative, as a rule, in its statements. But the statement just read, upon which the editorial is based, is not entirely founded in fact. The bill contemplates the purchase of but one block, the erection of but one building.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, while it is true, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS] says, that the bill contemplates but one block, as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] said very pointedly, it indicates a plan that we all know has been bruited about for a long time, that all of the buildings should be put about that square, and when we have located this important one there, then there will be a demand to put the others there, and so it will go. I shall regard it as substantially a declaration that the Senate want to do that thing if they vote for this bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Ought not that to be done if one building is to be erected there?

Mr. TELLER. There will be great force, anyway, in saying after that building is put there that logically and architecturally, etc., you must put the other buildings around there.

I did not allude to what the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] did, although it was in my mind, as I forgot it. I mean the building of the Carnegie Library on Massachusetts avenue. That avenue is a magnificent one, and as it was laid out it was expected to be one of the fine avenues of this city. There was a very handsome little park, which was a part of the plans, where certain streets came together; and when I first remember this city, but long before I came here, there was a market there. When Mr. Shepherd undertook to beautify this city there was a great effort made to get that market removed. It had no legal right there. Finally Shepherd pulled it down one night with a good deal of trouble, with an unusual degree of trouble, I may say, for I believe one man was killed. But it was cleared off, and it was made a park under the original plan.

Now, when the Carnegie gift came to this city it involved the securing of a place to put the building, and Congress deliberately violated all rules of propriety, so far as the original plan was concerned, by determining to put it in that square. I remember very well that I made a very vigorous protest against it. It has been an eyesore to everybody with whom I have discussed it ever since. Plenty of men in this city have said to me that they wish now that the library had never been built. Yet a proper site involved the payment of probably $125,000 or $150,000. The neighborhood was all right. We could have bought a place and put the library there and kept it from Mount Vernon Square, and the cost would not have been very large. I do not believe anybody who will stand up at one end of the avenue and look down it, who has any idea of beauty, will not feel that it was an exceedingly small thing that we did when we failed to buy a lot and keep the library off that square and put it on a lot facing the avenue or some other street.

If we are going on in the way in which we have been going on, we will never have this city built up on any correct plan. While I want adequate buildings for the Departments of the Government, I would rather have the Government pay rent for a few years, and I believe it would be better, more consistent with the character of the Government, to pay it, and wait and put its buildings where they ought to be and where they will beautify and enrich this city. It is not from any objections I have to the character of the building proposed that I make these suggestions. It is to the place where it is to be put. I would not economize in these buildings. I would build fine buildings, if I build any. I would not build a cheap building like the Pension Office. But I would not invade public squares nor would I destroy the beauty of the streets for the sake of saving expense, as we did in the library case.

My experience has been that we talk day after day about beautifying this city, and brag about it, and yet do nothing toward accomplishing it, and go along in the way we have been going on, putting up one building in one place and then another in another; and later, when our children or grandchildren come after us, who will have better æsthetic taste than we have or will have more pride in the country in which they live than we have, they will want to tear down those buildings and get rid of them, and it will be too late then.

The time to do it is right now, and the Government will not suffer one particle if it pays the rent for the present year. There is not a Department of the Government or any branch of any Department in distress because it is in want of houses. They can not be housed for the next four or five years in this building, and we would lose nothing if we waited a little longer until we determine just exactly what ought to be done.

The Senator from Indiana says this is a convenient way of postponing the matter. If the Senator from Indiana will join with us who believe we ought to have a commission, and we get a proper commission, we can get a report here by the next session of Congress on which we can determine what ought to be the plan of public buildings to be put up in the future.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, I am much struck with the suggestion just made by my distinguished friend the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and as one of the humble members of the committee that has ventured to present this bill, I want to bring forth what my distinguished friend has said, and that is that if we go on in this way we will never build up or beautify the city of Washington. I quite agree with him in that observation. As soon as anything is presented here in the concrete the theorists of this body begin to object, and the result is that this concrete scheme vanishes into the thin air and there is nothing left but conglomerate and nebulous theories floating around here on the subject of high art.

Mr. TELLER. May I ask the Senator if he will state what the concrete plan is now?

Mr. QUARLES. With great pleasure.

Mr. TELLER. Is it anything more than to put up one building? Has your committee any plan as to how the buildings shall be arranged in the future, and where they shall go?

Mr. QUARLES. It probably is a great misfortune that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds should consist simply of practical business men without any of these high ideas regarding art and taste and landscape gardening. We are simply plain business men. We thought we saw the necessity of gathering up the fag ends of the several Departments, as they have been scattered through this city like the lost tribes, and housing them decently somewhere where the public business might be well done, and therefore we proposed the construction of a building, and we left it to a commission of gentlemen who have the confidence of every member of this body to say where that building should be constructed.

But the difficulty is that, without any knowledge of art, we have not been able to adapt our bill to the ideas of these different schools of art which seem to be represented here. There are so many different schools of art here that we can not, any of us, agree upon any given concrete scheme, and I am almost willing to abandon the hope that we may have any practical result, although the needs of another building are very obvious, because we can not reconcile these diverse ideas regarding artistic effect and the beautifying of the city.

Now, we had supposed that the primary proposition, Mr. President, the business proposition, that we should construct a building because it was needed, would not be made subordinate to what we had considered a secondary matter, namely, the effect upon the city at large; but that seems to be the supreme and paramount question here. First, how are we going to beautify the city, and second, are we going to have a building? I confess that our committee would probably be entirely inadequate to make any suggestions along the line of art. If we are to put ourselves in leading strings to the architects and the landscape gardeners, it would be far better, I have no doubt, to appoint a commission who are gifted in that line rather than to leave it to the practical business men of this committee.

The trouble is that no man can present a scheme here to-day which will meet with the diverse views of the members of the Senate, and the result is that we will have no building. The argument that is suggested by my distinguished friend the Senator from Colorado, a repetition of the argument made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] when he last spoke in opposition to this measure, seems to me the strongest and most cogent argument that has been made in favor of this bill. As I understood the distinguished Senator from Maine, when the Senator from Indiana arrayed the figures here to show that as a business proposition, as a commercial proposition, it was good policy to construct this building and save the rent, the Senator from Maine said, as my good friend the Senator from Colorado now says: "We will be paying rent anyway. Put up this building, and we will still be paying rent." That is, notwithstanding the fact that we construct this large building, as soon as it may be done the needs of the Government will so outrun all its facilities that even then we will be paying a large sum in rent in the District of Columbia.

I have not heard a better argument in favor of this bill than that. And it is true, Mr. President. At least five years must pass before this building can be habited, and in view of the tremendous growth of this Government—so well known to members of this body—what condition will the public business be in at the end of five years if instead of going to work at it like business men, and putting up a building to house the Departments, we continually postpone everything by this objection and that, artistic consideration, landscape gardening, and all that kind of thing, and never agree on anything?

Mr. President, I do not want to take the time of the Senate. It seems to me we have made you a fair business proposition to meet the needs of the Government, as every man here knows them to exist. Now, let this commission—all of them honorable, experienced men—determine where this building shall be, and if they agree with our friends that it ought to be on the south side of the Avenue, let them place it there. They have abundant power under this bill.

But let us do something to relieve the pressing needs of the Government. If any amendment can be proposed that will make this bill better, let us adopt it; but let us proceed like business men now, and have some building constructed somewhere and at sometime in the near future, and not leave the public business in the sad plight in which we all know it to exist at this time.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I am very glad to hear the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES] arguing for harmony. I think we are much nearer agreed than the Senator thinks.

If I have understood the discussion to-day, if you will strike out the block north of the State, War, and Navy Department building there is no objection then to your selection. I think that would be very sensible and practical, and it is the proposition of the committee itself. Why not abandon the selection of a block that would cost probably from three to five million dollars and accept the one that you authorize to be accepted in this bill. You will have harmony, you will have cooperation in that matter?

I beg to indorse most earnestly the appeal the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] made to the distinguished chairman of this committee. I can not vote for the bill. In the first place it provides for a building for three Departments. I do not believe that that ought to be done.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The Senator understands, of course, that that provision is temporary. We need not specify any Department, as far as that is concerned. We may construct the building and make such disposition of its space in the future as the interests of the public service may require. The building is needed for the Government business, if not for one Department, then for another.

The architects say that if small buildings classic in style are erected to provide for the present necessities of the several Executive Departments, in the future, when the demands for additional space are made, it will be impossible to add to them without marring the effect in some measure, and that if we are to get a series of buildings large and commodious and of classic architecture it is better to go about it in the way we are now doing.

Of course when this building is constructed others will have to be constructed, and some one of the Departments will move from it to some other until ultimately we shall have a large building for each of the Departments. This, of course, is only a temporary provision for the three Departments. Ultimately but one or two will occupy it.

Mr. COCKRELL. There has always been trouble in adjusting the room in any public building where two or three different Departments have authority to occupy it.

There was a great deal of trouble and friction in regard to the State, War, and Navy building, and there was also much friction in regard to the Post-Office building, where the Auditor for the Post-Office Department had to be housed. But the point is as to the location. Accept the location that you authorize to be selected here——

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question there?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. It was said here a while ago interrogatively, I believe, that the Post-Office building is now subject to overflow. I think some one ought to answer that suggestion. Nobody asserted that it was a fact, except, I say, by asking some Senator who had the floor if he did not know that the basement of the Post-Office building is subject to overflow. I ask simply for information. I know nothing about it.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I have been advised that that is the fact, and I have been informed by a Senator upon the floor this afternoon that his information was to the same effect.

Mr. FORAKER. I should think that would be a very material consideration, and that we ought to be correctly informed about it. If the public building which we put on the south side of the Avenue is subject to overflow, I should think any other public building put there, certainly one of this size and importance, would be very likely to be subject to overflow as to its basement, which would certainly go much under the ground. I should like to know about that, at any rate, before the debate is closed.

Mr. COCKRELL. In response to the Senator from Ohio, I will say that I can only speak from experience during the time, between twenty-eight and twenty-nine years, I have been here, during all the sessions of every Congress. I remember walking down Pennsylvania avenue to the Capitol and discovering water coming out of the sewer about Eleventh street, and by the time I reached the old terrace, the dirt terrace of the Capitol, and got up there and looked back Pennsylvania avenue was covered with water. It was knee deep in some places. As I went home that evening a car was abandoned, standing just east of the Pennsylvania depot, on its track. That happened to be a little lower than some of the other places.

Now, that was an overflow, but it was caused by a blockading of a bridge, and when a span of the bridge was washed away finally the flood disappeared.

Mr. MONEY. It was a gorge of ice.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was an ice gorge. Great masses of ice were carried all over the ground there about the Monument and what were known as the "Babcock lakes," which have since been filled in except the fish lake there.

There was another time when there was a dam. But when the Potomac River has been free to flow through its currents it never has flooded that part of the city. It never has flooded where the houses are built all over southwest Washington, and my understanding is that it has never flooded the basement of the post-office building.

There is no question on earth but that with the present methods of construction they can build houses there the basements of which will not be filled with water; and even if they were, the Senator from Ohio will recall what is occurring here on Pennsylvania avenue. Beginning at the Peace Monument you see holes dug down all along the south side of the Avenue. That will be extended up to about Fifteenth street, and it will be a lower drain than any other part of the city. It is for the low draining of Pennsylvania avenue beyond any possibility of doubt. The work will be constructed this season, and then there will be no danger of flooding.

In very heavy rains the cellars have been flooded there, particularly near this part there on the north side of Pennsylvania avenue; but when that sewer is completed there will be no danger of flooding from anything unless you build a dam across the Potomac out of ice or some other obstacle and the waters are coming down and have to pass away. Then they will go over whatever low land there may be. There will be no danger in the world, in my judgment, not a particle, of flooding. This sewer will be the drainage of the whole thing, and the basements there will be just as dry as anywhere else where you have sewer drainage.

Now, I hope the Senator from Indiana will accept this modification. I believe we ought to have the public building, and if it was to be built on the south side of the Avenue I would be in favor of constructing a large building, and if when it is completed more than one Department can be put in it, so much the better.

Now, just one word about what the Senator from Wisconsin said in speaking about the delay in this matter. I do not know of anyone who is opposing this measure for delay. I am certainly not. I have been advocating the erection of public buildings for the accommodation of the Departments in Washington for a long time. I wanted to have the Interior Department built up. There is a magnificent building only about three stories high. There ought to be three or four stories more put on that building, and it ought to have been done long ago. There is the old post-office building with walls sufficient, and there ought to have been three or four more stories put on that building. I have advocated that.

The Senator from Wisconsin talks about the æsthetic architects. That has been the reason why I could not get those stories on there. It was because they said it would spoil the architecture. I am willing to spoil the architecture, so far as I am concerned, on those buildings if we can get accommodations for our Government service.

If we put this building where we ought to put it, on the Avenue, and commence it now, by the time it is constructed you will not be able to put two of these Departments into it.

I hope the Senator from Indiana will accept the suggestion which has been thrown out by the Senator from Wisconsin, and I believe all of us who have been opposing the bill in its present form will readily accede to it.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, I would be delighted to oblige the honorable and distinguished Senator from Missouri, but it would be impossible to accept the suggestion eliminating the property north of the Avenue from consideration by the commission.

There are those in the Senate who are strongly opposed to erecting buildings on the south side of Pennsylvania avenue. I think that property both north and south of the Avenue should be fully considered, and under this bill the commission is directed to consider not only the availability of the land described in the bill north of the Avenue, but south of it also.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to the amendment of the committee, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, page 6, line 8, after the word "architects," insert:

The successful architect shall receive compensation in full, for plans, specifications, and detailed drawings, not to exceed 2½ per cent of the total cost of said building, and shall also.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I wanted to say one thing further. I think that an examination of the Post-Office building will show that there has never been any water in the basement except once, when the sewers were stopped up, and that during the entire past year, when we have had probably as much rainfall as we have ever had, the whole basement has been just as dry as any basement in the city of Washington.

I wish to say just one word more. The amount which the commission can expend for the purchase of these lots is unlimited. There is no limitation upon it. Whatever amount may be caused by condemnation will have to be paid regardless of it, and $5,000,000 is appropriated by the bill for the building alone.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, since the question asked by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] with respect to the flooding of the basement of the Post-Office building I have telephoned to the Post-Office Department for information on the subject, and I am just advised that the basement has never been flooded by the river.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, last night when I was out of the Chamber the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS] asked unanimous consent that this bill might be considered to-day and finally voted on. I understood there was a reservation that if I objected there should not be a final vote. I notified the Senator yesterday that I did object, but I did not make the notification in the Senate. So I understand we are under no obligation to vote on the bill to-day. Does the Senator from Indiana understand it in that way?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I will read the agreement, that there may be no misunderstanding about it:

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask the Senator from Indiana if he is willing to go on with his remarks to-morrow, or to have a time fixed for a vote on this bill, and to have a short executive session this afternoon?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If there could be a time fixed for a vote on this bill to-morrow, it would be entirely agreeable to allow the bill to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that the Senator ask that a vote be taken before adjournment to-morrow.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. That is entirely agreeable. I ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken upon the bill before adjournment to-morrow.

Mr. PATTERSON. I hope the Senator from Indiana will not press that request. My colleague is not in his seat and I know he takes some interest in this bill, and I would rather that he were here when a disposition of this kind is made, unless the Senator from Rhode Island knows——

Mr. ALDRICH. No; I do not know, but I took it for granted that as this bill has been under discussion for some time we might close the discussion on it to-morrow.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I do not think there is much remaining to be said upon it, if the Senator from Colorado will allow me. I have no doubt that whatever his colleague desires to say can be said before the bill is finally voted upon to-morrow.

Mr. PATTERSON. If the Senator will modify his application for unanimous consent so as to allow the senior Senator from Colorado to object if he desires to do so to-morrow, I will not make any objection.

Mr FAIRBANKS. I did not quite hear the Senator.

Mr. PATTERSON. I said if the Senator from Indiana will so modify his request for unanimous consent as not to make it applicable to the senior Senator from Colorado, but as to all the rest, I will not object.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I do not quite understand the effect of the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. PATTERSON. The effect would be that if my colleague desires to object in the morning he can do so.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that the Senator from Indiana renew his request in the morning. That will be better, perhaps.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I am willing to take the unanimous consent with that limitation, if you please, because I believe the Senator's colleague will not be unreasonable.

Mr. PATTERSON. He spoke to me the other day about the bill, and he not being here, I think I ought to make a reservation in his behalf. That is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the request of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. That this bill be voted on before adjournment to-morrow, reserving the right to the senior Senator from Colorado to object to-morrow.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

And consent was given with that limitation.

Mr. TELLER. I was at lunch, and when I returned notified the Senator that I should object—that is, that I would not consent to unanimous consent. Of course that does not interfere with the right of the Senator to get a vote when the discussion is over. So we are not proceeding under any unanimous consent for a vote to-day.

Now, Mr. President, I have only a word or two to say about the commission. The commission is to be composed of the Secretary of State, the Attorney-General, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, the President pro tempore of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate, and the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives. I do not know, of course, what may be the sentiment of some members of the commission, so called.

Mr. ALLISON. May I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that that relates only to the selection of a site and the purchase of ground, and that the commission for the construction of the building is to consist of the three Cabinet officers who are to occupy it?

Mr. TELLER. That is correct. This is the commission that is to buy the ground. Then the building is to be put under the direction of the three Cabinet officers who are to occupy it.

Mr. President, I was about to say I do not know what the opinion of some of the commission may be, but I know a majority of the commission would be already pledged, I think, to buy this particular block.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If the Senator will allow me, upon what does he base that assumption?

Mr. TELLER. I can not go into that. I only gave that as my opinion.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I want to say to the Senator that I only know of the opinion of one member of the commission on that subject. I do not know how any other member except the——

Mr. TELLER. Except its chairman.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Except the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I do not care about going into that very much; but I know very well that this commission will select the block the Senator himself has advocated so earnestly. The authority to select a block on Pennsylvania avenue, I suppose, was a little sop thrown to us who wanted that th ng done, and there is not any probability whatever of its being done.

Now, this bill is vicious in this, that these three Cabinet officers have no business to be made a commission to construct the building. That of itself would be enough to cause me not to vote for the bill. Of course that provision can be easily stricken out. The bill ought to be amended in that particular.

Now, I want to say a word in reply to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES], who seems to think that it is an answer to every suggestion which has been made here about this bill to say that the committee have not reached that high æsthetic state some Senators claim.

Mr. President, they evidently reached a very high æsthetic state, I will admit. That is evident from the proposition we have here. Whether they know anything about landscape gardening or not I do not know. As for myself, I do not pretend to any high art. I leave that for some other Senators here. I do not pretend to know much about landscape gardening, but, Mr. President, I know enough to know what is a handsome city and what is not. I know enough to know what is an incongruity. I know enough to know that an old shanty on the main boulevard of this city, the great thoroughfare, is an eyesore to any intelligent gentleman or lady. It is not any answer for Senators to say that they have or that they have not got high art, or that somebody else is professing to the high art they do not have.

Mr. President, I do not know what the state of the bill is as to amendments. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has an amendment which I think has not yet been adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] left a proposed amendment, and there is another amendment——

Mr. TELLER. Did the Senator from Maine offer his amendment or only leave it to be offered?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He sent it to the table to have it printed. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] also had an amendment printed.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is now here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, just read.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That relates to fees of the architects.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To fees of the architects.

Mr. TELLER. Let it be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be again read.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, page 6, line 8, after the word "architects," insert:

The successful architect shall receive compensation in full for plans, specifications, and detailed drawings not to exceed 2½ per cent of the total cost of said building, and shall also.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have been detained from the Senate all day on an appropriation bill. I wish to say in regard to the amendment just read that when it was up before I sustained it, saying that I thought it would be a sufficient amount. I have taken the trouble to investigate the question with some thoroughness, and I am satisfied that the cost to an architect of plans, draftsmen, and all the other incidental expenses amounts to 2½ per cent, and that the regular amount, 5 per cent, that is asked for and which is fixed by the architects throughout the country, is a proper and not an unreasonable amount. I merely wished to make that explanation.

Mr. DRYDEN. Mr. President, a few days ago, when this question was before the Senate, I made a few brief remarks as to the fees of the architects. I am very glad to hear what the Senator from Massachusetts says upon that point.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I desired especially to make the statement because I took issue with the Senator then. I now think he is quite right in what he then said.

Mr. DRYDEN. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts for saying that. I should like to read a brief extract from a letter, which I have in my hand, bearing upon the subject, for the information of the Senate. I received this letter from a firm of architects of the name of Lord & Hewlett, of New York. I have not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with those gentlemen, but they write me this letter. In it they make a statement which I think has a special significance with reference to this particular amendment. They say:

> The discussion of this matter in t he Senate is of very special interest to us, as we recently felt obliged to refu seto accept the contract for the architectural services for the new buildin gfor the Department of Agriculture, although we had won the competition for the design of this building against nine of the leading architects of the country, for the reason that the Secretary of Agriculture insisted that the services should be rendered for the inadequate payment of 3½ per cent of the cost of the building, and refused to agree that we should provide the usual and proper architectural superintendence necessary to insure the carrying out of the work in accordance with our plans and specifications.

As I have stated, this letter is from Lord & Hewlett, a firm which, in competition against nine other firms of architects, had won the contract, but upon the Department refusing to pay them a fee in excess of 3½ per cent, and also because they themselves could not have the supervision of the building, they refused to take the contract.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from New Jersey to yield to me for a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. DRYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand, though I have not the act before me, that the law authorizing the construction of the Department of Agriculture required that the superintendence of the building should be assigned to an officer of the Army. I do not know whether he was named or not. Therefore the 3½ per cent which the Secretary of Agriculture was willing to pay those architects excluded the idea of the superintendency of the building during its construction. I desire to say that in explanation of what I think is the attitude of the Secretary of Agriculture upon this question. The 5 per cent usually charged as the fee of the architects includes the making of plans, detailed specifications, and the superintendence of the construction of the building, which in this case the law fixed in the control of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. DRYDEN. I think it is altogether probable that the Senator from Iowa is correct about that. The point I am speaking to, however, is that you can not get a responsible and competent firm of architects to take a contract of this kind for less than 5 per cent, and they would want to do all the work connected with the architect's office under the contract which they are willing to make.

We have recently had in the city of New York a specimen of the results which may occur when architects are employed to do a part of a job. I refer to that terrible disaster, the collapse of the Hotel Darlington, I think it was called, in which more than twenty lives were lost. What were the facts in that case? There was done there just what is proposed to be done by this amendment—architects were employed to do a part of the work and the remainder was left to the contractor. The contractor, without supervision, without inspection, of course, did the cheapest kind of a job that he could do and have it passed by the owner. The result was that, the work being insufficiently supervised, the building collapsed, and, as I have said, more than twenty human lives were lost in consequence.

In corroboration of what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has stated as to the cost to an architect himself for actual services and work rendered, his own actual disbursements, I have here in my hand a private memorandum made by one of the greatest and largest architects in this country—largest, I mean, in point of the character of his buildings, the magnitude of his buildings, and the extent of the buildings—made for his own purposes, running over a series of years. I shall not read the particulars; I shall not mention his name, for this memorandum is of a confidential character; but it shows the fact that in no single year covered by the memorandum—and it covers a series of years when his business was in the most prosperous state by reason of its magnitude and consequent relative reduction in expense—in no single year, I say, was his own personal disbursement for expenses less than 2½ per cent, and from that up to something like 4 per cent.

I say when you undertake to drive a sharp and hard bargain with architects on a matter of this kind, one of two things is sure to result. You are either going to get a poor architect and poor results or you will be cheated in the quality of your work. No great architect who values his reputation will undertake the work; no man who has an organization competent to carry on a work of this kind will undertake it. It requires an organization; it requires experience; it requires a great corps of competent men, of draftsmen, architects, engineers, practical men. Every great architect has to have such an organization. The thought that the work of an architect consists in merely drawing a picture showing the plan and design of a building is all a mistake, and there can be no greater mistake in connection with this whole subject than that. The last place that Congress should begin to economize is with the architect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, although the amendment is defeated, I wish to say a word about what I understand the real condition to be with reference to architects' fees. I may be mistaken, but I think I am not, as, in connection with the construction of the building which has been authorized for the Smithsonian Institution, I made a good many inquiries.

I understand that there is a national association of architects, embracing the principal architects of the country. I have had occasion to realize that there is such an association from the letters which I have received from architects with reference to the Mall. But I understand that they have what is equivalent to a union, in which they all agree that they will not accept a fee of less than 5 per cent. While that has been determined by a majority vote of the architects, it is by no means the universal sentiment among them. Many of the architects—and there are a good many of them—do not feel that they ought to insist upon 5 per cent upon the cost of every class and character of building.

There is quite a minority who feel that the fees of architects should be fixed with reference to the size of buildings and the localities in which they are to be erected, and a variety of other considerations, but a majority of this association or union insist that all architects shall be disciplined if they do not insist on the 5 per cent fee.

Mr. DRYDEN. Mr. President, I think, if I am correctly informed, that perhaps the Senate might get a wrong impression from the remarks which have been made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] as to the object of this organization of architects. There is an institution called the American Institute of Architects. The regulation of the fees of the architects is an incident of that organization. They meet for a comparison of views; they meet to show their designs; they meet to discuss the various points of their profession; they meet, as artists meet, to talk over the subject of art; and the establishment of fees for their work, as I have said, is only an incident.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from a committee at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be received.

Mr. PENROSE. I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 13521) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments.

I desire to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the same after the routine morning business to-morrow.

BUILDING FOR DEPARTMENT OF STATE, ETC.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1508) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection thereon of a public building to be used for a Department of State, a Department of Justice, and a Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent to offer a proposed amendment to the pending bill as a substitute for section 1, which I desire to have read and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 1, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That the Secretary of State, the Attorney-General, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, the President pro tempore of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate, and the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives, be, and they are hereby, created a commission, with authority to acquire, by purchase, condemnation or otherwise, a suitable block or blocks of land south of Pennsylvania avenue, between Third and Fifteenth streets, in the northwest section of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, which does not belong to the United States, for a site for the erection thereon of the building hereinafter provided for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, it is perfectly obvious to every Senator here that it is not the purpose of some of our friends in opposition to this bill to permit a vote to be had to-night. I think I do violence to no one in making that statement. Is the Senator from Colorado willing we should vote to-night?

Mr. TELLER. I did not understand what the Senator was saying.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I said it seemed to me there was a manifest purpose to not allow this bill to come to a vote to-night, and I asked the Senator from Colorado whether he was willing that we should vote to night.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I am willing we shall vote on this bill if the Senate wants to stay here all night; but I am not willing to be cut short in any amendments I propose to offer or in any remarks I propose to make.

The Senator has no right to ask me whether I am deferring this discussion. It is hardly a proper thing for him to do or to intimate that I am deferring this discussion to prevent a vote to-night. I shall not be deterred, Mr. President, from fighting this bill by any such insinuations from the Senator from Indiana. If the Senator and the Senate want to stay here and discuss the amendments to-night, so far as I am concerned, I shall not move to adjourn.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I had no idea of intimating that the Senator himself was opposed to taking a vote upon the bill. I had not heard that he was. I heard that there were other Senators who wanted the bill to go over. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] offered an amendment a moment ago, and asked that it might be printed. Of course it is obvious that that amendment can not be printed and the bill be completed to-night.

Mr. GALLINGER. So far as that is concerned, I will say to the Senator that if he can have a vote on his bill now, without my amendment being printed, I have no purpose to put the bill over by that action of mine.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I thought that was involved in it. The Senator knows we are nearing the end of this session of Congress, and that there are appropriation bills which will soon engage the attention of the Senate. I think the committee that has reported this bill has a right to the judgment of the Senate upon it.

The committee has no desire to cut short remarks or to abridge in any degree the right of Senators to move amendments to the bill. I think I am not unreasonable when I ask, in view of the long debate that has occurred upon it, that we should dispose of it to-night and put it behind us, and I appeal to the Senators who may disagree with the committee to allow the bill to be voted upon.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have not refused to allow the bill to be voted on. The Senator has no right to insinuate that I have been unnecessarily delaying it. I have not said a word on this bill that I would not have said if we had had a month ahead of us. I regard this as a pernicious bill, and I regard this as an opportune time to adopt some system—a thing we never have had—in regard to public buildings.

I assert my right, without any criticism from anybody, to express my views on this bill, as I do on every other. If the Senate wants to stay here, I will make my objections to the bill without any unnecessary delay; but I think it is an unreasonable thing for the Senator to insist upon our voting on it to-night. Of course, I do not attach the importance to the bill which he attaches to it, so I have no criticism whatever to make of him.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The Senator will not understand me as imputing anything that was ungenerous or unfair to him. No such thought entered my mind, nor did I intend to impute anything unfair to any other Senator. I hope the Senator very well understands that.

But we are practical men; we know that this bill is ripe for a vote; that every feature of it has been debated over and over again, and that it would take but a comparatively short time to dispose of it now. If a time could be agreed upon for a vote after to-day, I should be perfectly willing that the bill should go over.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that the bill in charge of the Senator from Indiana is the unfinished business, and, as such, has the right of way over all other matters except appropriation bills.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. That is true, I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, I submit to the Senator that it seems to me if we could finish this bill in a brief time on some other day it is hardly worth while for us to stay here this evening, and if he will yield to me I will make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The Senator, of course, is in charge of important appropriation bills which will be reported to the Senate soon, and they, of course, as the Senator says, take precedence of the unfinished business. Would it not be possible to agree that we may vote on this bill before adjournment on, say, Friday next?

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator can make that arrangement, very well.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I would ask the Senator from Colorado if he would not be willing that we should vote on this bill before the adjournment of the Senate next Friday? If so, I am perfectly willing that it shall now go over.

Mr. TELLER. So far as I am concerned, I will not express any opinion for or against that proposition.

Mr. LODGE. The chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is present, but I was going to suggest that the post-office appropriation bill will be taken up to-morrow, and it is impossible to say how long the debate on it will continue. I think if any unanimous-consent agreement is secured in regard to the pending bill, it ought to be subject to appropriation bills.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Then it will be of no effect practically.

Mr. LODGE. All unanimous-consent agreements are subject to appropriation bills.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Unless it should be specifically understood that there should be a vote. I think an agreement to vote before adjournment on Friday would take precedence over an appropriation bill.

Mr. LODGE. I meant that there would be no opportunity to debate this bill further or to discuss any of the amendments or offer amendments if in the meantime the post-office appropriation bill is under discussion.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I think it will be impossible to adjourn this session with only the appropriation bills and the pending bill completed. The only appropriation bill that I know of, after the post-office bill, to come to the Senate in the near future, is the sundry civil appropriation bill, which will probably pass the House this week, and be considered in the Senate within a week or so after that.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the post-office appropriation bill has just been reported. I understand it has not yet been brought into the Senate in its complete printed form, and it is probable that no Senator will see it in its complete form before 12 or 1 o'clock to-morrow. Would it not be well to get the pending bill disposed of? The Senate has very nearly completed its discussion, and would it not be well to let the discussion on the bill proceed and take a vote on it immediately after the conclusion of the routine business—at 2 o'clock?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. To-morrow?

Mr. HOAR. Yes; and then the post-office appropriation bill could come up an hour later.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I must object to any agreement which will delay the post-office appropriation bill. I have gone to very great effort to expedite its passage through the committee.

Mr. HOAR. It would only make a difference of an hour or so.

Mr. PENROSE. I shall be compelled to leave Washington on Sunday next, to be gone a week, and the loss of one hour may mean that this bill, if it can be passed at all this week, will not be passed.

Mr. HOAR. I submit to my honorable friend that it is rather a hard use of the powers of appropriation bills to bring them in and knock everything else aside that is going on in the Senate, that has been debated, and is within an hour or half an hour of being finished.

Mr. ALLISON. I sympathize with the Senator, but I am sure——

Mr. HOAR. My suggestion is, as the post-office appropriation bill, which has just been reported five minutes ago, will not come from the printer, so that we can see it, much before the Senate convenes to-morrow, that half an hour or an hour be given to the pending bill to-morrow in order that a vote may be had on it. It will only take a brief time, and we can stay long enough in the afternoon to make up for it. I submit to my friend from Pennsylvania that that is a reasonable suggestion.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. This can be disposed of by that time.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania, having the post-office appropriation bill in charge, has given a very good reason, which is one personal to himself, why he can not consent.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I will not further ask that a date be fixed for voting upon this bill. I understand it will remain the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will until it is displaced by a motion to proceed to the consideration of some other business.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 30, 1904, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 29, 1904.

The House was called to order at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday, March 28, 1904, was read and approved.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 3867. An act granting an increase of pension to Osmer S. Deming—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 1478. An act granting an increase of pension to Leroy R. Hawthorn—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 4817. An act granting a pension to Cornelia A. Thompson—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 4405. An act granting an increase of pension to Emma Thurston—to the Committee on Pensions.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14416, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, with Mr. BURTON in the chair.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I would inquire as to the time remaining on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that there is at the disposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] two hours and twenty-five minutes and at the disposition of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] fifty-two minutes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, our Government has grown to the extent that it requires in round numbers seven hundred millions to maintain the Departments that are required to operate it. Now, this money must be raised in some way. No plan that falls short of this amount of money will meet the requirements of the Government. It is conceded by our friends on the other side that the money to defray our expenses must be raised through some tariff policy, either a tariff for revenue with incidental protection or a tariff for protection with incidental revenue. If that be true, the policy of the protectionist is the better way of raising the money.

I doubt if there has been a time in our history when the protective policy was more necessary to the welfare and prosperity of the people, and it may be said there have been few times when the policy of strict protection has been in greater danger than it is at this hour. Its friends lulled into a condition of security, some are led to say, "Oh, well, it might not do any harm to yield to those who are demanding a revision."

Upon the other hand, those who are opposed to the protective policy have knitted their sinews and are waging a most aggressive warfare against it. It may be said without fear of successful contradiction that the Democratic party, as an organized body, to-day and forever in the past has been opposed to the protective policy. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] on yesterday delighted his Democratic friends with an assault upon the protective policy. In his speech he adopted as his own the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the leader of the minority upon this floor. That gentleman, able in his leadership, having under perfect control the minority of this House, has voiced the sentiments of the Democracy of this day upon the tariff question when he says:

> The system is one of legalized robbery. That is the result and that is the effect. It is robbery for the reason that it prostitutes the Government to do what Government has no right to do, viz, to build up or hothouse one man's industry, one man's capital, one man's labor by laying a tax upon the labor and capital of all men.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] gives expression to the position of his party.

The last official announcement of his party in the campaign that elected this House said:

> The theory of free trade is that both the seller and the buyer are benefited by the exchange of commodities, and that as all are consumers, the greatest good to the greatest number requires that there be no barriers to trade in order that the goods may be as cheap as possible and the cost of living reduced to the minimum.

That has been the position of free traders at all times and everywhere. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] in his leadership is consistent. He stands upon the platforms that the Democratic party has made in the past upon this question. For forty years, when that party was in the ascendency, their position upon the tariff question was expressed in these words:

> Justice and sound policy forbid the Federal Government to foster one branch of industry to the detriment of another or to cherish the interests of one portion to the injury of another portion of our common country.

The Democratic party at one time adopted a constitution, and in the convention which adopted it there were none but Democrats. That constitution was adopted by the Confederate States of America, and in it was inserted this clause:

> Nor shall any duties or taxes on importations from foreign nations be laid to promote or foster any branch of industry.

Mr. Chairman, I take it from the expressions of the minority of this House that that party has not changed its position on the policy of protection. Every time any gentleman on that side has spoken during this Congress upon this question he has given expression to the sentiments that animated his party in the past and that animate it to-day. Every assault made upon the protective policy has met with round after round of applause from the minority on this floor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the system or policy of protection is called "legalized robbery," engaged in by the Government to build up or "hothouse" one man's industry, one man's capital, or one man's labor by laying a tax upon the labor and the capital of all men.

It must not be supposed that this allegation is a statement of facts. It is only the declaration of a theory. The fact is that the policy of protection, wherever and whenever practiced, has led to general prosperity, and the abandonment of that policy has led to universal depression and adversity.

Under the policy of protection the British Empire became the greatest commercial power in the world. Its commercial enterprises became a very hive of industry, and its commerce covered the seas.

Alison, in his History of Europe, speaking of the growth of England under the policy of protection, says:

> There is perhaps no example in the annals of mankind of a nation having made such advances in industry, wealth, and numbers as Great Britain has made since the peace.
>
> In the thirty years that have elapsed since the battle of Waterloo, during which it has enjoyed, in Europe at least, almost universal peace, its population has increased more than one-half, having advanced from 18,500,000 to 28,000,000; its imports have doubled, having risen from £22,000,000 to £70,000,000; its exports have more than tripled, having swelled from £42,000,000 to £130,000,000, exclusive of colonial produce; its shipping has doubled, having grown from 2,500,000 to 5,000,000 tons. * * *
> During the same period the agricultural industry of the country has been so far from falling short of this prodigious increase in its commercial transactions that it has signally prospered: the dependence of the nation on foreign supplies has steadily diminished until the grain annually imported had come (on an average of five years, ending with 1835) to be more than a two-hundredth part in average years of the annual consumption; and the prodigy was exhibited of a rural industry in an old State possessing a narrow and long-cultivated territory not only keeping pace with but outstripping an increase of numbers and augmentation of food required for the purpose of luxury unparalleled in any age.

This is not an exaggerated picture of England as the nations of the world have known her. But in the midst of her marvelous prosperity she yielded to the siren voice of the free trader and in 1846 adopted that policy. Since that time she has witnessed the growth and prosperity of the commerce of her competitors, while her own has been diminishing year after year.

In a recent article Sir Guilford L. Molesworth has said of England's experiment with the theory of free trade:

> Free trade, so called, has had a patient trial of more than half a century, and it is now time to take stock of the results in order to see how we stand. The results may be briefly summed up as follows: Under our policy of free trade we have lost that commercial and industrial superiority we acquired under the policy of strict protection. Our policy of direct taxation bears heavily upon our industries and reacts on the working classes in reduction of wages and employment. Our agriculture has been ruined and our industries are struggling hard for existence.
> Other nations, under a policy of strict protection, are beating us in the race of competition, not only in neutral, but in our own markets. The policy of free trade has not secured for us either the cheap loaf, low prices of provisions, or reduced cost of living; for all of these have been equally secured by nations under a strict protective policy. We have sacrificed the substance for the shadow.

This has been the experience of England. The theorist may exhaust the vocabulary in demonstrating his proposition, but the actual fact of growth under protection and of decay under free trade is clearly set forth in the experience of England.

But, Mr. Chairman, we need not confine experience under the policy of protection and the theory of free trade to the people of the British Empire. We have had experience of our own.

The protective policy was adopted by the American people by the act of July 4, 1789. We were then a young republic rising from the ashes of a revolution resulting in our independence. Our enterprises had been sacrificed and our resources had been exhausted in the acquisition of that noble and lofty ambition. But six short years after the enactment of our first protective-tariff law, President Washington, in his annual message to Congress in 1795, said, referring to our prosperity:

Our agriculture, commerce, and manufactures prosper beyond former example, with burdens so light as scarcely to be perceived.

The policy of protection was continued through the Administration of President Adams with such splendid results as to call from President Jefferson, the patron saint of the Democratic party, in his first annual message, this utterance:

Other circumstances, combined with the increase of numbers, have produced an augmentation of revenue arising from consumption in a ratio far beyond that of population alone; and though the changes in foreign relations now taking place so desirably for the whole world may for a season affect this branch of revenue, yet weighing all probabilities of expense as well as of income, there is reasonable ground of confidence that we may now safely dispense with all the internal taxes, comprehending excise, stamps, auctions, licenses, carriages, and refined sugars, to which the postage on newspapers may be added to facilitate the progress of information, and that the remaining sources of revenue will be sufficient to provide for the support of the Government, to pay the interest of the public debts, and to discharge the principal within shorter periods than the laws or the general expectation had contemplated.

The same policy was continued through the period of President Jefferson's service as President, and in his last message to Congress, speaking of the condition of the country, he said:

The accounts of the receipts of revenue during the year ending on the 30th day of September last being not yet made up, a correct statement will be hereafter transmitted from the Treasury. In the meantime, it is ascertained that the receipts have amounted to near $16,000,000, which, with the five millions and a half in the Treasury at the beginning of the year, have enabled us, after meeting the current demands and interest incurred, to pay more than four millions of the principal of our funded debt. These payments, with those of the preceding five and a half years, have extinguished of the funded debt $25,500,000, being the whole which could be paid or purchased within the limits of the law and of our contracts, and have left us in the Treasury $8,500,000.

The policy of protection was continued, the people letting well enough alone, and in 1812, on account of the war with England, the tariff schedules were doubled in the act of that year. Under that act the Republic waged a victorious war against the fleets and soldiery of the British Empire, and was richer and more prosperous at its close than when it began.

The act of 1812 provided for its own limitation. One year after the war was over the schedules expired. At that time it was undertaken, by the act of 1816, to establish a tariff upon the protective theory, but the fact is that the schedules in that act were not high enough to meet the conditions in the Old World.

When our manufacturers undertook to compete with the manufacturers of Europe under the act of 1816, they found that their European competitors were able to undersell them in our own markets. The importations of goods from foreign countries flooded our country, swamped our industries, and absolutely ruined manufacture, agriculture, and other industries, so that a condition of almost hopeless despair was apparent on every hand. A period of hard times set in, agriculture was unprofitable, manufactures suspended, labor was without employment, industrial and commercial paralysis existed throughout the land, and revenues were insufficient for the expenses of the Government in a time of peace.

President Monroe in 1819, in his annual message, speaking of the condition of the country, said:

The great reduction in the price of the principal articles of domestic growth which has occurred during the present year and the consequent fall in the price of labor, apparently so favorable to the success of domestic manufacturers, have not shielded them against other causes adverse to their prosperity. The pecuniary embarrassments which have so deeply affected the commercial interests of the nation have been no less adverse to our manufacturing establishments in several sections of the Union.

Again, in 1821, referring to the public revenue, he says:

At the close of the last session it was anticipated that the progressive diminution of the public revenue in 1819 and 1820, which had been the result of the languid state of our foreign commerce in those years, had in the latter year reached its extreme point of depression. It has, however, been ascertained that the point was reached only at the termination of the first quarter of the present year.

In 1820 Henry Clay, speaking of the condition of the country under that revision of the tariff by the Democratic party, said:

Can we plead, sir, ignorance of the general distress and of the ardent wishes of the community for that protection of its industry which this bill proposes? No, sir; daily almost throughout the session have we been receiving petitions, with which our tables are now loaded, imploring us to extend this protection. * * *

Let us not turn a deaf ear to them. Let us not disappoint their just expectations. Let us manifest by the passage of this bill that Congress does not deserve the reproaches which have been cast upon it, of insensibility to the wants and sufferings of the people.

And again, in 1824, while pleading for the tariff act of that year, Mr. Clay said:

In casting our eyes around us the most prominent circumstance which fixes our attention and challenges our deepest respect is the general distress which pervades the whole country. It is forced upon us by numerous facts of the most incontestable character.

It is indicated by the diminished exports of native produce; by the depressed and reduced state of our foreign navigation; by our diminished commerce; by successive unthrashed crops of grain perishing in our barns and barnyards for want of a market; by the alarming diminution of the circulating medium; by the numerous bankruptcies, not limited to the trading classes, but extending to all orders of society; by an universal complaint of the want of employment and a consequent reduction of the wages of labor, * * * and, above all, by the low and depressed state of the value of almost every description of the whole mass of the property of the nation, which has, on an average, sunk not less than about 50 per cent within a few years. This distress pervades every part of the Union, every class of society; all feel it, though it may be felt at different places in different degrees.

Mr. Chairman, in 1824, having had eight years under a tariff revised by the Democratic party and seven years of the greatest depression and hard times that had been known to the country, the people returned to the policy of protection for relief; and, Mr. Chairman, they did not return to this policy in vain. With the enactment of the law reestablishing the policy of protection, relief came. This act was supplemented and strengthened by the act of 1828, and under this tariff the country witnesses marvelous prosperity throughout every industry. Agriculture and manufacture revived on every hand; idle labor returned to remunerative employment; revenues poured into the Treasury, and the national debt was paid and the expenses of the Government fully met without resorting to the pawnbroker.

President Jackson in 1830, in his annual message, referring to the prosperous condition of the country, said:

The pleasure I have in congratulating you upon your return to your constitutional duties is much heightened by the satisfaction which the condition of our beloved country at this period justly inspires.

Again, President Jackson, in his message of 1832, said:

I can not too cordially congratulate Congress and my fellow-citizens on the near approach of that memorable and happy event, the extinction of the public debt of this great and free nation. Faithful to the wise and patriotic policy marked out by the legislation of the country for this object, the present Administration has devoted to it all the means which a flourishing commerce has supplied and a prudent economy preserved for the public Treasury.

Mr. Clay, in referring to the condition of the country under the policy of protection and the theory of free trade, said:

Eight years ago it was my painful duty to present to the other House of Congress an unexaggerated picture of the general distress pervading the whole land. We must all yet remember some of its frightful features. In short, sir, if I were to select any term of seven years since the adoption of the present Constitution, which exhibited a scene of the most widespread dismay and desolation, it would be exactly the term of seven years which immediately preceded the establishment of the tariff in 1824.

I have now to perform the more pleasing task of exhibiting an imperfect sketch of the existing state of the unparalleled prosperity of the country.

We behold cultivation extended, the arts flourishing, the face of the country improved, our people fully and profitably employed, and the public countenance exhibiting tranquillity, contentment, and happiness. And, if we descend into particulars, we have the agreeable contemplation of a people out of debt; land rising slowly in value, but in a sure and salutary degree; a ready, though not extravagant, market for all the surplus productions of our industry; innumerable flocks and herds browsing and gamboling on 10,000 hills and plains covered with rich and verdant grasses; our cities expanded and whole villages springing up, as it were, by enchantment; our exports and imports increased and increasing; our tonnage, foreign and coastwise, swelling and fully occupied; the rivers of our interior animated by the perpetual thunder and lightning of countless steamboats; the currency sound and abundant; the public debt of two wars nearly redeemed; and, to crown all, the public Treasury overflowing.

If the term of seven years were to be selected of the greatest prosperity which this people have enjoyed since the establishment of their present Constitution, it would be exactly that period of seven years which immediately followed the passage of the tariff of 1824.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it might reasonably be expected, with the experiments they already had, the people of that day would have been satisfied to let well enough alone, but the Democratic party said the tariff was "legalized robbery;" that it hothoused one industry into prosperity at the expense of all others, and that party was again given the privilege of revising the tariff and gave the country the act of 1832.

The results that followed that tariff revision by the Democratic party were similar to those that followed the act of 1816. The industries of the country languished, its revenues were insufficient, and the Government became a borrower of money with which to defray the expenses incident to its operation in a time of peace, hawking the Government's bonds through the markets of the country without finding buyers.

Upon that subject President Tyler said, in 1841:

Of the loan of $12,000,000 which was authorized by Congress at its late session only, $5,432,726.88 have been negotiated. The shortness of time which it had to run has presented no inconsiderable impediment in the way of its being taken by capitalists at home, while the same cause would have operated with much greater force in the foreign market. For that reason the foreign market has not been resorted to, and it is now submitted whether it would not be advisable to amend the law by making what remains undisposed of payable at a more distant day.

Now, sir, we have again seen the people rise with prosperity under the policy of protection as established by the act of 1824 and pay off the nation's debt, and we have seen them go down with adversity under the tariff revised by the Democratic party in 1832 and become the borrowers of money with which to pay the ordinary running expenses of the Government.

In 1842 the policy of protection prevailed, and all manner of industry revived, but the people yielded to the demands of the free trader in 1846, when the Democratic party, the friend of free trade, again revised the tariff; and again, sir, a period of depression set in. The industries of the country became inactive, and labor engaged in agriculture and manufacture throughout the land was without remunerative employment. President Fillmore, in his annual message in 1851, referring to the condition of the country, said:

> The value of our exports of breadstuffs and provisions, which it was supposed the incentive of a low tariff the large importations from abroad would have greatly augmented, has fallen from $68,701,921 in 1847 to $26,051,373 in 1850 and to $21,948,653 in 1851, with a strong probability, amounting almost to a certainty, of a still further reduction in the current year.
> The policy which dictated a low rate of duties in foreign merchandise, it was thought by those who promoted and established it, would tend to benefit the farming population of this country by increasing the demand and raising the price of agricultural products in foreign markets.

The fact is, Mr. Chairman, in theory we expand our exports under free trade, but in practice they diminish under that policy.

Again, speaking of the disastrous effects upon the country under the last tariff revision by the Democratic party, President Fillmore said:

> In my first annual message to Congress I called your attention to what seemed to me some defects in the present tariff and recommended such modifications as in my judgment were best adapted to remedy its evils and promote the prosperity of the country. Nothing has since occurred to change my views on this important question.
> Without repeating the arguments contained in my former message in favor of discriminating protective duties, I deem it my duty to call your attention to one or two other considerations affecting this subject. The first is the effect of large importations of foreign goods upon our currency. Most of the gold of California, as fast as it is coined, finds its way directly to Europe in payment for goods purchased. In the second place, as our manufacturing establishments are broken down by competition with foreigners, the capital invested in them is lost, thousands of honest and industrious citizens are thrown out of employment, and the farmer, to that extent, is deprived of a home market for the sale of his surplus produce. In the third place, the destruction of our manufactures leaves the foreigner without competition in our market, and he consequently raises the price for the article sent here for sale, as is now seen in the increased cost of iron imported from England.

There was no change in the tariff, and conditions became no better. The country was still under the Democratic tariff, revised by that party in 1846, when President Buchanan, in his first annual message in 1857, said:

> We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in rich abundance, and yet, notwithstanding all these advantages, our country in its monetary interest is at the present moment in a deplorable condition. In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions of agriculture and in all the elements of national wealth, we find our manufactures suspended, our public works retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want.
> The revenue of the Government, which is chiefly derived from duties on imports from abroad, has been greatly reduced, whilst the appropriations made by Congress at its last session for the current fiscal year are very large in amount.
> Under these circumstances a loan may be required before the close of your present session; but this, although deeply to be regretted, would prove to be only a slight misfortune when compared with the suffering and distress prevailing among the people.

It seems to be a habit for the Government to borrow money to pay running expenses under a Democratic tariff. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have seen the first half century of our country's history rising under the protective policy to prosperity and falling under tariff revision by the Democratic party to adversity. A condition of prosperity came with the policy of protection and a condition of adversity came when the theory of free trade was yielded to, and this has been without an exception.

It is not strange, then, that among the first laws enacted by the Republican party was a law putting into effect the policy of projection—a policy that was sustained for almost a third of a century after its adoption in 1861.

That period, Mr. Chairman, began with a bankrupt Treasury, with industrial depression on every hand, with civil war and secession—a war that cost billions of treasure and the lives of thousands of the best men in the nation and took four years and more of the nation's time, reducing its energies and its resources and prostrating the whole South so that that section had to begin anew. The great West was a wild unbroken prairie, designated on the maps as a part of the Great American Desert. The West and South at the close of the war had nothing except a determined purpose on the one hand to subdue the prairie and on the other to restore its waste places. Few, if any, implements; less, if any, farm animals, and but few of the merest necessities of life. The people of the South looked out upon desolation and ruin; the home seekers and settlers of the West looked out upon an unbroken prairie that receded to the horizon in every direction. There was nothing to gladden the vision or to cheer the heart of either.

Now, sir, I have drawn that picture for the purpose of showing how impossible it would have been to have robbed the people of the South and West at that time, and for the further purpose of showing that no system of robbery, legalized or predatory, in either case could have made the rich grow richer and them grow poorer. And yet, if we are to believe anything alleged and deliberately declared by the Democratic party, we must believe that the farmers of the South and West have been robbed through all these years to hothouse into prosperity and wealth the industries of others.

Mr. Chairman, the fact is that no like period in the history of this or any other country has ever witnessed such marvelous development of resources and such unparalleled prosperity of industry. Agriculture and manufacture have grown up and prospered together. The farmer has a market at home for his produce. The manufacturer has not had to go abroad with his wares. Both have prospered by practicing the profitable economy of eliminating distances from the question of trade. The policy of protection has preserved the American market for the products of American manufacturers, and American manufacturers have made markets for the products of American farmers, and together they have established the high standard of American living and made possible a high scale of American wages. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The farmer of the West has learned and the farmer of the South ought to learn that when the factory is closed he not only loses customers for his products, but also meets additional competitors in his production. The workman, losing his employment in the factory, settles upon a truck farm and becomes a producer of the products he formerly bought from the farmer. The prosperity of the farmer depends upon the prosperity of those who buy his products.

The West and South experienced a marvelous growth and prosperity during the period I have mentioned, all under the policy of protection, and continue to prosper under that policy. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] admits this fact for Mississippi.

I make the admission for Kansas, and in addition cite the fact that on the first day of January, 1904, the Kansas bank account contained $73 per capita for the entire State. In the West we have built houses, barns, schoolhouses, churches, colleges, bridges, court-houses, charitable institutions, and magnificent statehouses, and are as well provided with all these as any section of the Union. This growth and prosperity has been gradual, and we may hope that it will continue while the policy that made it possible is maintained. [Applause.]

What has been said of the South and West may be said of the whole Union, and it may be said without fear of successful contradiction that there is no like period in the history of this or any other country anywhere in the world where the people made such marvelous development and progress in all that ministers to the welfare and happiness of a people.

But in 1892, in the midst of plenty, surrounded by unusual conditions of prosperity, the Democratic party raised the old banner of opposition to the protective policy and again asked for an opportunity to revise the tariff. The policy of protection was then called a system of robbery that made the rich richer and the poor poorer, and hothoused into prosperity one industry at the expense of another. The people had forgotten their country's history and said: "We'll try it." The depression and ruin that was inaugurated with that tariff revision by the Democratic party is vivid in the minds of all. It is impossible to exaggerate the condition of devastation that followed upon the ruins of every industry throughout the land. Banks suspended, factories closed, furnaces drew their fires, mills suspended work, agriculture was prostrated, industry of all kinds languished, values of farm products and farm animals went downward, farm values went to a low ebb, values of all commodities went down to the ruin of all industry.

There was little or no incentive to work upon the farm and nothing to do in the factory. This wreck of industry resulted in the loss of employment to more than 3,000,000 of workingmen, and those who were not let out of employment entirely were working upon less than one-half time. Railway employees, except those on scheduled trains, were fortunate if they made one-third of their usual wages; coal miners were fortunate if they made one-fourth of their customary earnings, and factory operatives in all branches fared no better. Revenues were insufficient for expenses, and the Government took its bonds to the money lenders.

There were no complaints about trusts or combines. There was just one great organization brought into being during that period—Coxey's army—an army made up of men without work, who wanted something to do. These honest men had voted for tariff revision by the Democratic party. They were now marching upon Washington, demanding nothing but an opportunity to work.

These men, and all who went out of employment with them under the Gorman-Wilson tariff revision, had been, under the Republican policy of protection, large consumers of the best products in well-supplied markets, but under the Democratic revised tariff they subsisted upon soup provided in large part by public charity. So sudden a change from a condition of employment that made possible a demand for better pay, as was done in 1892, to a condition of no employment at all, could only be repeated by again permitting the Democratic party to revise the tariff. [Applause on Republican side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, it did not take long to get enough of the Gorman-Wilson tariff revision, and the election of 1896 called upon the Republican party to again give the American people the benefits of the protective policy.

The Dingley act restored that policy, and with that restoration came a return of prosperity. The whistle blew, and idle labor found its way to industries that were opening their doors throughout the land. Smokestacks throughout the country began again to emit in ceaseless streams the emblem of a country's prosperity, and the hum of spindles made a song of gladness that echoed throughout the land. The 3,000,000 of men who went out of employment with the revision of the tariff by the Democratic party found employment in the enactment of the Dingley law by the Republican party, and a million and a half have been added to those who have employment in the industries of the country. Agriculture revived; banks rechartered and opened; industry of every kind acquired new life and energy. Every field of industrial life became a field of industrial activity. The railroads of the country added hundreds and thousands of men to their employees, endeavoring to take care of the commerce of the people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, much has been said about the condition of the country immediately preceding the last revision of the tariff by the Democratic party, and it has been declared upon this floor recently that the agricultural interests of the country were in a condition of hopeless bankruptcy during the years immediately preceding the year 1893. Now, sir, the fact is that the value of farm animals for the four years from 1889 to 1892, inclusive, was nine and three-quarter billions of dollars, in round numbers. The value of farm animals from 1893 to 1896, inclusive, was $8,000,000,000, in round numbers—nearly two billions less. The value of farm products from 1889 to 1892, inclusive—that is, corn, wheat, and oats—was five and a quarter billions of dollars, and the value of corn, wheat, and oats from 1893 to 1896 was three and three-quarter billions of dollars; and the value of farm animals for the seven years following the enactment of the Dingley law was twenty and a quarter billions of dollars, and the value of corn, wheat, and oats, nine billions of dollars.

Between March 4, 1889, and March 4, 1893 (Harrison's Administration), we paid $365,500,000 of the national debt. From March, 1893, to March 4, 1897 (Cleveland's Administration), we went in debt $265,000,000. Our exports the last year of the Harrison Administration, under protection, were $334,500,000. Our exports the first year under the Cleveland Administration under the Gorman-Wilson bill were $196,000,000. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But the Democracy now claim that the tariff should be revised, and that that party should again be given the privilege of performing that important work, because it is claimed, first, that the protective policy creates and maintains trusts; second, that the products of manufacture are sold cheaper abroad than at home; and third, that the protective policy keeps us out of foreign markets.

Now, sir, upon the first of these propositions. The people of this country understand the trust question. It is well known to the reading public to-day that free trade England has her full proportion of aggregations of capital known as "trusts;" that every civilized country in the world, whether upon a free trade or protective basis, if there is a prosperous condition of industry at all, is experiencing the same conditions of organization and aggregation we are experiencing in this country. The people also know that many of the trusts in this country do not engage in the production of protected commodities.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman from Kansas submit to an interruption?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman has just made that statement. Now, will the gentleman name one trust—just one trust is all I ask—engaged in the manufacture of a nonprotected product?

Mr. OLMSTED. He might mention the Standard Oil trust.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The product of the Standard Oil trust is taxed, and the gentleman is very ignorant if he does not know it. Some time ago a Republican President and a Republican Secretary of the Treasury said that anthracite coal was not taxed, but found out that they were mistaken, and we have now in the Dingley bill a duty upon oil coming from all countries which tax American oil going into their country, and the only country——

Mr. OLMSTED. From what country does any oil come into this country?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Wait a moment. The only country which produces any oil that would compete with our oil is Russia, and Russia has a high protective tariff, and that clause of the Dingley act therefore puts a tariff upon the only oil that could compete with the oil in this country. Here it is, paragraph 626:

Provided, That if there be imported into the United States crude petroleum, or the products of crude petroleum produced in any country which imposes a duty on petroleum or its products exported from the United States, there shall in such cases be levied, paid, and collected a duty upon said crude petroleum or its products so imported equal to the duty imposed by such country.

Mr. DALZELL. Did the gentleman from Mississippi ever hear of a barrel of Russian oil being imported into the United States?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I reckon not, because you could not import it without paying a prohibitive duty—the duty levied by Russia being enormous.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I simply yielded for a question. Now, I will answer the gentleman from Mississippi. Well, beginning with a few of the smaller trusts, I mention the theater trust, the music trust [laughter on the Democratic side], and, then, there is the ice trust, a Democratic trust, organized up in the State of New York. Maybe you have heard about it. [Applause on the Republican side.] Then there is the cotton trust. The Standard Oil trust has been mentioned, and there is the beef trust.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, their product bears a duty.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But the duty does not create the trust. Do you object to the duty on beef and beef cattle?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; I object to the beef trust. Do you?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I object to the trust, but not to the duty on beef and cattle. Then there is the Northern Securities trust, which is bursted. [Applause.] There is the railroad trust, the big store trust, the school-book trust, and there are many others not engaged in the manufacture of protected products.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No; but they are built upon protected rails and run with protected machinery, and thereby the cost of the plant is made too high for ready competition.

Mr. CAMPBELL. They pay what you call the tariff tax. They are part of the people who you say are robbed. They are not enriched by it, and upon the theory of the Democracy they would be impoverished by it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The people pay for the railroad iron.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is merely a speculative question.

Why, Mr. Chairman, most of the large fortunes that have been accumulated in this country have been accumulated by men who have never engaged in the manufacture of a protected industry. A list of the multimillionaires will disclose the fact that the money has been made in railroading, mining, banking, invention, telegraph, telephone, express company, merchandising, importing, and many out of the increase in real estate values, and a few out of manufacture.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, will the gentleman have the kindness to answer one other question? The gentleman cites great fortunes made in mines. Is the gentleman not aware of the fact that coal is protected, that copper is protected, that iron is protected, that mica is protected about one thousand and some odd per cent, and every one of these things he has cited is protected?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have not said that everyone engaged in mining accumulated great fortunes, nor that all mine industries were not protected.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. You did say they made it in mining.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; I said some made it in mining.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And I am calling the gentleman's attention to that fact.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; and many fortunes have been due to discoveries and inventions; the telephone, the telegraph, and many others of that kind go to make up the great fortunes of this country.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. One other question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman contend that there is a national ice trust in this country?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do, sir; I understand there is a national ice trust in this country.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I did not know it before, if there is.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I understand there is an ice trust.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And do you know whether Canadian ice has a tariff upon it or not?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have not heard of any.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, a moment ago I understood the gentleman to state that copper was on the free list.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I find, on page 13 of the Dingley Act, under the head of "Ware," clause 137, the following:

Round iron or steel wire, not smaller than No. 13 wire gauge, 1½ cents per pound; smaller than No. 13 and not smaller than No. 16 wire gauge, 1¼ cents per pound; smaller than No. 16 wire gauge, 2 cents per pound: Provided, That all the foregoing valued at more than 4 cents per pound shall pay 40 per cent ad valorem.

Iron, or steel, or other wire not specially provided for in this act, including such as is commonly known as hat wire or bonnet wire, crinoline wire, corset wire, needle wire, piano wire, clock wire, and watch wire, whether flat or otherwise, and corset clasps, corset steels, and dress steels, and sheet steel in strips, twenty-five one-thousandths of an inch thick or thinner, any of the foregoing, whether uncovered or covered with cotton, silk, metal, or other material, valued at more than 4 cents per pound, 45 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That articles manufactured from iron, steel, brass, or copper wire, shall pay the rate of duty imposed upon the wire used in the manufacture of such articles, and in addition thereto 1½ cents per pound, except that wire rope and wire strand shall pay the maximum rate of duty which would be imposed upon any wire used in the manufacture thereof, and in addition thereto 1 cent per pound; and on iron or steel wire coated with zinc, tin, or any other metal, two-tenths of 1 cent per pound in addition to the rate imposed on the wire from which it is made.

Again, I find this:

176. Copper in rolled plates, called braziers' copper, sheets, rods, pipes, and copper bottoms, 2½ cents per pound; sheathing or yellow metal of which copper is the component material of chief value, and not composed wholly or in part of iron ungalvanized, 2 cents per pound.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is not that a product of copper?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. There are two parts of the act that I want to read from. I find in section 193 of the same act the following:

Articles or wares not specially provided for in this act, composed wholly or in part of iron, steel, lead, copper, nickel, pewter, zinc, gold, silver, platinum, aluminum, or other metal, and whether partly or wholly manufactured, 45 per centum ad valorem.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I concede all that.

Mr. DALZELL. Now, will the gentleman from Mississippi turn to the free list?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, I do not say that copper ore is not on the free list. Copper is there and copper is protected, but you have got to use copper ore after you get it, and if it is protected in the manufactured state, why, then, the man who makes the money out of it makes money out of it by having the use of it—that is, the use of the ore protected.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The man who made the money out of it is the man who mined the ore—the crude product, the raw material.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him——

Mr. CAMPBELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] read a section, and the first line of it put him down. It said on articles not otherwise provided for, and copper in the ingot form is specifically provided for elsewhere, absolutely free, on page 53—"copper in plates, bars, ingots, or pigs, and other forms not manufactured or specially provided for in this act"—so that it is free, not only the ore, but the manufactured copper if in forms of ingots, pigs, etc., ready for other processes. The part of the law which the gentleman read gave simply things which were manufactured from copper—not copper itself at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, "the gentleman from Mississippi" read the law and the law speaks for itself. I admit that copper ore is on the free list, but the broad statement was made that copper was on the free list.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But copper ore is on the free list.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Co per ore is, but copper products are not.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was talking about the large fortunes made out of the mining of copper and I did not speak of copper products in manufacture.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, the proposition involved in the law that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has read is the protection to the labor on American articles, the American laboring man as against the labor abroad, while as against the producer of the raw material there is no semblance of protection at all.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is true.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You might as well say that because there is a duty on gold jewelry that therefore there is a protective tariff on gold ore.

Mr. WATSON. The gentleman from Mississippi has said that copper was one of the protected industries. Copper is on the free list and has been for some time in this country, and under the law of 1897 copper ore in all its forms is on the free list, and is not a protected article now and has not been for many years.

Mr. SULZER. Is not that because we are are large exporters of copper?

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is not the question. The gentleman from Mississippi implied that fortunes had been built up in mining because, he concluded, mine products were protected.

Mr. WATSON. And I am calling the gentleman's attention to the fact that it is not a protected industry and has not been for many years.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Now, then, I think we may pass that as settled.

Mr. VAN DUZER. Will the gentleman tell me how the price of copper is regulated?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The way the price of things is generally regulated.

Mr. VAN DUZER. Regulated by the copper trust?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Copper is not a protected industry. How can you have a trust without protection? How can you have a copper trust and have copper ore on the free list?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman agree that the protective tariff makes trusts; that you can not have a trust without protection?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The Democratic party says that you can not have a trust without protection; that protection is the mother of trusts, and that she sustains and suckles them.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understood the gentleman to say that you could not have a trust without protection.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That was a mere matter of irony, in answer to the gentleman from Nevada. I contend, on the contrary, that protection neither creates nor fosters trusts.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly.

Mr. POU. I want to call attention to the fact that the Republican convention in the State of Iowa also declared that protection was the mother of trusts.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well there were some up in Iowa who were evidently planning to help the Democratic party get an issue for the campaign of 1904.

Mr. GROSVENOR. In that connection you may as well say that protection and trusts, put in the tail end of the Iowa platform, have been repudiated by the Republicans of the State and fully eliminated out of their next platform.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is true, and the man who made the contention has abandoned the idea that protection shelters trusts even in Iowa, and has gone to the idea that whatever is done for the theory of free trade must be done through free-trade reciprocity.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You spoke of a great many fortunes having been made recently. Were not great fortunes made during the low-tariff period from 1846 to 1850 when copper, gold, and silver were discovered in California?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The fortunes made in those days and in those States were very rapidly passed over to Europe to buy cheap products of manufactures upon which the people might live. There are few, if any, fortunes now in this country that started in 1846 or 1848.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman would go to California—to San Francisco—and some of the great cities out there he would see the effect of the discovery of gold and silver and copper during the low-tariff period of 1846 to 1860, which was dug out of the ground just as we silver men want to do now if you would let us.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I simply yielded for a question, not for a speech on the silver question.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if it were true that the policy of protection made trusts possible in the first place and made their continuance possible in the second place, we must still object to the remedy the Democratic party proposes, to wit: If any trust is engaged in the manufacture of a protected commodity, put that commodity in open competition with the products of the world. This plan of the Democratic party would open the markets of this country to all the world if any of the articles manufactured in whole or in part, produced in whole or in part, by aggregations of capital known as trusts. That would be just like shooting into a chicken coop full of chickens with a double-barreled shotgun with both barrels for the purpose of killing a weasel. [Laughter and applause.]

Twenty furnaces are independent, five furnaces are in a trust, all produce a like product. The products of the whole are put upon the free list for the purpose of destroying the trust. Three hundred factories are independent, 10 are in the trust. The products of all are put upon the free list for the purpose of destroying the 10 in the trust.

When you draw the fire in a furnace or close the door of a factory, whether it is one of a combine or maintains its independence, you throw the workmen employed by that furnace or in that factory out of employment.

Nothing is truer than that if the people of this country are supplied by the manufacturers and labor of foreign countries, whether the purpose be to destroy trusts or to establish free trade, the manufacturers and laborers of this country will not be called upon for those supplies, and just to the extent that they are not called upon for them will our factories close their doors and our labor go without work. There is no question that the proposed remedy will accomplish its purpose. It will destroy the trusts, but their destruction will take with it the last employment of thousands and tens of thousands of men and darken with despair homes now bright and cherry with prosperity.

The trust question was not a serious one from 1893 to 1896, when industrial paralysis extended into every avenue and industry in our whole country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is not the intention of the Republican party to wreck the prosperity of this country in order to control the trusts.

A patriot and a statesman at the White House, conscientiously devoted to the well-being of the whole country, alert alike to the welfare of the rich and the poor, the employer and the employed; with competent and able assistants in all the Departments of Government, is controlling and regulating, rather than destroying, the enterprises of this country, by whatever name they may be known. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, as to the charge that the products of manufacture are sold cheaper abroad than at home, et ergo, we should put the country upon a free-trade basis.

It has not been my privilege to see a list of the articles that are sold cheaper in foreign markets than they are in our own, and I do not deny that it is done in some particulars. I have heard it stated, however, upon as good authority that the prices quoted by those who make the charge is the retail price at home and the manufacturer's price to the jobber abroad. It was charged two years ago that sewing machines and reaping machines were selling cheaper in foreign markets than to our own people. It has been stated upon the authority of dealers in Sydney, Australia, that the Deering binder sold there for $155 to $182, while it sells here for $125; that the McCormick binder sold in Sydney for $165 to $194, and sold at home for $125; the New Home sewing machine sold in Sydney, Australia, for $55, in this country for $35.

But, if the allegation is true, it is better that American manufacturers get into foreign markets by that method than that foreign manufacturers come into American markets by the same method. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly.

Mr. POU. If the American manufacturer can sell his goods in Europe cheaper than he sells them at home and still make a profit, I ask the gentleman why that particular manufacturer still needs any protection?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, we have had experience—our markets have been exploited by foreign manufacturers.

In 1846 iron rails sold in the United States for $50 per ton. As soon as the tariff was removed by the Democratic party in 1846 English manufacturers reduced the price of iron rails to $40 per ton, swamped the American market, then after ruining that industry in this country they raised the price to $75 per ton for iron rails.

And that was not our only experience. Our markets were exploited by the manufacturers of foreign countries at another time when we were under a tariff revised by the Democratic party. As far back as 1819 Monroe says in his message of that year, referring to the way foreign manufacturers ruined our manufactures—

> Their manufactures have been shipped by the manufacturers to the United States and in many instances sold at prices below their current value at the place of manufacture. Although this practice may, from its nature, be considered temporary or contingent, it is not on that account less injurious in its effects.

We were then under the tariff act of 1816. Foreign manufacturers were exploiting our markets, ruining our manufacturing establishments, and establishing the sale of their products here.

Mr. POU. If the manufacturer in this country can make a profit by selling his goods across the water at the prices they there command, why should he be forced to go out of business?

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is not proposed to force him to go out of business. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has expired.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I yield to the gentleman ten minutes more.

Mr. CAMPBELL. To whatever extent the products of American manufacture, protected or otherwise, are sold in foreign markets cheaper than they are sold at home, the American consumer could ill afford to exchange places with the foreign consumer. A factory, a shop, a furnace, an industry of whatever nature that is established here becomes a part of the property of the great body of the American people. Taxes are paid, schoolhouses are built, and schools maintained, churches are built and maintained, the institutions of the country are supported by the industries of the country.

The manufacturer who is not engaged in producing articles on the protected schedule could not afford to have a neighboring factory engaged in some other product that is on the protected schedule, transferred, with its employees, to a foreign country. The farmer could not afford to have a manufacturing establishment engaged in producing a protected article that is sold cheaper abroad than it is at home, removed to the place abroad. So I say, to whatever extent the practice is followed, it is better for us that our manufacturers practice it in foreign markets than that the manufacturers of foreign countries should practice it in our markets. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Now, sir, as to the objection that our products are kept out of foreign markets by the policy of protection. The most emphatic answer to that objection is that it is only true in theory, and that it is in no sense true in fact.

Why, sir, we have advanced from year to year under the protective policy, from one of the lowest exporters among the great nations of the earth, until to-day we rank first. Our exports last year were one and a half billions in round numbers, while England's exports were one billion four hundred millions; Germany's one billion two hundred thousand, and France's eight hundred millions.

We have extended not only the amount but the variety of our exports from year to year, and the year that has just closed has shown the greatest export from this country that has ever been made by any one country in any one year.

GROWTH OF EXPORTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

In 1875 the exports of domestic products by the world's great exporting nations were as follows:

United Kingdom	$1,087,497,000
France	747,400,000
Germany	593,052,000
United States	497,263,737

In 1885 the domestic exports of these four countries stood as follows:

United Kingdom	$1,037,124,000
Germany	680,551,000
United States	673,593,596
France	596,000,000

In 1895 the domestic exports of the four countries were as follows:

United Kingdom	$1,100,452,000
United States	807,742,415
Germany	789,660,000
France	651,100,000

In 1903 the relative rank of the four countries in the exportation of domestic products was as follows:

United States	$1,457,565,783
United Kingdom	1,415,617,552
Germany	1,200,000,000
France	812,000,000

But we are told that we can not sell our products in the world's markets while we refuse the world the privilege of selling in our markets. But we do. [Applause on the Republican side.] Why, I knew a man once just like the Democratic party. He called every beautiful day a "weather breeder." He never got comfort or satisfaction out of anything. [Laughter.]

It is said the cost of living has increased in a greater proportion than the wage scale has been raised, therefore the tariff should be revised by the Democratic party.

Now, conceding, for the sake of the argument that some of the necessities of life are higher now than they were from 1893 to 1896 under the last revision of the tariff by the Democratic party. Bread and meat were cheap in those days, but people went without food. Clothing was cheap, but people went without raiment. Hardware and lumber were cheap, but men did not build houses. Land was cheap, but people did not buy farms. Live stock was cheap, but farmers did not buy stock. Everything was cheap, but no one could buy.

To-day bread and meat may be a little higher, but no one goes hungry. Clothing may be a little higher, but all are clad. Hardware and lumber may be a little higher, but throughout the whole land people are building houses. Farm lands have doubled in value, but all over the country men are buying farms. Many farm animals have more than doubled in value, but all over the country men are buying stock. Sites for industries are higher and material and labor are higher, but enterprising men are purchasing sites and material and establishing industries. Wages are higher, but employers are employing men. The soup house has disappeared and the market has taken its place. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

But we are told by the Democratic party that the policy of protection is in no sense entitled to credit for our splendid prosperity. The declaration is made that the beneficence of a kind Creator has thrust this prosperity upon us, and that our commercial policy has had nothing to do with it.

Now, I have been taught and have always believed that God was invariable in all His purposes and just in all His ways, and I refuse now to believe that the Divine Being would uniformly withhold from His people the blessings of prosperity and visit upon them the hardships of adversity following a revison of the tariff by the Democratic party, and lift the hand of adversity and restore prosperity following an enactment of a tarff law by the Republican party.

You see, Mr. Chairman, that would be a discrimination that could not well be harmonized with the promise that "He maketh His sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth rain upon the just and the unjust." [Applause on Republican side.]

But is it also claimed that our prosperity is the result of the additions of gold to our circulating medium; that the gold which has been gathered from all sources—from the rich mines of Alaska and from the gold fields of the gold-producing States and from trade balances in our commercial transactions with foreign countries—is responsible for it? And it is added, with a nod of warning, that it is fortunate for the Republican party that all this happened so soon after the election of William McKinley, and so immediately followed the passage of the Dingley law.

Upon that question, Mr. Chairman, it may be asserted without fear of successful contradiction that the additions of large quantities of gold to the money of our country was the result rather than the cause of conditions that gave rise to the marvelous prosperity our people have enjoyed. And I submit the proposition to the candid judgment of that portion of the Democratic party upon this floor that is lending its aid to the plan that has for its object a reorganization of that party, eliminating the proposition to coin gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 without waiting for the aid or consent of any other nation on earth, that a dollar worth 100 cents would not, either by voluntary action or by compulsory process, do business with a dollar worth fifty cents in the same market, with the same opportunities and with the same purchasing power. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The truth of this proposition is so convincing that it needs be but stated to carry the conviction of its truth.

And it may be asserted further that if Mr. Bryan had been elected President in 1896, the vast quantities of gold that have been added to the money of our country from the gold fields might still be secure in its mountain fastnesses, untouched by the hand of the gold miner and unadorned by the artist at the mint, and that the additions from the trade balances would be in other coffers than ours, and just a little less than two-thirds of the Democratic party to-day as sincerely believe this as the vast majority of the American people believed it in 1896.

So I say again, Mr. Chairman, that adversity with every variety of hardship has been visited upon the people of this country following every revision of the tariff by the Democratic party, and yet that organization stands for tariff revision to-day if it stands for anything.

Now, it may not be impertinent to ask those who have made tariff revision the issue just what schedules in the Dingley tariff they complain of. What is it that makes revision necessary or even desirable by the Democratic party? Would that party revise all or only a part of the schedules of the Dingley act? If only a part, what portion, and how much?

In what way would the changes proposed by the Democratic party be beneficial to the American people? Is the revision of the Dingley law, now demanded by the Democratic party, a continuance of the opposition of that party to the enactment of the law, or is the revision demanded because it has been discovered that the law has not operated for the benefit of the American people? What will the Democratic party give the people in the place of what we have?

Sound policy and experience forbid that we should sacrifice the employment of a single dollar or the wages of a single workman experimenting with freer trade or reciprocity in competitive products in the delusive hope of gaining wider or better markets than those we have at home. [Loud and continued applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I will now yield back the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], first asking to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] will be permitted to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I believe there is still some time remaining to the minority.

Mr. BENTON. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] two minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the other day the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOUTHWICK] caused to be inserted in the RECORD an article from the New York World, and at that time challenged me to contradict its statements. Some of it I then denied, and I said that I would perhaps later on take notice of it further. I wish now to read a letter written to me by Edward B. Whitney, of New York:

NEW YORK, March 17, 1904.

Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I read with interest this morning your remarks yesterday with reference to the action to be taken by the Administration under the decision in the Northern Securities case. As a Democrat and a member of the Department of Justice during the last Democratic Administration (who was among the counsel for the Government in the Trans-Missouri, Addyston Pipe, and Joint Traffic cases—

Remember, the New York World said the Democratic Administration had never instituted any suits against the trusts at all—and happened to be present at the oral argument of this Northern Securities case), I take the liberty of addressing you, although a stranger, for the purpose of inclosing a copy of a letter which I sent yesterday to the New York World. If that paper does not soon publish it, I presume that some other paper will do so. I do not understand why it desires persistently to misrepresent leading Democrats.

I also take the liberty of inclosing a copy of two articles of my own, which I believe were among the first published concerning the Northern Securities Company. The dissenting opinions seem to me to contain two plain fallacies—that a corporation is a person and to be treated in all respects as such (whereas in fact it is a combination of persons acting under a license) and that a share of stock is to be treated simply as a piece of property (whereas it is really a membership in an industrial quasi-partnership enterprise).

The New York Times is daily writing editorials based upon these fallacies. The New York World, on the other hand, is calling upon the Attorney-General to attack industrial trusts without showing any fact bringing them within the constitutional sphere of the Federal Government. For eleven years past it has been abusing Richard Olney for the sole reason that he did not bring suits which would have been thrown out by every court for constitutional reasons (based upon the rights of the States over purely productive industries) which every Democrat at least is bound to respect.

Very respectfully, yours,

EDWARD B. WHITNEY.

The following is the letter referred to in the foregoing written by Mr. Whitney to the New York World, disproving absolutely the statements put into the RECORD by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOUTHWICK]:

EDITOR NEW YORK WORLD.

DEAR SIR: In an editorial to-day you state that the antitrust law "remained a dead letter on the statute books during the entire term of Grover Cleveland," and that the efforts of your paper to have it enforced were met with "contempt from the Democratic Attorney-General, Richard Olney, who pretended that the law was unconstitutional and would do nothing toward prosecuting the violators of it," and that "the first effort to enforce the law" was by President Roosevelt and Attorney-General Knox.

As these statements are absolutely contrary to the facts, which are within my personal knowledge and also a matter of record, I beg to call your attention to them.

"The first effort to enforce the law" was made by Attorney-General Miller, in the Administration of President Harrison. He brought a suit for that purpose against the so-called "sugar trust." He was defeated in both of the lower courts and the case was pending in the Supreme Court when Messrs. Cleveland and Olney came into office. The Government's case was in charge of Hon. S. F. Phillips, a distinguished lawyer, who had been Solicitor-General of the United States for many years under the Administrations of Presidents Grant, Hayes, Garfield, and Arthur. Mr. Olney continued this retainer and also himself joined in the Supreme Court brief. The oral argument in that court was made for the Government by Mr. Phillips and by Lawrence Maxwell, jr., a very able and prominent lawyer, then Solicitor-General. The court held, with only one dissenting vote, that the law was unconstitutional in its application to "trusts" which were engaged in production as distinguished from transportation, and whose operations did not directly restrain interstate commerce. The reason for the decision was not that these "trusts" were innocent, but that the jurisdiction over them belonged to the States, and not to the Federal Government.

This, of course, put an end to all claim that a mere concentration of ownership in an agricultural, manufacturing, or mining industry was within the Federal power of legislation.

I am very familiar with the "efforts of the World to have the law enforced." I read many, and I think all, of the series of articles in which you endeavored to show that certain "trusts" should be prosecuted. I did so because I knew that Mr. Olney desired to bring suit under the law if any case warranting suit should be found. You showed many cases where action by State legislators was called for, but none which would justify action by the Attorney-General of the United States.

In President Harrison's Administration the suit against the Trans-Missouri Freight Association was commenced and brought to a hearing. This suit attacked an association of railroads in the far West. The Government's bill of complaint was dismissed in 1892, prior to the inauguration of President Cleveland. An appeal was prosecuted under the direction of Mr. Olney, and resulted in an affirmance by the circuit court of appeals. He then directed an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. The case in many respects was a weak one for the Government and one, therefore, which it was advisable not to hasten to an early hearing in the Supreme Court so long as there seemed to be any chance of finding a better test case. As no better could be found, it was, however, brought on for argument when reached, which was during the Cleveland Administration. It was argued by Attorney-General Harmon for the Government, with great ability, against a combination of the strongest lawyers in the United States, including Messrs. Dillon, Carter, and Phelps, of New York, and Bowers, Kenna, and Wilson, of Chicago, and resulted in a decision for the United States upon all points, the decision having been handed down a few days after the inauguration of President McKinley.

Meanwhile, however, at the direction of Attorney-General Harmon, a similar suit had been instituted in this State against the Joint Traffic Association by Wallace Macfarlane, then United States district attorney. That suit was thrown out by the lower courts upon the authority of the decision of the lower courts in the Trans-Missouri case, but the Supreme Court subsequently reversed these decisions and granted the relief sought by the Government upon the authority of its own former decision.

Attorney-General Harmon also commenced the case against the cast-iron pipe trust, United States v. Addyston Pipe and Steel Co. This was the first case in which the Government was able to secure facts sufficient to sustain suitagainstan "industrial." The bill was dismissed by the circuit judge, and the appeal could not be perfected in time for argument at the circuit court of appeals during the Cleveland Administration; but it was reached a few weeks thereafter, and as a hold-over member of that Administration I was assigned by Attorney-General (now Justice) McKenna to argue the appeal, which resulted in a unanimous decision in favor of the Government, subsequently affirmed by a unanimous decision of the United States Supreme Court.

It is true that after a period of quiet, active work under the antitrust law has been recommenced by President Roosevelt and Attorney-General Knox, but their cases have been won upon the precedents established by the Cleveland Administration. Their job has been comparatively an easy one, since they not only had those precedents behind them, but were furnished by various newspapers and others with large amounts of valuable testimony, finally receiving from Congress an appropriation of $500,000 for this special work, a sum which they have been unable to spend.

As you are a Democratic paper, I respectfully, as a Democrat, request you to give this letter (or, if you prefer, the substance thereof) a prominence in your columns equivalent to that which to-day you have given to the statements which this letter is designed to correct.

Respectfully, yours, EDWARD B. WHITNEY.

NEW YORK, March 16, 1904.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SCARBOROUGH].

Mr. SCARBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, at the proper time I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill to provied for continuing improvement on Waccamaw River, South Carolina, between Conway and Bucksville, in Horry County, and appropriating $15,000, to be expended as recommended in report of A. M. Miller, lieutenant-colonel, Corps of Engineers, United States Army.

This appropriation is absolutely necessary to the commercial interests in that section and the proper use of said river as a highway of commerce. Unless the amendment is adopted it seems there will be no sufficient amount of available funds for carrying on this necessary work.

For twenty-five years regular steamboat lines have been operating on the Waccamaw River, furnishing both freight and passenger service between Conway and Georgetown. As the business of the country has increased, traffic on the river has also steadily increased, and its importance as a commercial stream is to-day second to none in the State of South Carolina. But for the existence of a few shoals between Bucksville and Conway seagoing craft could reach the wharves at Conway and not only increase the shipping facilities of the people of that section, but also secure for them an improvement in freight rates. There is located at Conway, on the banks of this river, a large milling plant, turning out millions of feet of lumber every year, and the products of the mill are shipped by rail to northern points, although, as I said, the mill is located immediately upon the banks of this river. River steamers handle from this and other mills on the river lumber and shingles for local trade, but owing to the fact that it is expensive to handle lumber, especially that class intended for shipment to northern ports, it has been found impracticable to the mill owners along the river to ship by local steamers and have the cargo transferred to ocean steamers at Georgetown. With the contemplated improvement of Waccamaw River, large steam vessels could load at Conway for foreign ports, and vessels of large tonnage could bring our merchandise and various articles of commerce in unbroken cargo from markets of the world.

The commercial importance of Waccamaw River has been recognized for a number of years, and Congress has made a number of appropriations for the improvement of this stream. In the report of the Secretary of War made to this Congress for fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, at page 243, we find this reference to Waccamaw River:

Waccamaw River.

In 1880 this stream was navigable for 12-foot boats at all stages of water from Georgetown, 23 miles, to Bull Creek, and at high water 4 miles farther, to Buck's lower mills; thence for 7-foot-draft boats, at high water, 22 miles farther, to Conway; thence it possessed an obstructed channel for 3-foot-draft boats, at ordinary winter water, 68 miles, to Reeves Ferry; thence an obstructed channel, with 3 feet at high water, for 30 miles, to Lake Waccamaw.

The project of improvement, adopted in 1880, provides for a channel 12 feet deep at all stages of water, with 80 feet bottom width from the mouth of the river to Conway, thence a cleared channel to Lake Waccamaw.

The original estimated cost was $29,370, which was revised in 1885 and increased in the annual report of that year to the present figure, $138,400. In the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1896, page 170, maintenance is estimated at $4,000 per year after completion of improvement.

The total expenditure to June 30, 1903, was $104,422.45. The river had been cleared of snags to a distance of 128 miles above the mouth, and this portion of the river had been frequently resnagged as appropriations permitted, 38,220 snags, etc., having been removed since June 30, 1884. Some work had been done toward increasing the original depth on eight shoals below Conway. As nearly as could be determined from the records, about $75,977.81 had been expended in originally snagging the lower 128 miles of the river and in constructing pile and plank dikes at eight shoals and $28,444.64 in maintenance.

The available depths reported as now existing do not differ greatly from the original depths. At mean low water about 11 feet can be carried to Bucksville, 34 miles above the mouth; about 6 feet to Toddsville, 38½ miles; about 4 feet to Conway, 50 miles; about 2 feet to Wortham's bridge, 97 miles. At high water large side-wheelers can go to Red Bluff, 74 miles, and small boats to Reeves Ferry, 117 miles. The usual variation in water level is about 7.5 feet at Conway, 50 miles above the mouth, and about 12 feet at Star Bluff, 84 miles above the mouth.

The tidal influence at low water extends 97 miles above the mouth.

1895	128,466	2,063,697.00

In the river and harbor bill passed in the Fifty-seventh Congress $9,000 was appropriated for Waccamaw River, and a survey was ordered with a view to providing for a 12-foot channel for the portion of the river lying between Bucksville and Conway. It was thought by the local engineer that this could be accomplished by dredging out certain shoals in the river between those points. The survey was completed during the fall of 1903, and estimates have been furnished showing the probable cost of completing the project according to the estimates and plans made from 1880 up to 1886. While there is some difference of opinion among the officers composing the Board of Engineers on Rivers and Harbors as to what depth and width of channel is required, whether a 6-foot channel, a 9-foot channel, or a 12-foot channel, as mentioned in the original project should be undertaken, yet they all agree that the river is worthy of improvement, and in their several reports show by statistics the commerce of the river and its importance as one of the great waterways of the State. I submit now extracts from the report of G. P. Howell, captain, Corps of Engineers, contained in letter of Hon. William H. Taft, Secretary of War, dated February 4, 1904, addressed to the Speaker of the House (Document No. 514):

Survey of Waccamaw River, North and South Carolina.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Charleston, S. C., December 8, 1903.

GENERAL: In compliance with instructions contained in letter from Office Chief of Engineers, United States Army, July 22, 1903, I have the honor to submit the following report of survey of the Waccamaw River, South Carolina, below Conway, with estimates of cost for channels 6, 9, and 12 feet deep, respectively:

Allowing for the dredging in the river proper that will be avoided by making the cut-offs, the estimates for a channel 100 feet wide are as follows:

Six-foot depth:
Dredging in river proper, 14,588 cubic yards, at 12 cents	$1,750.56
Cut-offs, 197,866 cubic yards, at 18 cents	35,615.88
Contingencies, about 10 per cent	2,633.56
Total	40,000.00
Nine-foot channel:
Dredging in river proper, 124,855 cubic yards, at 12 cents	14,982.60
Cut-offs, 265,426 cubic yards, at 18 cents	47,776.68
Contingencies, about 10 per cent	7,240.72
Total	70,000.00
Twelve-foot channel:
Dredging in river proper, 397,624 cubic yards, at 12 cents	47,714.88
Cut-offs, 333,706 cubic yards, at 18 cents	60,066.54
Contingencies, about 10 per cent	12,218.58
Total	120,000.00

A 12-foot channel will enable seagoing vessels and barges to load up the river and go to sea without breaking bulk at Georgetown. The original project, made in 1880, provided for a 12-foot channel to Conway, and since then sawmills have sprung up along the bank, sending to market yellow-pine lumber, cypress shingles, etc. Schooners drawing from 8 to 12 feet already ply on the lower stretches of the river, and there is reason to believe that with sufficient water they would go to the mills higher up. The 6-foot channel would enable the side-wheel steamers that now run on the river to have good water at all times, especially in the low water period when cotton is moving.

There is not much necessity for a 9-foot channel, as the river steamers do not require it and it is not enough for seagoing vessels.

It is recommended that the original project for a 12-foot channel to Conway be maintained and that the cost be placed at $120,000.

Attention is invited to the fact that up to mile 13 and a little beyond Bucksville very little dredging is required for a 12-foot channel. Bucksville is the last settlement of any size along the river until Conway is reached. The cost of a 12-foot channel to Bucksville and a 6-foot channel beyond to Conway will be as follows:

12-foot channel from Bull Creek to mile 13	$15,000
6-foot channel from mile 13 to Conway	35,000
Total	50,000

This modified plan is recommended if the 12-foot channel all the way to Conway is not adopted.

It is estimated that the annual cost of snagging on the river above Conway will be $5,000.

G. P. HOWELL,
Captain, Corps of Engineers.

Brig. Gen. G. L. GILLESPIE,
Chief of Engineers, U. S. A.
(Through the division engineer.)

In the letter of Capt. Ried Whitford, assistant engineer, who made the survey and whose letter is referred to in that portion of the report of Captain Howell not quoted, we find this language:

The amount of commerce on the Waccamaw River for the calendar year 1902, as reported and printed, was 141,686 tons, valued at $1,844,019, belonging to the Waccamaw River proper, without anything from its neighboring river, the Great Pedee, whose entire commerce is carried over the lower part of the Waccamaw.

Now, I would have it understood that in offering the proposed amendment I am not seeking to inaugurate a new scheme or plan for the improvement of this river, neither am I attempting to secure an appropriation to carry out in detail the recommendation of the board of engineers of river and harbor improvement. On the contrary, I am rather in between the two propositions and am asking for this small appropriation because it is absolutely necessary that work should be done at once on the shoals referred to in Captain Howell's report in order that we may have an open channel and that navigation be made as easy as it was a few years ago.

It may be asked why we are now making complaint about the shoals lying between Conway and Bucksville, when no specific appropriation for their removal has heretofore been asked for. The answer is not hard to give. This river is a tidal stream, running through a level section of the country, and the current is, for that reason, necessarily slow. At Conway the tide has a 2-foot rise only. The fact that even that much tide is found so far from the ocean shows that the river passes through a level country, has very little fall and very little velocity. For many years the people of that section of country have given much attention to cutting and marking timber. The banks of Waccamaw River and the country adjacent abound in pine and cypress, and hence great quantities of timber are floated on this stream. In recent years, since lumber has commanded a fair price, there has been unusual activity among timber and lumber dealers and manufacturers, and the river is always more or less full of rafts being carried to market or moored to the banks for safe-keeping. There are considerable drift logs and various kinds of trash in the river and occasionally a raft gets broken up or some of the timbers composing the raft get loose and sink.

During freshets in the river there is much drifting débris carried downstream with the ebb and coming upstream with the flood. These floating derelicts strike on shoal places and oftentimes sink, become embedded in the sand, and thus build up and increase the natural obstruction. Of course in streams where the velocity is great such as this would not occur. So it is apparent that it is necessary to remove the shoals that the action of the water may be free and the channel of the river kept washed out. At low water and low tide steamers plying between Conway and Georgetown are oftentimes much delayed in getting over these shoals. Therefore, I repeat that the amendment which I expect to offer is of vital importance and should be adopted.

It may be suggested, however, that the amendment is subject to a point of order. I do not believe that such a contention could be sustained even under the most technical construction of the rule, for the amendment does not propose to change existing law, nor does it propose the inauguration of any new scheme of river improvement. A casual reference to the report which I have read—and I have not thought proper to encumber the record with the entire series of reports relating to this matter—will show that for a number of years the War Department has had charge of this river, and that practically every river and harbor bill passed in the last twenty years has made some appropriation for its improvement. Indeed, the reports which I have read refer to the "project" as to some well defined and understood plan.

Of course, it can not be truthfully contended that Waccamaw River improvement is under what is called the "continuous-contract system." I think it should be, but it is not. At the same time it is to all intents and purposes being improved under that plan. You will remember that the reports refer to the original plan, and appropriations from time to time have been made in pursuance of the general plan inaugurated years ago. Simply because this river is not under the continuous-contract system, shall it be said that much-needed improvement—work absolutely necessary to allow commerce of the river to be carried on from day to day—shall be left to stand over until another session of Congress?

The estimated cost of the original plan for the improvement of the river was $138,400. (See Annual Report of Chief of Engineers, 1885, p. 1105, and for 1886, p. 1022.) Under that plan, and to carry out the suggestions of the officers in charge, $111,900 have been appropriated, and the project as originally outlined is not yet complete. Still, as I have tried to show, my purpose in asking for the adoption of the proposed amendment is not to carry out the original plan, but merely to secure an appropriation for present relief.

It may be asked again why it is that I offer this as an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill rather than to the regular river and harbor bill. My answer is that I have no assurance that there will be any river and harbor bill at the present session. It is true the public prints state that a river and harbor bill, carrying a small appropriation to carry on existing contracts, will be reported at this session, but I would be unwilling to risk getting an amendment incorporated in that bill, if it should be offered. At any rate, I will first take my chances on this bill, and, failing here, make another attempt when that bill is under consideration, providing, of course, that amendments are in order. What assurance have we, however, that such bill, if reported, will not be considered under the drastic rule, sometimes in use in the House, cutting off debate and making it in order to move the previous question without amendment or intervening motion?

"The powers that be" have not seen fit to invoke that rule as to the pending bill, and yet, I repeat, we have no assurance that such will not be applied if the river and harbor bill is reported. I have not taken the trouble to ascertain whether any river and harbor bill has ever been considered under that rule of this House, but we all know that other bills of great importance have been considered under this far-reaching and drastic rule; and if the majority has determined within what limits appropriations at this Congress may go, why it requires no stretch of imagination to see that they will go to any length to accomplish that purpose and apply the rule if it suits their purpose. By way of parentheses, let me say that the far-reaching power of the Committee on Rules is a standing menace to the legislative interest of the country. It would be hard indeed to make our constituents understand that in this great legislative body, under any possible circumstances, a bill could be passed through this House not subject to amendment.

I must confess that to my mind it is a monstrous subversion of the rights of the individual member to the bigoted and arrogant demand of an unscrupulous majority. I care not who is responsible for the first adoption of the rule, the result is the same, and when the Republican party "takes the bit in its mouth" the constituents of the Democratic Members are practically without a voice in the legislation of the country. The popular conception, I apprehend, of the American Congress among the people at large is that any Member may, at any time, rise in his seat and approve or disapprove of a pending measure, or, if so disposed, may offer amendments to it. I believe such should be the rule, and I believe, further, that the extraordinary powers vested in the Speaker of the House and the Committee on Rules have no parallel in any other legislative body in Christendom.

But why is it that we are to have no river and harbor bill at the present session? No person disputes the urgent necessity for liberal appropriations along that line, and such appropriation should be made. As was said by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS], in a speech in this House a few days ago, the money expended in the building of a single battle ship authorized under the recent naval appropriation bill would go far toward opening up the proposed inland waterway about which he was speaking. Of course I have not quoted his exact language, but I adopt the idea which he advanced and recommend to the Republican party a careful reading of the gentleman's very interesting speech. We hear it said, and we see it in the public prints, that only by cutting down the appropriations can we avoid a deficit for the present fiscal year. Now, this is strange. Have the ordinary, legitimate expenses of the Government been radically increased? Yet we are told that retrenchment is necessary. I say all this is strange, for almost every day some overzealous member on the Republican side takes occasion to felicitate himself and congratulate the country upon the unexampled prosperity (?) that has come to us through the administration of the Republican party. I am not advised that there has been any appreciable shrinkage in revenue, or any sudden and unexpected expenses to be met, for the payment of which it is necessary to divert funds which might otherwise be used in carrying on much-needed internal improvement.

But in spite of this much-landed, much-boasted Republican "golden age," the astute leaders of the Republican party say that river and harbor improvements must, to a great extent, go over to another session, and that no public-building bills can be passed at this time. To one not schooled in the art of dissimulation the position of the Republicans in the instances cited is, to say the least, radically inconsistent. Why can not these important interests receive consideration now as well as at the next session?

If we are at the high tide of our prosperity now, why wait until next winter to pass these bills, and pray tell me why we will be more able then than now to carry on our public improvements?

You gentlemen on the Republican side of the Chamber declare that yours is the party that does things; that your strenuous, purposeful President—so broad minded and so liberal that, like the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], who addressed the House on Monday, he does not let a little matter of color affect his ideas of social relations—is preeminently one who does things, and that the country is safe only in the hands of your party.

I have a suspicion that among the conservative members of your party it will be admitted that both your party and the President have done many things which they should not have done, and, as the oft-quoted expression runs, "left undone many things which should have been done." When this temporary hallucination shall have passed away and the first feeling of exultation and pride at success of our Army and Navy in the Spanish-American war shall have subsided, the great American people will then be able to fully understand the result of the policies inaugurated by the Republican party and, in my judgment, will repudiate the fallacies which that party, especially in recent years, has taught. Instead of being content to cultivate the arts of peace and build up our waste places, you have committed this country to a policy of aggression and spoliation. Contrary to the traditions of the past and the very principles upon which the Republic is founded, you are reaching out for more territory and more responsibility.

To be a world power is an expensive luxury. It means not only to take position, but maintain it; and the imperialistic tendencies of the Republican party if unchecked will still further divert us from the paths of safety and real international greatness, will drain our Treasury to sustain an immense army and navy, and practically indefinitely postpone the system of internal improvement which was inaugurated before the idea of conquests and spoils entered the public mind. It seems to me that if money for needed improvement is lacking it is not because our revenues are not ample, but because our policies are altogether wrong; and when gentlemen tell us that the Government at this time is not able to meet its expenses and appropriate money for internal improvement, I want to remind them that an economical administration of governmental affairs would leave us ample funds for all legitimate purposes, and I would especially remind them further that the $15,000 appropriation which I am asking for Waccamaw River is only one-fourth the amount deemed necessary for the erection of stables at the White House.

The expenses of the Government amount annually to about $740,000,000 in round numbers. About one-fifth of this amount—to wit, $140,000,000—is paid out in pensions for which no present actual equivalent is rendered, and the recent Executive order will increase this amount probably $10,000,000. Out of this pension fund $648,053.04 is paid out to pensioners living beyond the limits of the United States. Where will this "pension grab" stop?

The army and navy expenses are increasing from year to year because of the Republican party's ill-starred and criminal policy of aggression, and amount to nearly a million dollars a day, and only a change of policy will save the country from calamities which naturally follow persistent and continued violation not only of sound economic principles, but the principles of justice and right.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time—fifty minutes—to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have observed that some of our Republican friends have been devoting considerable time recently to the preparation of a Democratic platform, and have become very much concerned about Democratic issues for the next election. Even the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury shows considereble anxiety upon that subject.

Now, I am not surprised that Republicans should devote a good deal of time to these harmless exercises, because, as was very truthfully said by a prominent Republican on this floor some time ago, Republicans this year do not have to make new speeches or prepare new platforms, for the reason that the same old speech and the same old platform will answer the same old purpose. And why not? Why should not the Republican platform of 1900 serve them just as well in 1904? What pledge have they kept, what promise have they observed, that would require a single elimination or change? Have they not stood pat on every plank since the time of its adoption?

They declared in favor of reciprocity, and yet the Republican party has not taken a single step in that direction since the election of 1900.

They declared against the trusts, and yet they have made no substantial effort to eliminate those evils.

They declared in favor of statehood for the Territories, and yet no State has been admitted into the Union.

So, Mr. Chairman, I insist that for all practical purposes the Republican platform for 1900 is just as good as new. These gentlemen need not be worried about Democratic issues. There will be plenty of issues to keep the Republican party busy in its own defense. The line between Democracy and Republicanism will be just as clearly defined in the next campaign as in any previous election.

The revision of the tariff is frequently suggested as a very probable issue in the next campaign; and why should it not be? It was upon this question that the Democratic party won such a decisive victory in 1892. What has occurred since then to weaken that issue before the people? I know, Mr. Chairman, that others as well as the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] have often denounced on this floor the Wilson law as a "free-trade" measure; but those who will take the pains to read that law will find what an unjust and untrue criticism that is. I had the honor of being a member of the House when the Wilson bill was considered and passed. I know why it did not represent the full measure of tariff-reform sentiment then existing in the country. It was because the Democrats had such a slender majority in the Senate, and the rules of that body were such that the opponents of the Wilson bill would have been able to defeat it entirely had not their wishes prevailed in amending many of its schedules.

You have often heard the sugar schedule of the Wilson law denounced upon this floor as favoring the sugar trust; and yet in that great fight the sugar trust had no abler or bolder defender upon the floor of the Senate than a prominent Republican member of that body, one who stood high in the councils of his party, and, I might add, one who left many of his impressions upon the Wilson bill before it finally passed the Senate. So the sugar schedule, as many other provisions in the Wilson bill, remained there, not because they met the approval of the tariff reformers then in Congress, but because it was that or no legislation at all. You gentlemen who remember the fate of the Force bill in the Senate can understand just how such things are accomplished as those to which I have referred.

The Wilson law was very unfortunate in another particular, because it went into operation in the midst of a great panic, which began under the Administration of President Harrison and continued under the Administration of Mr. Cleveland. And when it is no longer necessary to use that unfortunate period for partisan purposes, when the time comes for the impartial historian to record that great panic and assign its causes, he will find no act of Congress that contributed more to its origin than the Sherman law, passed by the Republican party, and the McKinley act, then fresh upon the statute books.

I have often thought, Mr. Chairman, how fortunate it would have been for the Republican party if poor old Horace Greeley had been elected in 1872. Then you could have charged his administration with the great panic of 1873. [Applause.] But who has ever heard a Republican in this House, or elsewhere, refer to the panic of 1873; and if he should, he would most certainly charge it up to the mistakes of the Almighty. [Applause.] I allude, Mr. Chairman, to this great panic under the Administrations of Mr. Harrison and Mr. Cleveland not for the purpose of trying to fix its responsibility upon the Republican party; for I know these periods of great depression are often due to natural causes and conditions in other countries over which this Government has no control. But I refer to it for the purpose of showing the unfortunate conditions, the unfavorable circumstances under which the Wilson law went into operation, and the very poor opportunity tariff reform had to test its efficiency as a policy at that time.

The Wilson law was soon repealed by a highly protective measure, because the Republicans, instead of crediting their great victory in 1894 to the real cause, which was the hard times then oppressing the country, accepted their success as a vindication of high protection, became more extreme in their views than ever, and placed upon the statute books the most prohibitory measure ever enacted by Congress. In answer to the Republican demands for better markets abroad, the principle of reciprocity had been incorporated in the McKinley act, but with very little effect upon our exports.

I confess, Mr. Chairman, that after listening to the very eloquent tributes paid to reciprocity under the McKinley law, and the wonderful results of its adoption, I could scarcely belive my own eyes when I came to read the report of our imports and exports with those countries with which we had reciprocal agreements under the McKinley act. The figures from the Government reports, which I shall incorporate with my remarks, will show what a complete failure was reciprocity under the McKinley law so far as having any material effect upon our volume of commerce.

Below I give the countries with which we had reciprocal agreements under the McKinley act, and our imports and exports with those countries for the years therein stated:

[d] Treaty period, June 12, 1900—still in force.
[e] Treaty period, June 1, 1898–March 23, 1900.

Under the first provision we have reciprocal agreements with Germany, France, Italy, Portugal, and Switzerland, and our imports and exports with those countries are as stated above for the years therein designated.

It will be observed that while there has been no material increase of our exports to any of the countries above named on account of reciprocity, there has really been a decrease in some cases, and the increases are not as great in proportion as with some countries where we had no reciprocity. This is the full limit of reciprocity under the Dingley act, and the results are entirely too meager to have any material bearing upon our imports and exports.

Now, we have one provision left, and that is the one contained in the fourth section of the Dingley law, which requires the Senate to ratify the reciprocal treaties negotiated by the President. While a number of treaties have been negotiated under that provision and sent to the Senate, yet the highly protected industries of this country so far have been able to defeat them all, and that provision has virtually remained a dead letter upon the statute books, though it was this provision that furnished such an inspiring theme for Republican speeches in the House and the Senate at the time it was under consideration, and upon which such wonderful results were predicted.

So, Mr. Chairman, a careful review of our imports and exports will convince any reasonable mind that Republican reciprocity, neither under the McKinley act nor under the Dingley law, has added any material volume to the commerce of our country. The gentleman from Kansas, just a few moments ago, undertook to attribute to protection and reciprocity our increase in imports and exports, but if you will notice the Government reports for the last few years you will discover that our great increase in imports and exports is due neither to reciprocity nor to protection, because the great bulk of our commerce has been with those countries where we had no reciprocity and in products not protected. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

While the Republican party has had such encouraging conditions to inaugurate reciprocity during the last two Administrations these are the full measure of its accomplishments. These are the puny results of that Republican reciprocity, so often christened in this House as the "twin sister of protection," and, judging from her insignificant achievements thus far attained, this "twin sister of protection" will never become anything more than a Lilliputian in the commerce of our country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I make these observations, not for the purpose of condemning the general principle of reciprocity, but in order to demonstrate that the reciprocity, which a high protective tariff is willing to tolerate, must be confined within such narrow limits that its results become insignificant in our international trade. If we should have reciprocity broad enough to include any considerable trade between this and other countries I should welcome it as a blessing to our people.

So, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the issue of tariff reform is stronger now than in 1892. Since that time some new and very obnoxious features of high protection have developed, or at least have made a stronger impression upon the people. Then it was not so generally understood that American consumers were paying higher prices for American manufactured goods than foreign consumers, nor had these retaliatory measures with which foreign countries have been meeting our prohibitory duties been so keenly felt by our people. We have certainly lived long enough under these trade restrictions for Republicans as well as Democrats to learn that protection high enough to keep out imports will keep in exports; that no country is going to continue to buy where it can never sell; that empty ships are not going to seek our shores in search of American products.

For years I listened to Republicans in this House contending that if we would shut out a certain class of foreign goods and manufacture them in our own country we would thereby give that much more to American labor and keep our money at home, just as though we were paying cash for all our imports; but these zealous advocates of protection have at last recognized the fact that we buy foreign products with American products, and when you shut out the foreign products you shut in the American products; and if you permit an exchange it will never take place except when profitable to both parties. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

While the protectionist has always insisted that a high tariff would build up the home market, it has never been contended that these burdens upon our commerce would in any way improve our foreign markets, and to-day American products have so far outgrown American markets until the manufacturers and farmers alike are appealing to Congress for freer commerce with other countries in order that their surplus may find a market there. Our power of production has become so much greater than our consumption that we are compelled to compete in the open markets of the world whether we desire to do so or not.

We have reached that stage in our national development when our manufacturers and farmers must depend very largely upon the foreign market for the further growth and success of their business in the future. Then why should we not adopt a national policy that will enable them to place their products in the foreign market at as little cost as possible? That is the way to capture the world's trade, because customers, as a rule, are going to buy where they can secure the best bargains; and I am vain enough, I am American enough, to believe that with all our natural resources, with the inventive genius of our people, the superior skill and efficiency of our labor and its ready adaptability to the use of new machinery, we are able to compete successfully with any country in all those products for which our people and our country are best adapted. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But in order to do this we must give our manufacturers cheap raw material, and our farmers cheaper machinery, and our people cheaper necessaries of life.

I believe such a policy will be beneficial not only to our manufacturers and farmers, but to all laboring classes, because the cheaper you make farm machinery, the cheaper you make clothing, and other manufactured products, the more will be sold both at home and abroad, and the greater the amount sold the greater will be the demand for American labor in their production.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad to observe that the American manufacturer has at last discovered that he is interested not only in obtaining a etter foreign market for his own surplus products, but he is also interested in securing a good foreign market for agricultural products. Because, when the American farmer fails to find a good market for his own products, he at once becomes a poorer customer for the American manufacturer. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Under our present restrictive policy we are turning some of the best customers of our farmers away to other lands, where new fields of agriculture are being developed to come in competition with the American farmer, and the American farmer will have to compete with these foreign farmers at the great disadvantage of paying a higher price for American machinery than his foreign competitors are paying for the same articles. [Applause.] In other words, American manufacturers are selling farm machinery to our farmers in this country at higher prices than they are to farmers in foreign countries.

And what is true of farm machinery is true of many of the necessaries of life. Now, the contention of the Democratic party is that if the American manufacturer to-day can ship his goods into a foreign market and after paying freight and other charges sell them in competition with the foreign manufactured product without protection, he ought to be able to sell them in our home market with less protection than 40, 60, 80, or 100 per cent without being paralyzed or driven out of business. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, whenever an attempt is made to reduce these high duties the protectionist at once raises the cry of free trade. And yet every person of common sense knows that we are not going to have free trade in this country under the Democratic party or any other party. So long as this Government requires revenue to administer it, so long, in my judgment, will we have a tariff, and so long as we have a tariff so long will we have protection. It is not a question between protection and free trade, it is a question between unreasonably high duties and more moderate ones. The one prohibits trade the other invites it; the one diminishes revenue and the other increases it.

It seems to me that no political party can afford to stand pat for any great length of time on any protective schedule, either in justice to consumers or in justice to the revenues of the Government. Because a rate of duty which may be reasonable this year and yield some revenue to the Government, next year on account of new inventions and new appliances in reducing the cost of production may become prohibitory and yield no revenue whatever to the Government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe the Democratic party is just as patriotic as the Republican party. I believe they are just as anxious for the general welfare of our country, and when they come into power next November they will recognize the fact that many of these great industries have grown up under the protective system and still believe that they are dependent upon it whether true or not, and they will take all these conditions into consideration when they come to revise the tariff schedules.

Mr. STANLEY. The gentleman from Illinois does not mean to say that he thinks the Democratic party is coming into power in November?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I have passed beyond the thinking stage; I am about positive, my friend. I say they will take all these things into consideration when they come to revise the tariff. They do not expect to revise it in a reckless or revolutionary way, with an effort to destroy, because they do not believe in the principle of high protection: it will be a gradual revision, but an effective one; not to disturb or destroy business, but to increase it.

The just rights of every industry will be carefully guarded, but the legislation enacted will not be in the interests of any particular class, but for the benefit of the entire country. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that conditions are much more favorable for a contention for more liberal trade relations now than they were in 1892. Our surplus products for export are much greater now than then, and the demand for foreign markets is constantly increasing, and I believe all classes of our people take a broader view of our trade conditions now than then.

They recognize that our restrictive tariff affects our markets abroad as well as at home, and in the great international struggle now going on for the supremacy of the world's trade they see other nations bending all their energies to secure additional markets, while some of our own are gradually slipping away; and while these rapid changes are taking place and the people are appealing to Congress for better trade arrangements, they see the Republican party standing pat on its glories of the past and its fears of the future, with a President too cowardly to even refer to the subject in his last annual message and a floor leader who openly admits in the House that the Republican party dare not touch the tariff until after the election. I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that there are many Republicans in this country favoring a revision of the tariff who would prefer to see it revised by the friends of protection; but when they see them in power in every branch of the Government and refusing to take action, how much longer will they look to them for relief?

One of the most plausible or most catching arguments that I ever heard in favor of protection was that it would build up American industries, which, by competing with each other, would bring down prices to American consumers. Now, when our people who have been taxed so long to protect these home industries see them combining with each other to destroy home competition, they think they are no longer entitled to protection against foreign competition. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is why so many of our people believe that the duties should be reduced on all those articles controlled by the trust, not as a complete remedy but as a sound one so far as it extends. I do not believe it would do as much injury to the independent producer in this country as the trusts will if allowed to continue unchecked. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, while the Democratic party has no war to make against honest wealth or property accumulated through honest and legitimate methods, and while it recognizes that an aggregation of capital and a consolidation of enterprises may cheapen the cost of production in the interest of consumers, yet it insists that all those vicious combinations formed for the purpose of destroying competition, monopolizing commodities, and forcing from the people unjust and unreasonable profits should be suppressed by proper legislation and a strict enforcement of law. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Has anything occurred to take this question out of politics since the last election?

Why, Mr. Chairman, the Republican party has been in power in every branch of the Government for more than seven years, and during all that time the trusts have continued to increase in numbers and in power as never before, until to-day they control nearly all the necessaries of life: and what have the Republicans done toward effective legislation or a substantial prosecution of the trusts under the law now in force during their last two administrations? While the President and Attorney-General have been exchanging congratulations upon the Supreme Court decision in the recent merger case, the country knows that they were forced into that prosecution by influences outside of the administration, and that the decision had scarcely been announced by the court when the Attorney-General rushed into print to assure all the other trusts of the country that they need not be alarmed: that they were in no serious danger so long as they stood pat on the Republican party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Leading Republicans speak of this merger decision as a complete settlement of the trust question, at least, that nothing more should be expected from one administration. Just think how long it would take to wipe out all the trusts in this country if you suppress one every four years. Why, if you are sincere in your opposition, if you mean what you have said, go on with your prosecutions against the hundreds of other trusts organized in this country to destroy competition and rob the people. If you are in earnest, go on with other prosecutions; the courts are with you, the people are with you, and if the law is not with you, amend the law before Congress adjourns, and every Democrat will remain here to vote for the amendment. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You have seven long months to show your hand and half a million dollars to expend, yet in your puny prosecutions you have been able to use only $25,000. Mr. Chairman, I do not forget what the newspapers said of this "trust buster" before he became President of the United States. I remember that he used some very strong expressions against the trusts, but just as soon as he came into power all his severe indictments against the trusts were at once turned into mere apologies for their existence. And whatever may have been their fear in the beginning, the trusts have long since learned what a harmless agitator he is. And I think, Mr. Chairman, that one of the greatest jokes ever attempted upon the American people was the report that Theodore Roosevelt was to be the antitrust candidate for President in 1904.

If you gentlemen think that the people of this country are going to "stand pat" on the trust question and allow themselves to be robbed in the future as they have been in the past you will find yourselves mistaken.

Again, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the Republicans in this House and in the Senate, by opposing an honest, nonpartisan investigation of the corruption that has been going on in the Post-Office Department, make the public scandals of this Administration a very important issue in the next campaign. [Applause on the Democratic side].

No one can read the report of the bribery and larceny that have been going on in the Post-Office Department and the reckless and notorious methods with which it has been allowed to continue for years without fixing some responsibility for those official crimes upon the head of that great Department. Why, sir, the sudden and extravagant increase of expenditures in the very divisions where the stealing was conducted should have been sufficient notice to those in charge that something was going wrong. I admit that occasional malfeasance in office is liable to occur in any Administration; but when it is allowed to continue so long and become so wide-sweeping and notorious, those in charge become responsible.

I do not care whether the scoundrels were appointed by Democrats or Republicans; I do not care what their politics may be, for as a rule they have no politics, but can change as fast as the Administration changes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

With these serious charges of corruption against the Post-Office Department, the General Land Office, and the Indian Bureau, we find the Republican party on guard at every door that leads into those chambers of public plunder—refusing admittance to the people's representatives to make a full and fair investigation, and report to the country how shamefully its business has been conducted.

The persistent refusal of Republicans in this House and in the Senate to allow such an investigation of the criminal conduct of the Post-Office Department can bear but one construction, and that is, you are afraid a fair and full investigation of that Department would uncover new crimes and cast still greater reflections upon this Administration.

It might be well for you gentlemen to remember that in 1876 a Democratic President was elected on the issue "turn the rascals out."

It is pretty safe to assume that the Democratic convention will again emphasize its opposition to that "strenuous" spirit of military conquest now engaged in blazing out a new and dangerous course for this Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You may also find it reaffirming its devotion to that high standard of national integrity that marked the Administrations of Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, and other great Presidents, and condemning the more modern methods of tricky diplomacy that subordinates American honor to American greed. [Applause.]

And, Mr. Chairman, if I had to select an issue upon which all Democrats could unite, I think I could name it without any trouble; and that is that Theodore Roosevelt must be defeated. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I expect to see Mr. Roosevelt become the paramount issue with a good many voters in the next election. It is no longer a secret that the business interests of the country, including many supporters of the late President McKinley, do not regard Mr. Roosevelt as a very safe man for the position he is now attempting to fill. By many his administration is looked upon as a continuing experiment—entirely too theatrical for the business interests of the country, without sufficient time between acts to allow the people a good breathing spell. [Laughter and applause.]

There are many incidents in the Administration of Mr. Roosevelt which justify the apprehension that on some "strenuous" occasion he is liable to go off too suddenly and inconsiderately and greatly embarrass the country in some of the graver affairs of Government. And that is why so many of you Republicans would be glad to nominate some other candidate if you had the power to do so. That is why the Republican newspapers in this country until quite recently treated the candidacy of Mr. Roosevelt with so much indifference; and that, in my judgment, is one reason why he will be defeated at the election in November.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not much of a prophet; but I do not intend that these Republicans shall do all the prophesying, both for themselves and for the Democratic party also. I want to warn them now not to depend too much upon Democratic differences for their success at the November election. I desire to call the attention of the country to the fact that the Republican press is doing everything in its power to make the people believe that the Democratic party is not going to be united in the next election.

It is to the interest of the Republican party that such an impression should be created. It helps it to retain in its own ranks those Republicans who are dissatisfied with this administration, and as a deliberate part of their purpose they are doing everything possible to induce Democrats throughout the country to line up with some radical candidate at either extreme and disorganize themselves into a hopeless division before our national convention meets. [Applause.] But, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the great body of the Democratic party is going to be influenced by suggestions from any such source. I know of no better place to test public sentiment throughout the country than right here at the national capital, where the people's representatives are assembled from every State in the Union, and I desire to say that in my judgment there is not only a disposition but a strong determination among the Democrats from every section of the country to unite upon issues now before the people.

They see the weakness of your candidate and the weakness of your cause, and they do not intend to throw away the opportunity. Never in my judgment did political conditions appeal to us more earnestly for a united and successful Democracy than at the present time. [Applause on the Democratic side.] For one, at least, I am not discouraged by discordant notes here and there, magnified in most cases by a Republican press. But I expect to see the commissioned representatives of our party enter the next national convention in the spirit of our illustrious leaders and agree upon a platform and a candidate that will insure us a united and triumphant Democracy in November. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed to read the bill by paragraphs.

The Clerk read as follows:

Baltimore, Md., custom-house: For continuation of building under present limit; $100,000.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. On yesterday, while the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] was making his speech, I asked him a question which involved a statement. The statement was that I had seen in a Boston paper the assertion that a mob there had chased a colored man a considerable distance because he had had a fight with a white man in a base-ball game. The RECORD has me stating that that appeared in the Boston Advertiser. I did not intend to say that it appeared in the Boston Advertiser. I did not intend to specify the paper, because I did not remember what paper contained the article. I think it was in the Boston Herald. It did appear in a paper published in the city of Boston, about the latter days of August, 1902.

The gentleman should be congratulated on his defense of lawlessness. The people of his State are not more opposed to lynching than the people of my State. Wherever you have the negro you have race prejudice, but the best friends of the negro are the southern people. We treat him more kindly than his professed friends in the North, and we do not need any advice as to the way we shall treat him. It is to be deplored that the vicious ones of his race seem to have an ungovernable passion for committing the nameless offense upon white women. When he commits this offense and is caught, he is usually lynched, and lynching for this offense is not confined to the South. I believe it would occur in Massachusetts if the crime were committed there and the offender caught.

The CHAIRMAN. The formal amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Heating apparatus for public buildings: For heating, hoisting, and ventilating apparatus, and repairs to the same, for all public buildings, including quarantine stations and exclusive of marine hospitals, under the control of the Treasury Department, exclusive of personal services, except for work done by contract, $250,000; but of this amount not exceeding $1,000 may be expended for personal services of mechanics and others employed outside of the District of Columbia in making repairs or inspecting work done on heating, hoisting, and ventilating apparatus.

Mr. LIND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by inserting after line 11, on page 15, the following:

"Provided, That it is hereby made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be expended the whole, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the appropriation of $25,000 for heating, hoisting, and ventilating apparatus, contained in the act of Congress making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies, etc., approved February 19, 1904, for the installation of adequate elevators in the public building at Minneapolis, Minn."

Mr. LIND. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to occupy time unless some Member desires me to do so.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the general deficiency bill carried $25,000, which we sought to have applied for this purpose, the committee have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Vaults, safes, and locks for public buildings: For vaults, safes, and locks and repairs to the same, for all public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, exclusive of personal services, except for work done by contract, $10,000; but of this amount not exceeding $3,000 may be expended for personal services of mechanics and others employed outside of the District of Columbia in making repairs and inspecting work done.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether this means that putting vaults into ordinary buildings is not included in this item. I do not know what is meant by the words "except for work done by contract."

Mr. HEMENWAY. This appropriation is for putting vaults in old buildings where it becomes necessary, not in new buildings.

Mr. MANN. It has no application to putting vaults in new buildings?

Mr. HEMENWAY. None at all.

The Clerk read as follows:

American ethnology: For continuing ethnological researches among the American Indians under the direction of the Smithsonian Institution, including salaries or compensation of all necessary employees and the purchase of necessary books and periodicals, $40,000, of which sum not exceeding $1,500 may be used for rent of building.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of making an inquiry. I see in the next section a provision for "observations in high altitudes." I understand that the Board of Ordnance and Fortification have refused further to give money for the investigation of the Langley air ship, or experiments with it. I should like to ask this question: There seems to have been some impression that this bill carries an appropriation for that purpose. I wish to know whether that is not a misapprehension?

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is a mistaken impression. There is no such appropriation in this bill at all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay of assistant custodians and janitors: For pay of assistant custodians and janitors, including all personal services in connection with the care of all public buildings under control of the Treasury Department outside of the District of Columbia, exclusive of marine hospitals, mints, branch mints, and assay offices, $1,225,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall so apportion this sum as to prevent a deficiency therein.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word concerning these janitors. In some places, for instance in Chicago and New York, I understand they are paid $50 a month. They may not be paid as much as that elsewhere. There has been a very general complaint that it was almost impossible to get proper people in the city of Chicago to do this work at that pay. The hours are long and the labor is very arduous.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will say to the gentleman that there is no trouble in securing proper help, so we are informed by the gentleman in charge. The pay is low, but it has been the fixed pay for a number of years, and there has been no trouble in securing men at that sum.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that there is trouble in securing any proper kind of help in our city at this pay. Two or three years ago, when the pay was $45 a month, I went to the Treasury Department about it, and they increased the amount to $50 a month; but $50 a month in New York or Chicago, in view of the time and labor involved, is at least somewhat inadequate.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I agree with the gentleman that the pay is very low; but the Secretary of the Treasury has authority to raise it.

Mr. MANN. I understand that. The question is, I suppose, as to the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think we gave them the estimate. It is an increase of appropriation over last year; I think we gave them the exact estimate.

Mr. MANN. Very likely they did not make an estimate on increasing the pay. The gentleman knows very well it is almost impossible to increase the pay of people of that class. If they were drawing a salary of $2,000 or $2,200 it might be easy to jump them up to $2,200 or $2,400; but this class of people have no influence—have no political influence.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. They seem to have.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; I know that there has been difficulty in getting the right kind of labor.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have no doubt that is true, and the Secretary of the Treasury can arrange the matter himself and increase the pay if necessary.

Mr. MANN. I am not so certain that it will be increased that way by the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary can not give any attention to a matter of this sort. It seems to be almost beneath the dignity of anybody to consider the case of these men. As suggested by the gentleman from Maine, it is beneath his dignity.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I hope the schedule will be so arranged as to secure competent men.

The Clerk read as follows:

General inspector of supplies for public buildings: For one general inspector, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, $3,000; and for actual and necessary expenses, not exceeding $2,000; in all, $5,000.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order upon that, Mr. Chairman, until I can have some explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserves the point of order on the paragraph on page 30, commencing with line 6 and extending to line 12.

Mr. MANN. I call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the fact that a few days ago the House, in considering the post-office bill, provided for a purchasing agent to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. When brought in, the bill provided for a salary of $5,000. The House finally reduced it to $4,000. You seem to have provided for one here at $3,000. I think it is perfectly self-evident that in the end, with these new offices so created, their salaries will have to be practically the same.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I would suggest to the gentleman that this is not a new office. It is an office that has been running some eight or ten years.

Mr. MANN. Is it necessary to put in here every time that he shall be confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The language of the bill is carried along in that way. I should think it is not necessary to put it in. I think that could be dropped out of the bill.

Mr. MANN. The very fact that you use this language in the bill itself shows that this language is new legislation.

Mr. HEMENWAY. No; this office has been in existence some eight or ten years.

Mr. MANN. If the office is already in existence, very well. This language is new legislation upon its face, providing for an office to be created and the officer to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. HEMENWAY. This is the identical language carried for years. It might have been dropped out.

Mr. MANN. Has there been any difficulty in getting the right kind of a purchasing agent at a salary of $3,000?

Mr. HEMENWAY. There has not.

Mr. MANN. There probably would be no difficulty about getting the same thing for the Post-Office Department.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I take it they can get that kind of a man. This man has been in the position eight or ten years, and I understand the position has been filled by one man.

Mr. MANN. It was stated the other day that it was necessary to have some very broad business man to fill that office. That is the character of this gentleman, I suppose?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not know the gentleman, but I know the same man has been in the office for years. I do not know who he is or where he comes from.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Furniture and repairs of furniture: For furniture and repairs of same, carpets, and gas and electric-light fixtures, for all public buildings, exclusive of marine hospitals, mints, branch mints, and assay offices, under the control of the Treasury Department, and for furniture, carpets, gas and electric-light fixtures for new buildings, exclusive of personal services, except for work done by contract, $367,100. And all furniture now owned by the United States in other public buildings shall be used, so far as practicable, whether it corresponds with the present regulation plan for furniture or not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think in buying thousands of dollars' worth, yes, possibly millions of dollars' worth of furniture and electric lighting and machinery, authorized in this paragraph, we will have to buy more or less of copper, and in view of the fact the very interesting speaker from Kansas stated this morning, and I believe several of his colleagues, that "copper" is not on the dutiable list, I desire to read one paragraph to show the gentleman that he is mistaken, and as a result, I contend, that we are necessarily forced, and in view of the fact we all admit copper is controlled by a trust, to pay trust prices for the very articles we now, under this section, order to be purchased. It will not consume but a moment or two, Mr. Chairman. On page 54, Senate Document, volume 11, Fifty-fifth Congress, first session, 1897, tariff 1897, I read this:

Copper in roll plates, called brasiers' copper, sheets, rods, pipes, and copper bottoms, 2½ cents per pound; sheathing or yellow metal of which copper is the component material of chief value, and not composed wholly or in part of iron, ungalvanized, 2 cents per pound.

Now I will go to another clause.

ART. 168. Articles or wares not especially provided for in this act, composed wholly or in part of iron, steel, lead, copper, nickel, pewter, zinc, gold, silver, platinum, aluminum, or other metal, and whether partly or wholly manufactured, 45 per cent ad valorem.

And so on and so forth. I will not detain the committee to read further, but I show that the gentleman who contended that copper was not on the dutiable list is not correct. I want to tell him this and impress it on the committee that copper is on the "free list," exactly like anthracite coal was slipped on the free list and was free of duty except as otherwise "specially provided in the bill."

The "free list" is away over in the body of the bill, while the taxable paragraphs I have read are over in other sections of the bill, so that if the great Republican party that framed that tariff over the protests of the Democratic party are guilty of placing copper on the free list, when, in fact, they put it on the protected list, it shows that it was done by sleight of hand or somebody did it surreptitiously, just as they did the anthracite coal tax, which taxed that coal until the Democratic party, during the great coal strike, here convinced Congress it was taxed and lashed the Republican party into a repeal of the tax on anthracite coal, that the people of this country might all keep from freezing, that our public institutions might open their doors again that were closed on account of the tax on coal, "held up" by the coal trust. Later, I believe, my distinguished friend from Connecticut this morning said that copper was on the free list. He is on the great Ways and Means Committee, a bright, intelligent man a real statesman, one of the most alert men on that committee or any other committee in this House, and yet he said that copper was on the free list, as I remember, and yet I have read you here from the document published by Congress that it is taxed.

Ah, gentlemen, is that the way you deceive yourselves; is that the way you are led into making tariff laws and protecting the trusts? If so, gentlemen, you had better turn over the making of the tariff to the people on this side of the House or join in putting coal on the free list, as we made you do, and destroy the coal trust, and join us in putting copper on the free list and destroy the copper trust. You said that to put coal on the free list would interfere with the business of the country, yet that is not true, as shown by subsequent events. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired. The Chair understands that the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase and construction of a tugboat to be used as a boarding cutter by the immigration officials at New York, $75,000; in all, $84,000, which sum shall be paid from the permanent appropriation for expenses of regulating immigration, and any balance of any sum heretofore specifically appropriated for repairs and alterations to the Government property at Ellis Island shall not continue available for expenditure after June 30, 1904.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order, commencing at line 3, page 36, to the following language

And any balance of any sum heretofore specifically appropriated for repairs and alterations at Ellis Island shall not continue available for expenditure after June 30, 1904.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order to the entire item.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York reserves the point of order to the latter part of the paragraph and the gentleman from Illinois to the whole paragraph.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to know what the facts are.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Does the Chair desire to hear me on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HEMENWAY. As to the point made by the gentleman from New York, I will state that in the sundry civil bill for the present fiscal year a direct appropriation or a specific appropriation was made for certain repairs at Ellis Island. The Comptroller held that there being a specific appropriation, no repairs could be made out of the general fund. Repairs at Ellis Island have nearly always been made out of the general fund. In order to avoid having a little balance of this appropriation left over and falling into the same difficulty again, we provide that no portion of the appropriation shall be available after June 30, so that the general fund will become available for repairs.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much is there available of the special fund?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I don't suppose there is any, but we want to guard against the danger of that construction again.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understood there was a large appropriation to continue the alterations being made at Ellis Island. That they have enlarged the island, erected new buildings, and what I want to ascertain is whether the language is for the purpose of compelling the expenditure of the money now available by the 1st of July of this year.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, no; that is put in here so as to again avoid falling into the error I have mentioned, so that the general fund may be available for repairs. If there was a hundred dollars balance of the specific appropriation left in the Treasury July 1, the Comptroller would probably hold, there being a specific appropriation available, that no money could be used from the general fund for repairs.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I call the attention of the gentleman to this fact, that in this bill there is no appropriation carried for repairs at Ellis Island.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly not; and that makes the general fund available under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is it the intention to carry out the repairs estimated for about $300,000?

Mr. HEMENWAY. No; but this will allow repairs to be made out of the general fund under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, which can not be done if this language does not go in the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say that I don't quite understand the effect of the language, but I will accept the explanation of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I did not catch the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I would like to inquire what is the necessity of starting a new navy in this provision for the construction of a tugboat. I assume that the item in reference to the purchase of a tugboat is subject to a point of order. We now have a navy, or propose to have, connected with the Army; we have a navy connected with the Light-house Board; we have a navy connected with the Life-Saving Service; we have one connected with the Revenue-Cutter Service; one connected with the fishery department, and various other departments of the Government, and here is a proposition to start a new one for the immigration service.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I suggest that this service already has a ferryboat from New York to Ellis Island.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that I haven't the slightest doubt that the item is subject to a point of order; I may be wrong, but I do not care to insist upon it if there is reason for it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The reason for putting it on is this: Under the law they have the right to hire a boat from the general fund. This service is self-supporting. The head tax that they collect more than pays the cost of the service.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt that is often the cause of great extravagance, and that does not appeal to me.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is true, and we are seeking to avoid the extravagance. Under the law they have the power to hire a boat, and they are hiring a boat at the rate of $75 a day. They have to meet all the incoming vessels, and the immigration officers have to board these vessels and there inspect and take off cases that go to the detention hospital and others that are scattered to different localities.

The diseased emigrants go to one place and the contagious diseases to another. The inspectors have to go aboard the vessels as they come in and make a proper distribution of the emigrants, and the boat that they are hiring costs them $75 a day. They insist, and I think beyond question they are right, that if they had their own boat they could save possibly $25 a day, and the committee, taking the matter under consideration, thought best to provide them with their own tugboat.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that the moment they have a boat they have to have a captain and other officers?

Mr. HEMENWAY. They have them now.

Mr. MANN. And that it will not be long before they will want to go on the retired list.

Mr. HEMENWAY. These are civilian employees.

Mr. MANN. Well, I happen to be on a committee that deals with two or three navies, and the prodigious demand in regard to them is something that passes understanding.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have no doubt. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that this will result in saving to the Government considerable money every year.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have very great respect for the gentleman's opinion, but I have no doubt whatever that it will add 50 per cent to the cost to the Government and not add in the slightest to the efficiency of the service. Still, trusting to the gentleman and thinking he has been more or less—I will not say imposed upon—I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois is withdrawn.

Mr. LAMAR of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, one of the most important problems receiving attention and being seriously considered and much discussed by the people of this country to-day is that of the improvement of our public roads and highways. Probably no other nonpartisan question has aroused so great a degree of public interest and been so widely discussed in all sections of the country and by all classes and conditions of our people as has the proposition for national aid in the construction and improvement of our public roads and highways.

However much men may differ on other public questions—the tariff, the trusts, the currency, etc.—all seem to agree that good roads are "a consummation devoutly to be wished," but how to get them, "there's the rub."

Many and varied are the reasons given by those who oppose it why the Federal Government should not extend to the States financial aid for the construction of highways.

It is by some denominated "paternalism;" some say it is beyond the legitimate functions or province of the Government, while others say it is not practical.

If it is within the province of the Government to grant 200,000,000 acres of the public domain to aid in and encourage the construction of transcontinental railways reaching to the Pacific coast and over which only a part of our commerce travels, then why is it not equally legitimate and proper that the public highways of the country, over which more than 90 per cent of all the tonnage of the country is hauled, should receive consideration by the National Government?

If it is within the proper function of the National Government to appropriate and expend, as has been done, over $400,000,000 in the improvement of our rivers, and harbors, and waterways in order to facilitate the means of communication and transportation, is it not equally important that attention be given to the public highways of the country, over which nine-tenths of the country's commerce must take its initial journey and over which the 20,000 rural mail carriers, reaching forty or fifty millions of our people, must travel every day in the year? If the Government is justified in appropriating millions to construct roads and highways in Porto Rico and the Philippines and the general welfare of the country is promoted thereby, surely the roads traveled by our own people are entitled to the same consideration. Surely the same logic which leads to the former would justify the latter.

If we are justified in expending three or four hundred millions of dollars to construct a great waterway across the Isthmus of Panama to connect the two oceans, to promote a commerce which will in an indirect way be of benefit to part of our people, why is not the General Government justified in at least assisting in the improvement of a class of public highways that we are told costs the farmers 25 cents per mile for every ton hauled over them? Much as has been said of the benefits of the Panama Canal, I have no doubt, and it is my deliberate judgment, that an equal amount intelligently expended in improving the roads and highways of the country would be of more practical benefit to all the people of the country, and especially to those who pay the greater share of the taxes to defray the cost of the enterprise.

According to the census of 1900, over 35 per cent—more than one-third—of all those employed in gainful occupations in the United States were engaged in agricultural pursuits, and we are told by good authority that this one-third pays more than three-fifths of all the taxes; that the farmers of the country pay 60 per cent of all the taxes. Last year the farmers of this country raised $950,000,000 worth of corn, $650,000,000 worth of hay, $500,000,000 worth of cotton, and $450,000,000 worth of wheat, and agricultural products furnished 63 per cent of our domestic exports and saved to the country that balance of trade of which we hear so much from some of our orators on the other side of this Chamber; yet our bad roads put a tax of 12½ cents a ton per mile on every ton of those products that was hauled to market, for it now costs 25 cents per ton per mile and can be hauled over even reasonably good roads for 12½ cents a ton per mile. That is all it costs in France. It has been said that every time the sun sets the bad roads of the United States costs the people $1,500,000.

Notwithstanding the fact that the farmers constitute 35 per cent of the whole number engaged in gainful occupations in this country, and furnish 63 per cent of the domestic exports of the country, and bear the burden of paying 60 per cent of all the taxes of the country, yet it is estimated by those who ought to know that 90 per cent of the revenue of the Government of the United States is spent in the great cities on public buildings, the construction of battle ships, in furnishing the munitions of war, and for the improvement of rivers and harbors, etc., and less than 10 per cent is spent in the country, among the people who have furnished more than half the revenues of the Government.

In every nation having good roads that I know anything about the government has either built them or aided in their construction. England, France, Germany, Spain, Italy, and Switzerland all have good roads, and in each the General Government has aided in their construction to a greater or less extent—and we are told that this country stands alone as the only great civilized nation that does not give financial aid for the building of public highways.

Aside from the benefits from expenditure of the money, the employment given labor in their construction, and the markets afforded to those living in the locality, and the increased value of all lands, which would immediately result from such improved highways—for all these considerations are to some extent local—there are other considerations resulting from improved roads more general and more far reaching in their character and of more vital import. There is a sociological side to the question as well as an economic one. The rural population has ever been, is now, and will always be the solid foundation upon which our whole social and political structure rests. I do not remember the exact figures, but I do know that our census reports show that for several decades back the population of our cities has been growing at a much more rapid rate than the country. The isolation of farm life and its separation from the literary, educational, and social advantages of the age is driving our brightest and best young men from the farm into the city.

They go to the already overcrowded cities and seek employment and, under our present complex industrial system, are usually "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for some great corporation, simply a cog in a vast machine, living a life that retards physical and mental development except along one particular line, becoming human automatons, wholly unlike the sturdy, brawny yeoman of the country, and those same glittering attractions are drawing from the isolation of the lonely farmhouse the young women, and the labor problems of the city become more complex by reason of their employment by hundreds and thousands under a remorseless industrial system that knows no chivalry; and meanwhile the old-fashioned home, the unit of our civilization, is disappearing and giving place to the flat and the family hotel—a kind of a misnomer for home—where children are not wanted and are interlopers if they come, and where the old-fashioned family circle is unknown.

With improved highways will come the rural delivery of the mail, the telephone, improved central high schools, and an improved social and intellectual atmosphere that will make farm life more attractive. The loneliness, now so irksome to the young people, will be supplanted by social conditions and advantages which will not only satisfy our young people and make their lot more happy and contented, but will stimulate emigration from the congested centers of population, and will remove the chief causes of that spirit of unrest and dissatisfaction which is driving our young men and women from the rural homes to the already crowded cities.

I can not forbear expressing the thought that in the expenditures of such vast sums in aid of expositions, in the construction and maintenance of public parks, and other works and enterprises for the education and enjoyment of our people, it would be wise to give some consideration to that great class of American farmers who pay the greater part of the taxes in time of peace and fight our battles in time of war and the great majority of whom never use our parks nor see our expositions.

It may be all right to spend annually in time of peace $70,000,000 for an army and $100,000,000 for a navy and to exploit our military and naval prowess in the islands of the Orient, but so far as I am concerned I had rather see it expended in internal improvement among our own people to make their conditions better and their lives happier. I entertain no feelings of especial pride because of our costly dominion over distant islands of the sea, or in the fact that our flag waves there over an unwilling people, the emblem of government by military force, maintained by taxing the American people. I think I have as much patriotism as the average American citizen, but I freely confess that I have no ambition that the time shall ever come when our martial drumbeat shall be heard around the world and when the Stars and Stripes shall inspire, not reverence and respect, but fear and dread in the minds of the peoples of the earth. To quote from Jefferson:

> It is more remunerative, splendid, and noble for the people to spend money on canals and roads that will build up and promote social intercourse and commercial facilities than to expend it on armies and navies.

The picture of a happy, contented, prosperous, and peace-loving people, true to the exalted ideals upon which our Republic was founded, and the adherence to which has made us great and given to us the standing and respect we enjoy of the people of the world; the devotion of our wisest statesmanship and loftiest patriotism to the solution of our domestic problems, and to the development of the untold resources of our forests and fields and mines; the building of more roads, and more schools, and more churches, and the continual cultivation of those virtues which have made us great is, to me, a vision more alluring and more in harmony with my ideas of our national mission and destiny than all the tinsel and glitter and vain pomp and glory of military conquest.

I desire to insert a few quotations from the early statesmen and founders of the Republic, showing the views entertained by them along this line, and following this a copy of the bill introduced in this House by myself on January 18, 1904.

VIEWS OF STATESMEN PROMINENT IN THE EARLY HISTORY OF THE REPUBLIC.

I can not forbear intimating to you the expediency * * * of facilitating the intercourse between the distant parts of our country by a due attention to the post-office and post-roads. (Washington's first annual address to Congress, 1790.)

The importance of the post-office and post-roads on a plan sufficiently liberal and comprehensive, as they respect the expedition, safety, and facility of communication, is increased by their instrumentality in diffusing a knowledge of the laws and proceedings of the Government, which, while it contributes to the security of the people, serves also to guard them against the effects of misrepresentation and misconception. (Washington's third annual address, 1791.)

Among the means of advancing the public interest the occasion is a proper one for recalling the attention of Congress to the great importance of establishing throughout our country the roads and canals which can best be executed under the national authority. No objects within the circle of political economy so richly repay the expense bestowed upon them; there are none the utility of which is more universally ascertained and acknowledged; none that do more honor to the governments whose wise and enlarged patriotism duly appreciates them. Nor is there any country which presents a field where nature invites more the art of man to complete her own work for his accommodation and benefit. These considerations are strengthened, moreover, by the political effect of these facilities for intercommunication in bringing and binding more closely together the various parts of our extended confederacy. Whilst the States individually, with a laudable enterprise and emulation, avail themselves of their local advantages by new roads. * * * the General Government is the more urged to similar undertakings requiring a national jurisdiction and national means, by the prospect of thus systematically completing so inestimable a work. (Madison's seventh annual message, 1815.)

We can not fail to entertain a high sense of the advantage to be derived from the facility which may be afforded * * * by means of good roads and canals. (Monroe's first annual message, 1817.)

The great object of the institution of civil government is the improvement of the condition of those who are parties to the social compact, and no government, in whatever form constituted, can accomplish the lawful ends of its institution but in proportion as it improves the condition of those over whom it is established. Roads and canals, by multiplying and facilitating the communications and intercourse between distant regions and multitudes of men, are among the most important means of improvement. (John Quincy Adams's first annual message, 1825.)

The appropriations for the repair and continuation of the Cumberland road, for the construction of various other roads, * * * may be considered rather as treasures laid up from the contributions of the present age for the benefit of posterity than as unrequited applications of the accruing revenues of the nation. (John Quincy Adams's third annual message, 1827.)

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

In 1786 Jefferson, in a letter to James Ross, said:

I experience great satisfaction at seeing my country proceed to facilitate the intercommunications of its several parts by opening rivers, canals, and roads. How much more rational is this disposal of public money than that of waging war.

During his second Administration he signed the bill providing for the construction of the Cumberland road.

Henry Clay summarized Jefferson's views on this question as follows:

It was the opinion of Mr. Jefferson that, although there was no general power vested by the Constitution in Congress to construct roads and canals without the consent of the States, yet such a power might be exercised with their assent. Mr. Jefferson not only held this opinion in the abstract, but he practically executed it in the instance of the Cumberland road; and how? First, by a compact made with the State of Ohio for the application of a specified fund, and then by compacts with Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Maryland to apply the fund so set apart within their respective limits.

In 1808, while still President, Jefferson wrote as follows to Mr. Lieper:

Give us peace till our revenues are liberated from debt, and then, if war be necessary, it can be carried on without a new tax or loan, and during peace we may chequer our whole country with canals, roads, etc. This is the object to which all our endeavors should be directed.

In 1813, in a letter to J. W. Eppes, Jefferson made this most significant declaration:

The fondest wish of my heart ever was that the surplus portion of these taxes, destined for the payment of that (Revolutionary) debt, should, when that object was accomplished, be continued by annual or biennial reenactments, and applied in time of peace to the improvement of our country by canals, roads, and useful institutions (literary or others), and in time of war to the maintenance of the war.

JAMES MADISON.

In one of his later messages to Congress President Madison said:

I particularly invite again the attention of Congress to the expediency of exercising their existing powers, and, where necessary, of resorting to the prescribed mode of enlarging them, in order to effectuate a comprehensive system of roads and canals, such as will have the effect of drawing more closely together every part of our country by promoting intercourse and improvements and by increasing the share of every part in the common stock of national prosperity.

HENRY CLAY.

Clay was always an advocate of internal improvements and was in his generation the ablest and most persistent advocate of the building of national roads. His well-matured opinion on the question of internal improvements was most tersely expressed in a speech made in Congress in 1818, in which he said:

Of all the modes in which a government can employ its surplus revenue, none is more permanently beneficial than that of internal improvement. Fixed to the soil, it becomes a durable part of the land itself, diffusing comfort and activity and animation on all sides. The first direct effect is on the agricultural community, into whose pockets comes the difference in the expense of transportation between good and bad ways. Thus if the price of transporting a barrel of flour by the erection of the Cumberland turnpike should be lessened $2, the producer of the article would receive that $2 more now than formerly.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

Speaking in the United States Senate, in 1830, Mr. Webster referred to the Government's right and duty to undertake works of internal improvement in the following language:

Two considerations at once presented themselves, in looking at this state of things, with great force. One was that that great branch of improvement which consisted in furnishing new facilities of intercourse necessarily ran into different States in every leading instance and would benefit the citizens of all such States. No one State, therefore, in such cases would assume the whole expense, nor was the cooperation of several States to be expected. Take the instance of the Delaware breakwater. It will cost several millions of money. Would Pennsylvania ever have constructed it? Certainly never while this Union lasts, because it is not for her sole benefit. Would Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware have united to accomplish it at their joint expense? Certainly not, for the same reason. It could not be done, therefore, but by the General Government. The same may be said of the large inland undertakings, except that in them Government, instead of bearing the whole expense, cooperates with others who bear a part. The other consideration is that the United States have the means. They enjoy the revenues derived from commerce, and the States have no abundant and easy sources of public income. The custom-houses fill the general Treasury, while the States have scanty resources except by resort to heavy direct taxes.

Under this view of things I thought it necessary to settle, at least for myself, some definite notions with respect to the powers of the Government in regard to internal affairs, and I arrived at the conclusion that Government had power to accomplish sundry objects or aid in their accomplishment which are now commonly spoken of as internal improvements.

JOHN C. CALHOUN.

While Secretary of War, in 1819, Mr. Calhoun, in a report to the House on roads and canals, said:

No object of the kind is more important, and there is none to which State or individual capacity is more inadequate. It must be perfected by the General Government or not be perfected at all, at least for many years. No one or two States have a sufficient interest. It is immediately beneficial to more than half the States of the Union, and without the aid of the General Government would require their cooperation. It is at all times a most important object to the nation, and in a war with a naval power is almost indispensable to our military, commercial, and financial operations. It may, in a single view, be considered the great artery of the country, and when the coasting trade is suspended by war the vast intercourse between the North and South, which annually requires 500,000 tons of shipping, and which is necessary to the commerce, the agriculture, and manufactures of more than half of the Union, seeks this channel of communication.

* * * * * * *

Many of the roads and canals which have been suggested are no doubt of the first importance to the commerce, the manufactures, the agriculture, and political prosperity of the country, but are not for that reason less useful or necessary for military purposes. It is, in fact, one of the great advantages of our country, enjoying so many others, that, whether we regard its internal improvements in relation to military, civil, or political purposes, very nearly the same system, in all its parts, is required. The road or canal can scarcely be designated which is highly useful for military operations that is not equally required for the industry or political prosperity of the community. If those roads or canals had been pointed out which are necessary for military purposes only, the list would have been small indeed. I have, therefore, presented all, without regard to the fact that they might be employed for other uses, which in the event of war would be necessary to give economy, certainty, and success to our military operations, and which, if they had been completed before the late war [of 1812], would, by their savings in that single contest in men, money, and reputation, have more than indemnified the country for the expense of their construction.

Cooley on Constitutional Law says:

Every road within a State, including railroads, canals, turnpikes, and navigable streams, existing or created within a State becomes a post-road whenever, by law or by the action of the Post-Office Department, provision is made for the transportation of the mail upon it or over it. Many statesmen and jurists have contended that the power comprehends the laying out and constructing of any roads which Congress may deem proper and needful for the conveyance of the mails and the keeping of them in repair for the purpose.

PROPOSITION IN CONGRESS FOR A NATIONAL SYSTEM OF ROADS.

In 1817 John C. Calhoun, Henry Clay, and others favored the creation of a new fund for internal improvements. A bill was introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. Calhoun to set aside for roads and canals the bonus and dividends received by the United States from its newly chartered national banks. In supporting this measure Mr. Calhoun, although a stanch believer in the doctrine of State rights, delivered a speech before the House in which he thus expressed himself:

Let it not be said that internal improvements may be wholly left to the enterprise of the States and of individuals. I know that much may justly be expected to be done by them: but in a country so new and so extensive as ours there is room enough for all, the General and State governments and individuals, to exert their resources. Many of the improvements contemplated are on too great a scale for the resources of States or of individuals, and many of such a nature that the rival jealousy of the State, if left alone, might prevent. They require the resources and general superintendence of the Government to effect and complete them.

But there are higher and more powerful considerations why Congress should take charge of this subject. If we were only to consider the pecuniary advantages of a good system of roads and canals it might indeed admit of some doubt whether they ought not to be left wholly to individual exertions, but when we come to consider how intimately the strength and political prosperity of the Republic are connected with this subject we find the most urgent reasons why we should apply our resources to them. Good roads and canals, judiciously laid out, are the proper remedy. Let us, then, bind the Republic together with a perfect system of roads and canals.

The first great object is to perfect the communication from Maine to Louisiana. This may be fairly considered as the principal artery of the whole system. The next is the connection of the lakes with the Hudson River. The next object of chief importance is to connect all the great commercial points on the Atlantic with the Western States, and, finally, to perfect the intercourse between the West and New Orleans. There are others, no doubt, of great importance which will receive the aid of the Government. The fund proposed to be set apart in this bill is about $650,000 a year, which is doubtless too small to effect such great objects of itself, but it will be a good beginning. Every portion of the community—the farmer, the mechanic, and the merchant—will feel its good effects, and, what is of greatest importance, the strength of the community will be greatly augmented and its political prosperity rendered more secure.

On November 8, 1808, in the last annual message Thomas Jefferson ever transmitted to Congress, he used this language:

The account of the receipts and expenditures during the year ending September 30 being not yet made up, a correct statement will hereafter be transmitted from the Treasury.

And after showing that there would be a surplus and that this surplus was accumulating he says:

The probable accumulation of the surpluses of revenue beyond what can be applied to the payment of the public debt, whenever the freedom and safety of our commerce shall be restored, merits the consideration of Congress. Shall it lie unproductive in the public vaults, shall the revenue be reduced, or shall it not rather be appropriated to the improvement of roads, canals, rivers, education, and other great foundations of prosperity and union, under the powers which Congress may already possess, or such amendment of the Constitution as may be approved by the States?

A bill (H. R. 10134) to create in the Department of Agriculture a Bureau of Public Highways, and to provide for national aid in the improvement of the public highways in the various States and Territories.

Whereas it is of the greatest importance that there should be a uniform system of good roads in the forty-five States and four Territories of the United States, to the end that there may be increased facilities for the dissemination of knowledge by means of rural free delivery and more intimate and efficient interstate commerce; and

Whereas the people of the United States demand good roads as part compensation for the burdens of taxation which they bear for foreign commerce: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be established in the Department of Agriculture a bureau to be known as the "Bureau of Public Highways."

SEC. 2. That the object and purpose of said Bureau shall be to cooperate with the various States of the United States and the civil subdivisions thereof in the construction and improvement of permanent public roads according to the provisions of this act; to make inquiries in regard to systems of road building and management throughout the United States; to make investigations and experiments in regard to the best kind of road-making materials; to cooperate with the various States of the United States and the civil subdivisions thereof in building object-lesson roads in the several States and in the education and instruction of those having in charge the building and construction of roads in the several States and civil subdivisions thereof; to employ local and special agents and other labor required in conducting experiments and collecting, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of said experiments; to investigate the chemical and physical character of road materials; to purchase necessary apparatus, materials, supplies, and office and laboratory fixtures; to prepare, publish, and distribute bulletins and reports on the subject of road building and improvement; to instruct, and assist, and cooperate with the local authorities in the construction and improvement of public roads and highways in the States, parishes, counties, townships, and districts in the United States; to collect and disseminate information as to the different systems of taxation for road purposes in the various States and the amount collected and expended therein for the improvement and construction of roads; and to bring about, as far as may be, a uniform system for the construction, improvement, and repair of the public roads throughout the United States, and such other objects and purposes as may be consistent with the purposes of this act.

SEC. 3. That the said Bureau shall consist of three Commissioners, to be known as the "Commissioners of Highways," two of whom shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in the following manner: One from the political party in control of the executive branch of the Government and one from the largest minority party. Both of the aforesaid Commissioners shall have practical knowledge of road engineering and construction and shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum each. The President shall detail to serve as the third member of said Commission an officer of the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, of rank not below that of captain, who shall receive, in addition to the pay allowance of his rank in the United States Army, a sum sufficient to make $5,000 per annum. The said Commissioners of Highways shall appoint, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, such other engineers, road experts, chemists, clerks, and other officers and servants as may from time to time be required for the purpose of carrying into effect this act: Provided, That said Commissioners of Highways shall be under the general supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, who shall exercise general jurisdiction over all matters and acts coming under their control by virtue of this enactment.

SEC. 4. That the said Commissioners of Highways shall make and promulgate all needful rules and regulations for the conduct and regulation of said Bureau and for the carrying out of the provisions of this act. The said rules and regulations shall be approved by the Secretary of Agriculture and shall have full force and effect of law.

SEC. 5. That there shall be, and is hereby, appropriated for the maintenance of said Bureau and the use thereof and for carrying out the provisions of this act the sum of $50,000,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be set apart by the Secretary of the Treasury and known as the "good-roads fund:" Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, if no money is available unappropriated, sell bonds for the purpose of this act, at a rate not to exceed 2 per cent per annum, under such rules and regulations as he may deem proper.

SEC. 6. That expenditures herein provided for shall be apportioned among the several States and Territories in the proportion which the population of each State or Territory bears to the whole population of the United States. Each county, parish, or other civil subdivision of any State or Territory shall be entitled to receive from the good-roads fund provided in this act an amount equal to the total amount levied or provided by State or local taxation, including poll tax payable in labor, to be expended in the construction, improvement, or repair of the roads, highways, and bridges in such county, parish, or civil subdivision of a State during the year in which such application is made for national aid: Provided, That the amount of such national aid shall in no case exceed $1 per capita in any one year for the county, parish, or civil subdivision applying therefor: And provided further, That no city or town having a population of more than 6,000 inhabitants, as determined by the census of 1900, shall be entitled to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. That whenever the proper officers having jurisdiction and control of the public highways and bridges under the State or Territorial laws in any county, parish, or civil subdivision of such State or Territory shall make application to the commissioners of highways for national aid, and shall accompany such application with official certificates showing the amount provided by State and local taxation for road and bridge construction, improvement, or repair within said county, parish, or civil subdivision during said year, it shall be the duty of said commissioners of highways to make a requisition upon the Comptroller of the Treasury for the amount to be paid such county, parish, or civil subdivision under this act, and such Comptroller of the Treasury shall thereupon issue a warrant upon the Treasury for such amount, which shall be paid to the proper officer or officers having lawful charge of the road funds in such county, parish, or civil subdivision under the laws of the State or Territory where situated, who shall file proper receipts therefor, and which amount so received shall be expended in the construction, improvement, or repair of the public highways or bridges in such county, parish, or civil subdivision.

SEC. 8. That it shall be the duty of the commissioners of highways, upon the request of the proper officers having jurisdiction of public highways and bridges in any county, parish, or civil subdivision of any State or Territory receiving the benefits of this act, to furnish to such county, parish, or civil subdivision a competent and skilled engineer and expert road builder and such other person or persons skilled in road building as may be required, who shall be paid while in the service of such county, parish, or civil subdivision out of the money received by such county, parish, or civil subdivision from the United States under this act, and who shall while so employed be under the direction of the local authorities having in charge the road or roads in relation to which service such engineer or expert may be required.

The Clerk read as follows:

Expenses of buoyage: For expenses of establishing, replacing, and maintaining buoys of any and all kinds, and spindles, and for all other necessary incidental expenses relating thereto, including the pay of officers and crews of light-house tenders and of clerks and other employees in the offices of the light-house inspectors and light-house engineers and at light-house depots, $550,000.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I understand that a few moments ago, in my absence, attention was called to the fact that an error had been made in a statement by myself as to copper being on the free list, the statement being made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES]. I desire to state that the gentleman from Tennessee is mistaken, that copper was a dutiable article under the McKinley law, but under the Wilson law it was put on the free list and it is on the free list now. The law not only says it is on the free list, but I will read from Vandergrift's United States Tariff, a book used by the Treasury Department, showing the various forms of copper which are free: Copper alloy; copper bars, black or coarse; copper cement; copper clippings; copper coins; copper composition metal of which copper is the chief value; forms of not manufactured copper; copper in plates; copper ingots or bars; copper matte; copper medals, if prizes or trophies; old copper; old yellow metal; copper ores; copper in pigs; copper in plates, and many others which I will not take the time to read.

The gentleman is entirely mistaken. I think if he will consult the importations of the United States Government he will find that no duty is collected or has been collected since the passage of the Wilson bill in 1894 on crude copper in bars, ingots, or pigs.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] began his speech by saying that in his absence I made some statements. I flattered my good friend from Connecticut by presuming he was never absent from his seat. Otherwise I would not have said anything or would have sent for him before speaking. I do not think the gentleman will find anything in my remarks otherwise than possibly something of a complimentary nature that I dare say would make him blush, if that were possible. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Well, there was the error in the statement.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is the most industrious statesman I ever saw. He has gone off and picked up Vandegrift's tariff compilation, and read something from it in order to prove his case. I was reading from a Senate official document. I read the title of it. I have it now in my hand, and I will again read the title. It is Senate Document, volume 2, Fifty-fifth Congress, first session, 1897. Now, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] did not, as I understood it, confine his remarks to "copper ore." He spoke of "copper." Nor does the gentleman from Connecticut confine his reply to my statement to "copper ore."

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will the gentleman pardon me a moment?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The question came up upon the disadvantages to the country of the copper trust and the great fortunes that had been made. Of course that could mean only the Amalgamated Copper Company and other similar institutions. It does not refer to brass kettles or copper wire or manufactured forms of copper, and nobody thought of such a question when the discussion was going on. At that time the simple question was as to whether or not copper was free. Of course it is free in both laws that have been enacted, in 1894 and in 1897, known as the "Wilson law" and the "Dingley law."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take up the time of the committee in trying to convince my friend that he is in error. [Laughter.] I take it that we want to adjourn Congress some time. [Renewed laughter.] But I am going to crave the indulgence of this honorable committee to try and prove my case by copying the paragraph which I alluded to briefly and to put it in the RECORD and let all the world see that my friend is in error or that he is right, or that I am in error or that I am right.

I think that I am right. I think I quote the best authority, and the gentleman has not quoted an official authority. He quoted from somebody, I do not know who—Vandergrift—a Republican at that. [Laughter.] If my friend would state on oath—no, I will waive that—that copper of all kinds is on the free list, I will be willing to destroy this document and strike out of the RECORD the statement that I have made in reference to this matter; but for the present I will ask the committee to permit me to print these several paragraphs in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to print certain documents and remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. On page 58 of this document—No. 192. Fifty-fifth Congress, first session, Senate, containing a comparison of the tariff acts of 1897, 1894, and 1890—we find in the act of 1897, paragraph 193, this:

Articles or wares not specially provided for in this act, composed wholly or in part of iron, steel, lead, copper, etc., * * * and whether wholly or partly manufactured, 45 per cent ad valorem.

On page 54 of this same document we read this:

SEC. 196. Copper in roll plates, brasiers, sheets, rods, pipes, and copper bottoms, 2½ cents per pound; sheathing or yellow metal of which copper is the component material of chief value, and not composed wholly or in part of iron, ungalvanized, 2 cents per pound.

On page 157 we find this, section 612:

Medals of gold, silver, or copper, and other metallic articles actually bestowed as trophies or prizes, and received and accepted as honorary distinction.

On page 183 we find this, section 12:

That all materials of foreign production which may be necessary for the construction of vessels built in the United States for foreign account and ownership, or for the purpose of being employed in the foreign trade, including the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, and all such materials necessary for the building of their machinery and all articles which are necessary for their outfit and equipment may be imported in bond, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may describe, and upon proof that such material has been used for such purposes no duties shall be paid thereon. But vessels receiving the benefit of this section shall not be allowed to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States more than two months in any one year, except upon the payment to the United States of the duties of which a rebate is herein allowed: Provided, That vessels built in the United States for foreign account and ownership shall not be allowed to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States.

The following appears on the free list with a string tied to it, so to speak, something like the string that put anthracite coal on the free list and did not put it on, as I have before stated. That coal section read as follows—section 523:

Coal, anthracite, not specially provided for in this act—

Shall be free. But in another section away off somewhere in the bill, all anthracite coal was taxed unless it had a certain amount of fixed carbon in it (92 per cent), when as a matter of fact practically no anthracite coal has that amount of carbon in it. So, by a process of reasoning and strangulation, anthracite coal that was imported paid a tax because it did not contain the required amount of fixed carbon.

Now, then, right close to this anthracite-coal section, to wit, 523, we find the free-copper section, 532, which reads:

Copper in plates, bars, ingots, or pigs, and other forms, not manufactured, or specially provided for in this act—

Shall be free. But you see, as I read this law, that these pieces of copper are specially provided for in sections that I first read.

Section 629 of the Dingley Act places "ores of gold, silver, copper, or nickel, and nickel matte, sweepings of gold and silver" on the free list. This section appears under the schedule "free list." So that while the raw ore may be on the free list yet the "manufactured article in part or entirely of copper," I say, is taxed, as stated in the paragraphs I read. This clearly shows that free raw material does not destroy our copper manufactures, and that free coal, I may add, we know did not destroy our coal industries, although enormous amounts were shipped in here after we placed coal temporarily on the free list.

The Clerk read as follows:

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY.

For every expenditure requisite for and incident to the survey of the coasts of the United States and of coasts under the jurisdiction of the United States, including the survey of rivers to the head of tide water or ship navigation; deep-sea soundings, temperature and current observations along the coast and throughout the Gulf Stream and Japan Stream flowing off the said coasts; tidal observations; the necessary resurveys; the preparation of the Coast Pilot; continuing researches and other work relating to physical hydrography and terrestrial magnetism and the magnetic maps of the United States and adjacent waters, and the tables of magnetic declination, dip, and intensity usually accompanying them, astronomical and gravity observations; and including compensation, not otherwise appropriated for, of persons employed in the field work, in conformity with the regulations for the government of the Coast and Geodetic Survey adopted by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor; for special examinations that may be required by the Light-House Board or other proper authority; for commutation to officers of the field force while on field duty, at a rate to be fixed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, not exceeding $2.50 per day each; outfit, equipment, and care of vessels used in the Survey, and also the repairs and maintenance of the complement of vessels, to be expended in accordance with the regulations relating to the Coast and Geodetic Survey from time to time prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and under the following heads: Provided, That no advance of money to chiefs of field parties under this appropriation shall be made unless to a commissioned officer, or to a civilian chief of party, who shall give bond in such sum as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may direct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to make remarks at this point for ten minutes on the subject-matter of the bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that this item be passed over without prejudice until to-morrow, so that I may look into it, and that then it be taken up.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It is proposed that this whole section be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The paragraph extending from line 4 on page 43 to line 12 on page 4 ?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes, sir; I understand the gentleman from Indiana wants to move an amendment. I should therefore like the matter to go over until I can look into it.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the paragraph extending from line 4 on page 43 to line 21 on page 44, pertaining to the Coast and Geodetic Survey, be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I believe I shall ask to make my remarks at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I suggest that it might be well to let the whole matter go over until to-morrow. I shall have no objection at that time to the gentleman occupying ten minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Very well.

The Clerk read as follows, under the heading, "Salaries, Coast and Geodetic Survey:"

For eight assistants, at $1,200 each.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word. I notice that this bill carries appropriations for the clerical force in Washington of the Hydrographic Office, the Geological Survey, the Commissioner of Fish, and various other branches of the Government service. One of the things that I have never been able to find out during my somewhat brief experience in Congress has been in what bills to find the various appropriations. It would ordinarily be supposed that the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which is understood to carry appropriations for all offices in Washington, would carry the appropriation for the Geological Survey, for the Hydrographic Office, and these various other offices. But when we look into the matter we find that such is not the case. For instance, when the sundry civil bill comes along we find sundry items relating to these bureaus or departments here when we are not expecting them. I suggest to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee that he throw some light upon this question, so that Members of Congress may have some clew by which they may find out where the appropriation items relating to particular offices are to be looked for—in what bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that the legislative bill does not carry appropriations for all the service performed at Washington. For instance, provision for all the service in the Agricultural Department is carried in the agricultural bill. Twenty years ago these appropriations for the various Departments of the Government were divided. This item for salaries in the Coast and Geodetic Survey has always been carried upon this bill. It is a service that reaches out into various parts of the country, there being some employees in Washington and some outside of Washington. It has been deemed best to carry them all together on one bill, so that when you seek to find who are employed in this particular service you may find the whole information on this bill.

I do not know but that it might be best if it could be so arranged that the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] be carried out; but in the division of these bills certain items have been placed on the sundry civil bill, certain other items on the legislative bill, certain others on the fortification bill, certain others on the deficiency bill, etc. We seek to keep particular items on particular bills, to accomplish what the gentleman from Illinois wishes to have done, so that Members may know when they find an item on one of these bills one year that they may expect to find the same item on the same bill the following year. The item now under consideration has been carried on this bill since this service was begun.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee [Mr. HEMENWAY] must know that the average Member of Congress does not stay here twenty years. I dare say there is no Member who knows just where to find all these various items. For instance, for the Revenue-Cutter Service you make a great appropriation in this bill, but for the office at Washington you make appropriation in the legislative bill. So with the Life-Saving Service. Here you make a distinction. Now, the distinction is not that the service reaches throughout the United States, because, although the Naval Committee reports appropriations for naval affairs, the appropriation for the offices of the Navy Department in Washington is made through the Appropriation Committee. A similar thing is true with reference to the War Department.

If there is no good reason—and the reason offered by the chairman of the committee is certainly not a good one, because it would not be true after the first year that a change was made—why is it not possible for the Appropriations Committee, which has jurisdiction of all these bills, where there is any conflict, to arrange and systematize this matter, so that one may readily know where a particular item of appropriation is to be found?

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman will take the appropriation bills of any year and ascertain what items are carried on that particular bill, he may rest assured that the next year they will be found in just the same place on the bill of that year.

Mr. MANN. My memory does not go back far enough to enable me to remember on what bill or bills particular items have heretofore appeared.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If any Member will take but a short time to inform himself as to the bill on which any particular item is carried, he may know that in the same bill reported the next year he will find that same item.

Now, that is the reason why it is not wise to undertake to switch items from one bill to another, because Members become familiar with these bills and learn to look on the sundry civil bill for this particular service. They learn to look on the legislative bill for the service in the office of the Secretary of the Navy, and upon the naval bill for the greater part of the service outside of Washington. If we go to changing things around, they will not know where to look.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman knows that the Members of the House do not know where to hunt for most of these items. I dare say the gentleman himself would not be able to tell offhand where they are, scattered around in the way they are.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, no——

Mr. MANN. Let me give the gentleman an instance. I watch these appropriation bills, and not a great while ago I procured the insertion of an amendment in the bill relating to the subtreasury at Chicago. That office is not in Washington and naturally would not be expected to be in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yet a great many of them are.

Mr. MANN. My judgment was that it would be in the sundry civil bill, where it would belong. One day I received a telegram from Chicago while the legislative bill was under consideration this winter asking for information on the subject. I wired back that the appropriation for the subtreasury was not carried in the legislative bill, but in the sundry civil bill. Now, my recollection may not be as good as the gentleman's, but the gentleman and myself had agreed at one time upon an amendment which went in. I had watched the matter and I was as well informed on the subject as the average Member of Congress is; but you can not carry these things in your head. I hope the gentleman will see fit in his committee to tear up a few of the old roots there and rearrange the bills so that Members of Congress may not have to rely upon memory to know where each item among these thousands of items is to be found, but can tell where they ought to be, and find them.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman's suggestions will be given careful consideration, as all his suggestions are.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3456. An act to designate parcels of land in the District of Columbia for the purposes of assessment and taxation, and for other purposes.

S. 3781. An act relating to the payment and disposition of pension money due to inmates of Government Hospital for the Insane.

S. 4248. An act to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Idaho;

S. 4448. An act for the relief of Central University of the State of Kentucky, and A. R. Burnam and John Bennett; and

S. 5075. An act to authorize the board of commissioners of Vigo County, Ind., to construct and maintain a wagon, foot, and trolley-car bridge across the Wabash River at the foot of Wabash avenue, in the city of Terre Haute, in said county and State.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 8681. An act to detach the county of Linn, in the State of Missouri, from the western and attach it to the eastern judicial district of said State;

H. R. 10925. An act directing the issue of a check in lieu of a lost check drawn in favor of the Pittsburg Shear, Knife and Machine Company, now the Heppenstall Forge and Knife Company, of Pittsburg, Pa.; and

H. R. 12833. An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10669) to regulate the issue of licenses for Turkish, Russian, or medicated baths in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 7402. An act for the relief of the Indiana State board of agriculture.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fish hatchery, Manchester, Iowa: For protection of the station against floods, $5,000.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 64, after line 14, insert:

"Fish hatchery, Northville, Mich.: For constructing and repairing bass ponds, improving water supply, sewerage and drainage system, and protecting station against floods, $5,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Enforcement of the Chinese-exclusion act: To prevent unlawful entry of Chinese into the United States, by the appointment of suitable officers to enforce the laws in relation thereto, and for expenses of returning to China all Chinese persons found to be unlawfully in the United States, including the cost of imprisonment and actual expense of conveyance of Chinese persons to the frontier or seaboard for deportation, $900,000, of which sum $1,000 per annum shall be paid to the Commissioner-General of Immigration as additional compensation: Provided, That so much of the amount hereby appropriated, or hereafter appropriated for similar purposes, as may be necessary shall be available for the establishment and maintenance of the Bertillon system of identification at the various ports of entry; but this proviso shall not apply to persons embraced in Article III of the treaty with China of 1894.

Mr. LIVERNASH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the period in line 8, page 65, substituting a colon and adding the following:

"Provided, further, That $10,000 of this appropriation shall be for enforcement of said laws so far as they prohibit entry and harboring of Chinese as seamen aboard vessels of American register."

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is new legislation, changing existing law.

Mr. LIVERNASH. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California will be heard.

Mr. LIVERNASH. May I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] to restate his point of order? I was unable to hear his statement.

Mr. HEMENWAY. My point of order is that it is not germane, and that it changes existing law.

Mr. LIVERNASH. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the amendment is germane in that it relates to the use of a part of the appropriation carried by the paragraph for a part of the general purpose for which the appropriation as a whole is made; and I submit that it is not open to the objection that it changes existing law, because an examination of its text must convince the Chair that it merely calls for enforcement of the exclusion laws "so far as they prohibit," etc.

It is not within my intention to alter the existing law, but to have the pending bill carry something in the nature of an admonition to the Department of Commerce and Labor that neglect to enforce existing law should cease.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I want to ask the gentleman if the Commissioner of Immigration has in any way failed to perform his duty in enforcing the law?

Mr. LIVERNASH. I disclaim the disposition to criticise the Commissioner of Immigration. Without undertaking to say at whose door the responsibility rests, however, I am certain that the law has not been enforced in the respects covered by the amendment.

The law prohibits Chinese persons of enumerated qualities from entering American territory, and seamen such as those now employed on American ships in our over-sea trade fall within the prohibition. American ships are in contemplation of law American territory, and notwithstanding this it is true that all the trans-Pacific steamships flying our flag and engaged in the China trade are manned by Chinamen. The amendment is offered as an aid to the alteration of this condition. Congress, I think, should make clear to the Department of Commerce and Labor that some of the appropriation for enforcement of the exclusion law is intended for enforcement of that law in so far as it affects this neglected class of violations.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire to be heard? If not, the Chair will rule.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think I have nothing to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule that the proviso here is itself new legislation; and it has been a settled rule, as the Chair understands it, where a paragraph inserted in a bill changes existing law, an amendment may be allowed which is germane to the subject included in the new paragraph. If the point of order had been raised to the proviso itself, it would have been necessary to sustain it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the Chair will please permit, the proviso is the provision that has run in the bill for some time, and because the proviso has been running in an appropriation bill for two or three years that changed existing law for the year it was first inserted, certainly that does not open up the scope of changing existing law in another particular. Why, if that is the rule of the House, we can have legislation upon nearly every provision in this bill. It certainly can not be the rule of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the Chair to understand that this proviso in this appropriation bill is settled law? Is it in accordance with established law, or is it merely an item that has gone into appropriation bills year by year?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is the provision that has been running in the bill:

That so much of the amount hereby appropriated, or hereafter appropriated for similar purposes, as may be necessary shall be available, etc.

The words "or hereafter appropriated" seem to be new in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That would seem to make it a change of law.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that if it is a change of law it is subject to the point of order. No point of order having been made upon it, another provision which changes existing law is not, for that reason, made in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question in this case is whether, first, this proviso is in accordance with an established law; second, whether the proviso offered by way of an amendment by the gentleman from California is germane to it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. And is a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. It was held in the Forty-eighth Congress, then in the Fifty-fourth, and still again in the Fifty-fifth and Fifty-seventh Congresses——

Mr. HEMENWAY. Pardon me, before the Chair goes further. The proviso here has not been discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I desire to make the point of order upon the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. There has been discussion, and the gentleman from Indiana will recognize that it will be too late to make it now.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Now, as to the point of order as to these words "or hereafter appropriated." I can not understand how, under the rules of the House, the Chair can hold that where a proviso changing existing law has been passed without the point of order being made to that proviso that that makes in order another proviso changing existing law. Why, if that were true, as I say, we could go ahead on this appropriation bill and change the whole law in reference to Chinese exclusion.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph having been read, it was not objected to——

Mr. HEMENWAY. I call atttention to the fact that this amendment is directed to line 8 of page 65 of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Sixty-six, is it not?

Mr. LIVERNASH. I will say it ought to be 66.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If there is to be a technical ruling, I insist that the amendment shall apply to that particular point; so that we may reach the whole matter.

Mr. LIVERNASH. I mean to amend page 66.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I object to that amendment. Let it go where it is directed in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us have an understanding about this. Is the amendment to page 65 or 66.

Mr. LIVERNASH. Page 66.

The CHAIRMAN. The mere fact, I take it, that it was stated as page 65 when it is clear 66 was intended should settle that matter.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, the amendment states page 65 and I want to be clear——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I desire to say to my friend that if this amendment is withdrawn there will be a new one presented like it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If I understood the Chair to interpret the rules to be that this proviso on page 66 makes the proviso in order, then I think it is fair I should have the right to make the point of order to the proviso on page 66.

The CHAIRMAN. What does the gentleman from Indiana say to the fact that the paragraph included in the proviso was read, and that no point of order was raised upon it, and that the amendment was offered to the paragraph as if it were to be perfected by that amendment?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Technically, then, I have no right to make the point of order, but upon the other hand, as it is purely a technical matter, I call attention to the fact that the amendment is directed to page 65. I offer the point of order to the amendment as directed to this page. Now, then, the discussion so far has been upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from California, but I do not concede for a minute that under the rule of this House, this proviso being in, that another provision changing existing law is made in order by the provision that has been passed in the bill without the point of order having been made to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the rule is clear. When a provision in a bill which is out of order is read and is unobjected to, it becomes a part of the bill. The question whether it is in order or not, whether it is a variation from established law or not, is then foreclosed. The paragraph is settled and passed upon by the committee. Then, if an amendment is proposed here and discussion intervenes no point of order can be allowed to the paragraph; it is beyond that stage.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I concede on that point the Chair is right. This provision is passed; it is foreclosed, and, as far as this bill is concerned, is law. Then I insist that another proviso which changes existing law is not in order, and, by the statement of the Chair, this proviso has been passed: it is part of the bill; it is law, then, as far as this bill is concerned. Then, is another provision changing existing law in order because this proviso has been passed?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Indiana if this amendment is not germane to this proviso here in the bill?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I should think not. It also changes existing law.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit a suggestion?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. This proviso in the bill only relates to the establishment of the Bertillon system.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Now, an amendment that relates to that is germane, but the amendment of the gentleman from California is not germane to this proviso, and hence is subject to the point of order that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. On that the Chair would like to hear the gentleman from Indiana, as well as the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, may I submit a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. OLMSTED. I understood the gentleman from Indiana to say he desired to make a point of order against that proviso; am I right?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Only if I had to do it. As I understand the rules of the House, this proviso, having been passed and having been read, another proviso changing existing law would not be in order; but the Chair, as I understand, started to rule, because this provision was in here and had changed existing law, that another proviso changing existing law was in order.

Mr. MANN. Only if it was germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The point to which the Chair would call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana is to the query whether, this proviso being here, the whole paragraph does not become an entirety, and the question then is not whether this is a germane amendment to the proviso, but is it a germane amendment to the whole paragraph in which the proviso is included?

Mr. OLMSTED. If the Chairman will permit an inquiry, I submit that——

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Indiana will yield.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I yield.

Mr. OLMSTED. The gentleman from California offered an amendment which, as written, applied specifically to page 65, another paragraph. Now, before he corrects that or offers a new amendment or asks unanimous consent to change that one, the gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order against the proviso on page 66, a different paragraph that has not been discussed. Now, would not his point of order be in order before the gentleman from California has amended his amendment or qualified it?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Of course.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Following the suggestion of the Chair——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, if I may interrupt my colleague, I do not want any rights to be lost of putting in a new point of order by reason of germaneness, and I ask for the parliamentary status, so as to make that point if it is necessary at this time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the parliamentary question?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. As to whether any point of order has been made as to the germaneness.

The CHAIRMAN. To the proviso or to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Either.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been made to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California—a general point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If there has been no point of order as to the germaneness of this proposition, I desire to make the point of order that debate has already intervened and that it comes too late.

Mr. MANN. That was made in the beginning.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, there has been no debate on the paragraph; the debate was on the amendment which was offered to the preceding paragraph, on page 65. My inquiry is whether the gentleman from Indiana was not in order in making the point of order against the proviso on page 66, no amendment having been offered and no debate having been had?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to hear the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the Chair will answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania first.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, whether the amendment read belongs to page 65 rather than to page 66? The Chair is of opinion that this amendment having been read immediately after the paragraph on page 66, and having apparently been regarded as appertaining to that paragraph, the mere fact that in the written form of the amendment the figures 65 were used rather than 66 should not be considered. I will hear the gentleman from Indiana first. I desire to hear the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from California each particularly upon this point—is this amendment germane to the paragraph as completed by the inclusion of this proviso?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that even if it were not germane, that the point came too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The general point of order having been raised, the Chair is inclined to consider the whole subject.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, this proviso provides that so much of the amount herein appropriated or hereafter appropriated for similar purposes as may be necessary shall be available for the establishment and maintenance of the Bertillon system of identification at the various ports of entry; but this proviso shall not apply to persons embraced in Article III of the treaty with China of 1894.

Now, the amendment adds the further proviso that $10,000 of this appropriation shall be for the enforcement of the laws so far as they prohibit the entering and harboring of the Chinese as seamen aboard vessels of American registry.

Now, these provisos have nothing whatever to do with each other. One provides for a system of measurement to identify Chinamen who are entitled to stay in the United States, those who are here being measured by this system and registered. That is the proviso. The other proviso offered by the gentleman from California provides that a certain amount of the appropriation shall be used for another purpose. Certainly one is not germane to the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The second proviso, as I understand the gentleman from Indiana, is not germane to the first proviso.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think there is no question about that. It is not germane. If the Chair should hold that the whole section must be considered together, then, of course, it is a different question. "To prevent the unlawful entry of Chinese into the United States by the appointment of a suitable officer to enforce the laws in relation thereto, and for the expenses of return of all Chinese found to be unlawfully in the United States, etc., $600,000." I do not believe that even the proviso is germane to the section, taken as a whole. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing further to offer, and I still believe that even if it is germane, that under the statement of the Chair, which is correct, that this proviso having passed without any point of order being made to it that then the proviso changed existing law, is still subject to a point of order, the only amendment in order being one to perfect the section, and this is not such an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What does the gentleman from Indiana say as to the allegation that this amendment is in accordance with and in execution of existing law?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I am free to say that I am not thoroughly familiar with the law. I have no desire in the least, by making a point of order, to prevent the strict enforcement of the existing law. I have not the law here. My understanding is that it is a change of existing law. The gentleman from California perhaps has the law.

Mr. LIVERNASH. I regret to say that I have not the text of the law at hand; but I have considerable familiarity with that text, and can state the substance of it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the proviso does not change existing law, it is not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear the law on that subject.

Mr. LIVERNASH. Mr. Chairman, the point of order as to germaneness I shall not discuss further than to urge that the proviso the amendment is designed to follow is now a part of the paragraph in question here. It ceased to be open to be treated apart from the language of the paragraph proof against points of order when the reading had progressed to the end of the line my amendment follows.

It should be considered, I think, that the amendment is not any more offered to the proviso than to any other part of the paragraph. It amends the paragraph as an entirety, if it amends it at all; wherefore, if it be germane to any part of the paragraph, it is germane within the needs of the hour.

But, even if it were needful, the proviso now in the paragraph having been subject to a point of order as new legislation, that to escape the point of order as to germaneness the amendment should, if new legislation, be germane to the proviso, the amendment should, I feel, be ruled to be good, for it is not new legislation and the question of germaneness can not be narrowed as it is here sought to narrow it. Viewed broadly, certainly the amendment is germane to those provisions of the paragraph calling for enforcement of the exclusion laws.

That the amendment is not new legislation appears when it is pointed out that the law as it stands requires exclusion of the objectionable seamen from American territory, American ships being American territory.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from California [Mr. LIVERNASH] suggest when this statute was passed? Does he refer to the latest law upon the subject?

Mr. LIVERNASH. The latest statute—the so-called "Platt Act"—extended the exclusion laws in effect at the time of its passage, with the qualifications required by the provision that those laws were extended only so far as consistent with treaty obligations. It also in terms made the exclusion laws applicable to our colonial possessions.

Now, the laws as they stand prohibit the coming upon our territory and the harboring within our dominion of any Chinese persons of certain classes, and Chinese seamen are within the definition of the classes to be excluded.

It only remains to repeat that in a line of decisions quite unbroken, so far as I know, the courts of this country have held that the deck of an American ship is American territory. It follows that Chinese seamen not eligible to come upon our soil are not eligible to come upon the deck of one of our ships. The amendment takes cognizance of this condition of the law; that is all. It adds nothing, takes away nothing. Its value lies in this: That it might stimulate the Department of Commerce and Labor to enforce the law and so to protect our own seamen.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will read the proviso:

Provided further, That $10,000 of this appropriation shall be for the enforcement of said laws, so far as they prohibit the entry and harboring of Chinese as seamen aboard vessels of American register.

Now, the natural inference, I take it, from this phraseology would be that there were specific provisions in the law prohibiting the entry and harboring of Chinese as seamen aboard vessels of American register. Does the Chair understand that there are such provisions as that?

Mr. LIVERNASH. The laws do not in terms mention seamen, but they cover seamen. A ship carries only two classes of persons—passengers and seamen. The laws do not exclude passengers from our ships. Passengers may come to our ports and there apply for entry, but they do exclude persons who are not passengers, and persons who are not passengers are seamen. Thus, the amendment does not alter the law in the respect suggested.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, if I correctly understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. LIVERNASH], that he is seeking to put into this bill not an enforcement of what has been passed into law, but a declaration of what he claims is the law. Now, if I remember correctly, in the Chinese-exclusion bill that was passed two years ago it was sought to have enacted as law that it should apply to Chinese working upon American ships.

If that was the law, then it was not necessary for us to enact it into law, but this House adopted a provision by which we said that the Chinese should not be allowed to work as sailors upon American ships. That failed of passage and so did not become law. Certainly, Mr. Chairman, if there was a provision to that effect at that time, then the legislation which was sought to be passed was unnecessary, and I think the endeavor of the gentleman from California [Mr. LIVERNASH] is, by guise of an amendment, to declare not what has been enacted as law, but what he seeks to spell out of certain decisions of the courts in reference to the law. Certainly, Mr. Chairman, that is, as it seems to me, new legislation.

Mr. LIVERNASH. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] seems to be somewhat in error. The exclusion bill to which he refers carried a paragraph expressly excluding Chinese seamen from our ships; but that was not because the old laws had not gone that length, but because we were codifying and strengthening the old laws and (the Treasury Department having neglected to enforce the law in its relation to Chinese seamen) it was deemed prudent to expressly provide for enforcement with so much clearness that there could be no possible excuse for continued neglect. Besides it was finally thought that the law should contain something permitting ships flying our flag to hire Chinese seamen in foreign ports under certain conditions—distress, for instance. True, some persons thought the laws did not reach to our ships, and they may think so yet; but I have never been in any doubt on the subject, and I am of the impression that the Department of Commerce and Labor is of the belief that the laws are as I have stated them.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from California [Mr. LIVERNASH] any specific provision to which he desires to call the attention of the Chair—any provision relating to this subject and making the amendment germane as a provision coming in at the end of the paragraph?

Mr. LIVERNASH. I thank the Chair for the further opportunity, but I have sufficiently expressed my views.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the general rule, apparently established, is as stated in the Digest:

> A paragraph which changes existing law being allowed by general consent to remain, it may be perfected by any germane amendment.

Now, it appears that a proviso was included here and passed without objection which would have been subject, the Chair believes, to a point of order. To that an amendment was proposed. There have been, as the Chair is informed, conflicting decisions, and it is desirable that a uniform rule be established. The rule has been applied that where a provision is inserted which changes existing law it may be perfected by an amendment (which is germane), even though not in accordance with existing law.

The Chair, though somewhat doubtful, thinks this the best rule: That if a paragraph has been included in the bill which has in it a taint of illegality or of being contrary to existing law, that paragraph can be corrected or perfected by an amendment; but if the further paragraph which is proposed as an amendment carries a further degree of illegality affecting the whole paragraph as amended, then it is not in order.

So if the amendment of the gentleman from California simply pertained to the proviso which was out of order—that pertaining to the Bertillon system of identification, which was allowed to enter the bill—it would be in order; but if it pertains to the whole paragraph relating to the enforcement of the Chinese-exclusion act it is not in order.

It would appear from the reading that this is not an amendment to the proviso, which is in these words:

> Provided, That so much of the amount hereby appropriated, or hereafter appropriated for similar purposes, as may be necessary shall be available for the establishment and maintenance of the Bertillon system of identification at the various ports of entry; but this proviso shall not apply to persons embraced in Article III of the treaty with China of 1894.

To this it is proposed to add the amendment of the gentleman from California:

> And provided further, That $10,000 of this appropriation shall be for the enforcement of said laws so far as they prohibit the entry and harboring of Chinese as seamen aboard vessels of American register.

This proposed amendment clearly does not refer to the immediately preceding paragraph. It refers to the whole provision, beginning on the preceding page. Such being the case, the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Upon payment into the Treasury of the United States by the Washington Terminal Company of the sum of $40,000, and the undertaking of said company at its expense to construct and maintain a siding from a connection with the tracks of the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company to a heat, light, and power building intended to be established and maintained at a point on Government Reservation No. 17, near the line of New Jersey avenue extended, in connection with and appurtenant to the fireproof building for committee rooms, folding room, and other offices for the House of Representatives, authorized by act of Congress approved March 3, 1903, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes," the said The Washington Terminal Company, its successors and assigns, shall have and be possessed of the right and easement to occupy and use for the location, construction, and operation of its railroad authorized by act of Congress, approved February 28, 1903, entitled "An act to provide for a union railroad station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," a subsurface parcel of land through and beneath square 630 in the city of Washington, recently acquired by the United States as the site for said fireproof building, of such width, not exceeding 70 feet, as shall be required for the location, construction, and operation of said company's railroad on the route thereof as located conformably to the requirements of said last-mentioned act. The said railroad to be located and operated in a tunnel, which shall be constructed in such manner and of such structural strength as to assure the safe and convenient use of said square 630 for the purposes of said building site, in accordance with plan of construction to be approved in duplicate original by the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Building and Grounds, and also by the chief engineer of the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company, and one of such duplicates shall be filed with said superintendent and the other delivered to said the Washington Terminal Company.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> On page 71, after line 13, insert:
> "Toward the extension and completion of the Capitol building in accordance with the original plans therefor by the late Thomas U. Walter, with such modifications of the interior as may be found necessary or advantageous, and for each and every purpose connected therewith, $500,000; and the said construction shall be made under the direction of a commission, composed of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Members of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-eighth Congress, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, under the direction and supervision of said commission, is authorized to make contracts for said construction after proper advertisements and the reception of bids within a total sum not exceeding $2,500,000, including the sum herein appropriated, and said Superintendent, subject to the direction and approval of said commission, shall employ such professional and personal services in connection with said work as may be necessary. Any vacancy occurring, by resignation or otherwise, in the membership of the commission hereby created shall be filled by the presiding officer of the Senate or House, according as the vacancy occurs in the Senate or House representation on said commission."

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, this is the provision put on the bill last year for the extension of the Capitol. I move the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Depredations on public timber, protecting public lands, and settlement of claims for swamp land and swamp-land indemnity. To meet the expenses of protecting timber on the public lands, and for the more efficient execution of the law and rules relating to the cutting thereof; of protecting public lands from illegal and fraudulent entry or appropriation, and of adjusting claims for swamp lands, and indemnity for swamp lands, $250,000: Provided, That agents and others employed under this appropriation shall be selected by the Secretary of the Interior, and allowed per diem, subject to such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, in lieu of subsistence, at a rate not exceeding $4 per day each and actual necessary expenses for transportation, including necessary sleeping-car fares.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that portion of the paragraph just read commencing with the word "Provided," in line 77, page 73, down to the end of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Page 73, lines 17 to 23, inclusive.

Mr. MANN. That is, providing—

> That agents and others employed under this appropriation shall be selected by the Secretary of the Interior.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, state whether there is any law for thus fixing the appointment and compensation, as stated in this paragraph?

Mr. HEMENWAY. This is a limitation upon this appropriation that has been in the bill for many years. It puts this limitation on it:

> Provided, That agents and others employed under this appropriation shall be selected by the Secretary of the Interior—and so forth. It is a pure limitation upon the expenditure of the money, and has run in the bill for many years.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that it does not appear to have the form of a limitation, but of an express, positive, or affirmative provision.

Agents and others employed under this appropriation shall be selected by the Secretary of the Interior.

That does not look like a limitation.

Mr. RODEY. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee how they would be selected if it were not for that limitation?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from New Mexico?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes.

Mr. RODEY. I should like to ask the gentleman from Indiana how these employees would be selected were it not for this provision?

Mr. HEMENWAY (reading):

To meet the expenses of protecting timber on the public lands, and for the more efficient execution of the law and rules relating to the cutting thereof——

Mr. MANN. This same point of order was raised several years ago, and sustained by the Chair. I afterwards withdrew the point of order upon the statement that it was proposed to make some permanent law upon this subject, or something of that sort. There is no possible question, in my judgment, about its being subject to the point of order.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] has the floor. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I simply wish to have the gentleman from Illinois state for the information of the Chair how these employees would be appointed if this provision were not in the bill? Of course, if it is simply in furtherance of present law it is not a change of existing law. I suppose it is incumbent on the person making the objection to show that it does change existing law.

Mr. MANN. It shows on its face that it changes existing law, or is new law, one of the two; and in either case it is subject to the point of order. And if I may be permitted to answer the question asked by the gentleman from New Mexico and the gentleman from Massachusetts, of course, if this item goes out these employees will be appointed the same as the other appointees in the Interior Department are appointed.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I did not catch what the gentleman said.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asked me a question, and I answered while the gentleman was engaged in inquiring for further information.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have nothing further to offer on the point. I do not see why my friend should make it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that unless there can be something cited which would justify this provision he will be compelled to sustain the point of order. It is clearly creating a law that does not already exist. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I offer the following amendment.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman making the point of order if he will not withdraw it. The situation there is peculiar. To require that in securing a detective to enter upon a search for robbery the Secretary should be required to select a man on the civil-service list, at the head of the list, I believe would really absolutely prevent securing a suitable man. The Secretary is confronted with a number of frauds. A special and peculiar man, a man specially fitted for that particular work, may be selected by him to perform those duties, but under the civil-service law he must take whoever is at the head of the list, that has passed the necessary satisfactory examination as to his educational qualifications, without adaptation for secret-service work, the class of work required to be done here. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MANN. There are several other items in the bill that are subject to a similar point of order.

Mr. LACEY. But the gentleman will see the difficulty that the Secretary would labor under in his efforts to enforce this law without having a chance to pick the agent.

Mr. MANN. I do not see any greater difficulty about selecting Government employees in this case than in any other case under the Government. These men, as I know from some information, a great many of them, are not skilled in any way and not detectives by any means. There are several of these items. I am perfectly willing for it to be considered subject to the point of order, but I shall insist on the point of order.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 17, page 73, insert:

"Provided, That in expending this sum agents and others employed under this appropriation shall be selected by the Secretary of the Interior, and allowed per diem, subject to such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, in lieu of subsistence, at a rate not exceeding $3 per day each and actual necessary expenses for transportation, including necessary sleeping-car fares."

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order on that, Mr. Chairman. I would not consider that the gentleman thought I knew anything about parliamentary law if he thought I would make the point of order on one and not on the other.

Mr. HEMENWAY. This makes it within the rule. I believe if the gentleman will investigate these matters that he will not want to insist upon the point of order. So I ask that it may go over without prejudice until to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the paragraph go over without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. Down to surveying of public lands, on page 76, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the request of the gentleman to be to include from line 17 to line 23, inclusive.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is right. After we get through with the other point you want to make the point.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, without objection, the request will be granted and the paragraph from line 17 to line 23, on page 73, will be passed over.

The Clerk read as follows:

Protection and administration of forest reserves: To meet the expenses of executing the provisions of the sundry civil act approved June 4, 1897, for the care and administration of the forest reserves, to meet the expenses of forest inspectors and assistants, superintendents, supervisors, surveyors, rangers, and for the employment of foresters and other emergency help in the prevention and extinguishment of forest fires, and for advertising dead and matured trees for sale within such reservations: Provided, That forestry agents, superintendents, and supervisors, and other persons employed under this appropriation shall be selected by the Secretary of the Interior wholly with reference to their fitness and without regard for their political affiliations, and allowed per diem, subject to such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, in lieu of subsistence, at a rate not exceeding $3 per day each, and actual necessary expenses for transportation, including necessary sleeping-car fares, $375,000: Provided further, That forestry agents, superintendents, supervisors, and all other persons employed in connection with the administration and protection of forest reservations shall, in all ways that are practicable, aid in the enforcement of the laws of the State or Territory in which said forest reservation is situated in relation to the protection of fish and game.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order against that.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Let it go over.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order on page 74, line 17 to line 22.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing to reserve the point of order, but I want the point of order stated before it goes over. I wish to state the point of order, Mr. Chairman. It is to lines 8 to 16 on page 74.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Illinois to make the point of order also to that paragraph?

Mr. MANN. I certainly do make the point of order to lines 8 to 16 of the paragraph on page 74.

The CHAIRMAN. And also to lines 17 to 22?

Mr. MANN. No; I do not make the point of order on lines 17 to 22.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will restate the proposition. Lines 17 to 22, being similar to those on the preceding page, in the location of the paragraph, it was understood by the Chair as to these lines that the point of order was raised. Unanimous consent is asked that the consideration of lines 8 to 16 be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. OLMSTED. Pending that, I would like to ask the Chairman one question as to the meaning of these words, "in lieu of subsistence, at a rate not exceeding $3 per day." Now, does that mean that these employees are to be allowed $3 a day in lieu of their expenses?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Instead of paying their actual bills on voucher, they give them $3. If paid for subsistence, they would have to have receipts for breakfast, dinner, supper, and so on.

Mr. OLMSTED. Do they get this in addition?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is in lieu of subsistence.

Mr. OLMSTED. "Not exceeding $3 per day each, and actual expenses for transportation, including necessary sleeping-car fares."

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is their transportation, not subsistence.

Mr. OLMSTED. Does that include compensation also, or is this given in addition?

Mr. HEMENWAY. No; this does not contain their compensation.

Mr. OLMSTED. Is this their traveling expenses?

Mr. HEMENWAY. They get their travel pay, and this $3 is in lieu of subsistence.

Mr. RODEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question. If this matter is passed over until to-morrow, I would ask if that paragraph—as it is permitted to stand, and not subject to the point of order—is open to amendment?

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the amendment is in order; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The whole paragraph will come before the committee.

Mr. HOGG. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to ask if one might be permitted to introduce an amendment afterwards to this section?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes; of course, if it is in order. Of course I reserve the right to make the point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, inquiry was made in reference to this part of the section which reads "in lieu of subsistence" by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED]. I am not sure as to the operation of the law embodied in several previous sections, but it is in practically the same language as the other. There is a Department of the Government that makes its regulations under a Congressional enactment not dissimilar to this language, "in lieu of subsistence," and those regulations give a certain per diem allowance. The officer receiving the allowance has a salary to start with. The Government furnishes them certain necessaries not unlike those provided for here, as sleeping-car and railroad expenses, and in addition to that their salary is raised by bureau legislation by the amount of the commutation for sub istence, which is contained in that case in language similar to this, at the rate of $2 a day for every day in the year.

In other words, an officer receives $2,000 salary, we will say, and in lieu of subsistence he receives $2 for each day of the year, which gives him $720 in addition to that salary. And he gets that subsistence lieu, though in great part the Government furnishes it in another manner to him. He gets it twice in part, and in addition to that gets his salary. It is an indirect increase of salary of officers by a bureau legislation of this Government, creating an abuse and discrimination open and flagrant, and is legislation by a bureau without Congressional sanction. Whether it prevails in reference to the Department provided for in this section I do not know, but I thought it well for the gentleman to have this statement made to aid him in his investigation, because that is an objectionable class of bureau legislation that I will try to prevent in reference to another bureau covered in this bill's appropriation, and which was passed over by consent till to-morrow.

The Clerk read as follows:

Examinations of desert lands: To enable the Secretary of the Interior to examine, under such regulations and at such compensation as he may prescribe, the desert lands selected by the States under the provisions of section 4 of the act of Congress approved August 18, 1894, $1,000: Provided, That if such examinations be made by detailed clerks or employees of the Department, they shall be entitled to actual necessary expenses of transportation, including necessary sleeping-car fares, and not exceeding $3 per day in lieu of subsistence.

Mr. HOGG. Mr. Chairman, I would like have that section passed also.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the paragraph on page 75 beginning on line 9 and extending down to and including line 19 be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that on page 72, beginning with line 14, down to line 5 on page 73, be likewise passed without prejudice. It is embraced in the same general class, and if anything develops to-morrow we ought to have it in with the same general proposition.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, it has no relation to this item, and I shall have to object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transcripts of records and plats, General Land Office: For furnishing transcripts of records and plats, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $18,720: Provided, That persons employed under this appropriation shall be selected by the Secretary of the Interior at a compensation of $2 per day while actually employed, at such times and for such periods as the exigencies of the work may demand: Provided further, That not more than one-twelfth of this appropriation shall be expended in any one month of the year for which it is available.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois desires to raise the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I desire to raise the point of order to that portion of the paragraph commencing with the word "Provided," in line 24, page 75, and ending with the word "demand," in line 3, page 76.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order on the portion of the paragraph beginning with the word "Provided," in line 24, page 75, and ending with the word "demand," in line 3, page 76.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is in line with the other request made.

Mr. OLMSTED. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana the purpose of this appropriation, which seems to be for making copies of papers in the Land Office. Why can they not be made without this appropriation of $18,720 by the clerks already employed at fixed salaries for that Department?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will say to the gentleman that this lot of clerks have been employed for many years. The general appropriation has been $10,000 per annum, but before the end of the year rolls up they would have to have an additional appropriation of anywhere from $6,000 to $10,000. The Government gets paid for this work, and the receipts amount to more than the expenditures. There is so much work it would be impossible for the clerks in the office to do it without the aid of this additional force.

Mr. OLMSTED. Why not, then, give them more clerks that come under the usual civil-service regulations rather than appoint continually, and for all time to come apparently, clerks from the outside, to be selected at the will of the Secretary at a cost of from eighteen to twenty thousand dollars?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, the only reason I can give is this, that the Government has no trouble in getting these clerks at this price. So far as I understand, they are ladies employed who are thoroughly competent, and they are anxious to have this employment, and this item has run in the bill for a long while; I think ever since I have been in Congress. This was and is simply one little lot of employees who are not under civil service and can be employed by the Secretary of the Interior without regard to civil-service rules.

Mr. OLMSTED. I do not see why they shouldn't all be employed in that way if a part are.

Mr. HEMENWAY. It results in saving the Government annually a great deal of money, for these clerks employed at $2 a day do the work of clerks receiving larger salaries under the classified service. As far as I can learn these people are glad to get the employment and do the work for the price received.

Mr. OLMSTED. Does not that indicate that you could get clerks to do the whole work at this rate?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think so.

Mr. HOGG. Does the gentleman think he could get men out West in the forest reserves that will do any considerable work for $2 a day?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, this has nothing to do with the West. These are young or old ladies—I do not know which—employed here in the Department.

Mr. HOGG. I think the execution of the laws heretofore in regard to western affairs has been in the hands of old ladies. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEMENWAY. This is not a western affair; this is a force employed in Washington making transcripts of records.

Mr. HOGG. I understand that; but doesn't the gentleman think that you ought to have clerks in the Interior Department that know what they are about?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Has the gentleman ever heard anyone complain that this work was not well done?

Mr. HOGG. Yes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I never heard of it.

Mr. HOGG. Well, I can tell the gentleman that it isn't done satisfactorily. The trouble in the West is you get women in Washington to do the work for the West and we get the result of it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not think the gentleman understands the paragraph. These people are not doing work for out West, they are at work in the Interior Department.

Mr. HOGG. And when they get through with their copying, although they remain in the Department, we get the result of it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman is mistaken. They are simply copyists who sit down and copy records and afterwards compare them and see that they are correct.

Mr. HOGG. And we get the results of these matters that are determined by the Interior Department by this class of employees.

Mr. HEMENWAY. These services are performed in the Interior Department; they are only to copy records, and they have nothing whatever to do with the West.

Mr. HOGG. If you will just say that they are for mere clerical duties, we will be content. The trouble out West is that we have suffered from the people who make reports to the Interior Department, who take those reports as absolute verity.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, this force has nothing to do with that; they are purely copyists.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is there objection to this item?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman from Illinois, I understand, asks that this portion of the proviso which provides that these persons employed under this appropriation shall be selected by the Secretary of the Interior, at a compensation of $2 a day, may be passed over. He reserves the point of order to it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope that will not be objected to, because this is the last vestige of the spoils system in our Government. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Ohio might bring in a rule to preserve it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman from Illinois wants it to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman from Ohio know that even if these people are not under the classified service that when he goes to secure the appointment of some one he finds that they have to pass an examination?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I leave that to the apostles of civil-service reform to ask for those places. I never have asked for one.

Mr. LACEY. If the gentleman from Indiana will permit, I would like to make a suggestion. This work is irregular. Sometimes the demand is very large and sometimes very small. If you employed a permanent force by the year, adequate to make the copies at all times, you would have an excessive force. This force, as it it now constituted, can be diminished or increased as necessity dictates.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman from Iowa read this paragraph?

Mr. LACEY. I have.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know that the paragraph provides that no more than one-twelfth shall be expended in any one month?

Mr. LACEY. That makes no difference.

Mr. MANN. I should think it would make a difference whether the force was permanent or not.

Mr. LACEY. When more force is demanded they can increase it by paying $2 a day, and when it is not demanded they can decrease it by discharging them.

Mr. OLMSTED. Doesn't the gentleman know that they pay $2 a day for every day in the year?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the rights of the people to peaceably assemble and petition Congress is guaranteed by the Constitution. This extends not only to petitions for legislation not pending, but to protests against legislation threatened and for legislation for which no action has been taken. I desire to read a petition at this time. It is as follows:

HEADQUARTERS STANSBURY POST, No. 125,
DEPARTMENT OF INDIANA, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
Ligonier, Ind., March 25, 1904.

Resolved, (1) That the new ruling of E. F. Ware, Commissioner of Pensions, does not meet the wishes of Stansbury Post, No. 125, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, in the matter of service pensions and is not acceptable as a substitute for a service-pension bill.

(2) That if the said ruling was made to prevent enactment of pending pension legislation, we consider it a direct slap in the face of the old soldier.

(3) That we have no fault to find with the ruling itself so far as it goes.

(4) That, considering the difference in point of length of service, battles fought, territory marched over, and consequent exposure and endurance suffered, the usual comparisons of the veteran of 1861-1865 with the Mexican war veteran is hardly fair; and if discrimination is had, it should be in favor of the former and not against them.

C. R. GRAVES, Commander.
I. SIMMONS, Adjutant.

Hundreds of petitions like this from Grand Army posts and old soldiers have been received by Members of Congress and thousands more are on the way. These prayers should be heard and published in the RECORD.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BURTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the sundry civil appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEWIS AND CLARK EXPOSITION.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I shall send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That during the remainder of this session the bill (S. 276) entitled "An act to provide for the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the exploration of the Oregon country," etc., shall have the privilege of bills reported from committees having leave to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker I reserve the right to object.

Mr. RODEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if that cuts out the privileged report——

Mr. TAWNEY. It does not cut out a privileged report and does not affect the privilege of any other bill. The Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions has stricken out of the Senate bill all after the enacting clause, and has reported a bill to the House which provides simply for governmental participation in the exposition which is to be held in Oregon next year for the purpose of commemorating this event. It is merely for governmental participation. It does not authorize the exposition, it does not appoint a commission, it does not invite foreign governments, but is simply such participation as the Government has heretofore taken in the matter of expositions authorized by the States. This resolution is simply for the purpose of affording an opportunity to have the bill considered at some time before the close of the session.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Will it interfere with the Territorial bill on the subject of statehood?

Mr. TAWNEY. It does not interfere with the statehood bill or any other bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I should want to be satisfied of that proposition.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will make a parliamentary inquiry, I think the Speaker will satisfy him that this privilege will not conflict with any privileged matter in the House.

Mr. OLMSTED. How much more money does it appropriate?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I don't understand exactly what the bill is. The gentleman has told us what it is not, but I should like to know what it is.

Mr. TAWNEY. The bill authorizes governmental participation in the State exposition at Oregon, known as the "Lewis and Clark Centennial Exposition," in 1905. The Senate bill appropriated $1,775,000 and the substitute proposed on the part of the House committee appropriates for a Government building, an exhibit only, $475,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much money does the bill carry in all?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Four hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars.

Mr. TAWNEY. The substitute proposed by the House appropriates $475,000 instead of $1,775,000, as the bill came to the House from the Senate.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman what his purpose is. Is it to prevent other legislation, to block other legislation and prevent other resolutions?

Mr. TAWNEY. Not at all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. When does the gentleman propose to take it up?

Mr. TAWNEY. Whenever there is an opportunity for taking it up. It is not privileged, and there is no way by which it can be gotten up, except by a rule, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have made some efforts to get some legislation heard myself, but have thus far been unable to do it.

Mr. TAWNEY. This proposition simply saves the necessity of applying to the Committee on Rules for a rule providing for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. DALZELL. If I understand it, this order does not do anything more than give an opportunity for this particular bill to receive consideration.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that this proposed order would give this bill the same privileges, for instance, as a resolution from the Committee on Accounts; that is to say, it will be within the power of the House, if this order be adopted, to consider this bill as a privileged matter whenever a majority may choose to consider it. It will enable the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] and his committee to have the bill considered at any time, if a majority of the House should desire to consider it. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether he desires that some day this bill shall be considered and immediately passed, or does he desire to use it as a "buffer" to keep out other legislation?

Mr. TAWNEY. I desire to have the bill considered on its merits and passed whenever a majority of the House may decide to take it up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am opposed to the appropriation, but will not object to the consideration of the order.

Mr. MANN. I think that a request of this kind ought to be submitted when there are more Members present than there are now.

Mr. TAWNEY. I am as sorry as the gentleman that there are not more here.

Mr. MANN. If the proposition is pressed, I must object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

REPRINT OF SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House bill No. 14416, the sundry civil appropriation bill, be reprinted.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

And then, on motion of Mr. HEMENWAY (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communication was taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for compensation for damages done to private property by gun firing—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. ALEXANDER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11518) to authorize the holding of a regular term of the district court of the United States for the western district of Virginia in the city of Bigstone Gap, Va., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1970); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. GILLETT of California, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7289) to extend to citizens of the United States who were owners, charterers, masters, officers, and crews of certain vessels registered under the laws of the United States, and to citizens of the United States whose claims were rejected because of the American citizenship of the claimants, or of one or more of the owners, by the international commission appointed pursuant to the convention of February 8, 1896, between the United States and Great Britain, the relief heretofore granted to and received by British subjects in respect of damages for unlawful seizures of vessels or cargoes, or both, or for damnifying interference with the vessels or the voyages of vessels engaged in sealing beyond the 3-mile limit and beyond the jurisdiction of the United States, in accordance with the judgment of the fur-seal arbitration at Paris, in its award of August 15, 1893, and so that justice shall not be denied to American citizens which has been so freely meted out to British subjects, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1971); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. BROWN of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 1974) amending the act of Congress approved January 26, 1895, entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to correct errors where double allotments of land have erroneously been made to an Indian, to correct errors in patents, and for other purposes," reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1972); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 3725) to establish a light-house and fog-signal station at the entrance to Bellingham Bay, State of Washington, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1973); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. TOWNSEND, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11132) to establish a light and fog signal at or near Black Ledge, New London Harbor, Connecticut, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1974); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 39) for a light-house and fog signal on Rock of Ages, Lake Superior, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1975); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 14500) to ratify and confirm the present right of way of the Oahu Railway and Land Company through the military reservation of Kahauiki, Territory of Hawaii, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2031); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 12386) to authorize W. Denny & Co. to bridge Dog River, in the State of Mississippi, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2032); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 9055) providing for rank and pay for certain retired officers of the Navy, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2038); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Brockway, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1988); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DEEMER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7366) granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Cannon, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1989); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SULLOWAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 4777) granting an increase of pension to Thomas McCormick, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1990); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6307) granting a pension to Elizabeth Hopper, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1991); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GIBSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8464) granting a pension to Susan T. Bunch, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1992); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 3385) granting an increase of pension to John A. Blair, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1993); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SULLOWAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 908) granting an increase of pension to Charles A. Tarbox, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1994); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 2569) granting an increase of pension to John W. Allen, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1995); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

SETTLERS ON WISCONSIN CENTRAL RAILROAD LANDS, ETC.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 987) for the relief of certain settlers upon the Wisconsin Central Railroad and The Dalles military road land grants, to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] to the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all qualified homesteaders who, under an order issued by the Land Department, bearing date October 22, 1891, and taking effect November 2, 1891, made settlement upon and improved any portion of an odd-numbered sect on within the conflicting limits of the grants made in aid of the construction of the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis and Omaha Railway and the Wisconsin Central Railroad, and were thereafter prevented from completing title to the land so settled upon and improved by reason of the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Wisconsin Central Railroad Company against Forsythe (159 U. S., p. 46); and all qualified homesteaders who made settlement upon and improved any portion of an odd-numbered section within the conflicting limits of the grants made in aid of the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad and The Dalles military wagon road, under orders issued by the Land Department treating such lands as forfeited railroad lands, and were thereafter prevented from completing title to the land so settled upon and improved by reason of the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Wilcox against Eastern Oregon Land Company (176 U. S., p. 51), shall, in making final proof upon homestead entries made for other lands, be given credit for the period of their bona fide residence upon and the amount of their improvements made on the lands for which they were unable to complete title: Provided, That no such person shall be entitled to the benefits of this act who shall fail to make entry within two years after the passage of this act: And provided further, That this act shall not be considered as entitling any person to make another homestead entry who shall have received the benefits of the homestead law since being prevented, as aforesaid, from completing title to the lands as aforesaid settled upon and improved by him.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EAST WASHINGTON HEIGHTS TRACTION RAILROAD.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9331) to extend the time for completion of the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company, to report it favorably with amendments, and I submit a report thereon. As this is a brief bill and there are special reasons for its consideration, I ask that it be now considered.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. ELKINS. I should like the Senator to state what road that is. Is it the Capital Traction?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a little railroad chartered to run across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River. They have constructed the line across the bridge, and they want to get a short distance up the hill. It is simply an extension of their charter.

Mr. ELKINS. Who owns the road?

Mr. GALLINGER. I confess I do not know who owns it. The rails are on the ground, I will say to the Senator. There has never been any opposition to the road, and it is a convenience to that section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was, in line 6, before the word "months," to strike out "twelve" and insert "eighteen;" so as to read:

That the time within which the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Company is required to complete and put in operation its railway be, and the same hereby is, extended for the term of eighteen months from the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the proviso in the following words:

Provided, That if said railroad is not completed and in operation within the time herein limited said company shall be subject to a penalty of $50 for each and every day that said road is not constructed and in operation, with cars running thereon; said penalty to be recovered by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in any court of competent jurisdiction.

And to insert a new proviso, as follows:

Provided, That failure to complete any portion of the routes as provided in the charter of said company within the time herein limited shall operate to repeal the authority to build such portion, and shall not repeal the charter of said company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

WESTERN ALASKA CONSTRUCTION COMPANY.

Mr. NELSON. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 13740) for the relief of the Western Alaska Construction Company's Railroad, to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report thereon. I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORT ON PAN-AMERICAN RAILWAY.

Mr. ELKINS. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by myself on the 25th instant relative to printing the report of the commissioners on the Pan-American Railway, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed, with the accompanying map, 7,000 additional copies of the report of the commissioners appointed under the sundry civil appropriation act of March 3, 1903, to carry out the recommendations of the Second International Conference of American States with regard to the Pan-American Railroad, 2,000 for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the House of Representatives, 2,000 for the Bureau of American Republics for distribution at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, and 1,000 for the permanent Pan-American Railway committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Ought not this to be a concurrent resolution?

Mr. ELKINS. No, sir; the cost is less than $500. That is the understanding. The committee had an estimate made.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McENERY introduced a bill (S. 5308) for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Fassman, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5309) for the relief of the estate of Henry Ware, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CARMACK introduced a bill (S. 5310) to create a recording district in the Indian Territory, with its office at Lindsay, Ind. T., and to establish a United States district court at Lindsay, Ind. T.; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CARMACK. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think the bill should be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. It has all such bills.

Mr. CARMACK. I do not know why it should go to the Committee on Indian Affairs. It has nothing to do with Indians.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It has nothing to do with Territories, either.

Mr. CARMACK. It has something to do with creating a court in the Indian Territory.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Questions with regard to recording districts in the Indian Territory have been dealt with, I think, by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CARMACK. Has that been the practice?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think that has been the universal practice.

Mr. CARMACK. I think a number of bills of this kind have been referred to the Committee on Territories. I am under that impression.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not care anything about it if the Senator desires it to go to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. CARMACK. I should rather it would go to the Committee on Territories, although I do not make any particular point on the reference.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There are a dozen of those applications, more or less.

Mr. CARMACK. Yes; I believe so.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not make any point on it if the Senator desires the bill to go to the Committee on Territories.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 5311) granting an increase of pension to William Pore; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

An amendment proposing to appropriate $15,000 for a keeper's double dwelling at Point Bonita, California; and

An amendment proposing to appropriate $15,000 for establishing at Point Conception, California, a double set of quarters for the accommodation of four light-house keepers with their families.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $250,000 for establishing light-houses and fog signals on Brown Shoal, Delaware; on Miah Maull Shoal, New Jersey; on Elbow of Cross Ledge, New Jersey; on Joe Flogger Shoal, Delaware; on Arnold Point Shoal, New Jersey; on Goose Island Flats, New Jersey; on Horseshoe Shoal, Pennsylvania, and for establishing range lights on Old Man's Point, New Jersey, and Seventeen-Foot Knoll and Marcus Hook, Delaware, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $150,000 for the construction, equipping, and outfitting, complete for service, of a new steam tender, for service in the fourth light-house district, for buoyage, supply, and inspection service, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment changing the amount of compensation to be received by persons employed in the Land Office for furnishing transcripts of records and plats from $2 per day while actually employed to $60 per month, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BARD submitted the following amendments, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

An amendment proposing to appropriate $208,750 for the purchase and making free of any or all of the four toll roads which lead into and pass over the Yosemite National Park; and

An amendment proposing to appropriate $80,000 for the construction of a wagon road within the boundary of the Yosemite National Park.

Mr. CULLOM submitted an amendment proposing that the thirty days' annual leave to the employees of the Government Printing Office shall be exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MERMENTAU RIVER (LA.) IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. FOSTER of Louisiana submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to cause a survey to be made of the Mermentau River, from its headwaters at the junction of Bayous des Cannes and Nez Pique (including those portions of Lake Arthur, Grand Lake, and White Lake lying directly across its course), to a point in the Gulf of Mexico beyond the bar at its mouth, with a view of ascertaining the cost of securing a permanent channel to a depth of at least 20 feet.

HEARINGS BEFORE IRRIGATION COMMITTEE.

Mr. BARD submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such testimony as may be taken by the committee, and to have the same printed for its use, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13521) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads with amendments.

Mr. PENROSE. I make the usual request in regard to action on the amendments of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the amendments of the committee shall first receive consideration. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. PENROSE. I yield.

EMMA MORRIS.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 4234) for the relief of Emma Morris.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to Emma Morris, widow of Frank H. Morris, late Auditor of the Treasury for the War Department, who lost his life on the 22d day of December, 1900, while in the discharge of his official duties in the Winder Building, $2,097.83, the balance of the salary which would have been due said Frank H. Morris June 30, 1901.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask one question in regard to the precedents in this matter. Is it a rule when any executive officer of the Government dies to make that kind of a provision?

Mr. WARREN. I do not understand that there is any rule of that kind. The circumstances connected with this case, as the Senator will remember, were very peculiar. The Secretary of the Treasury asked that such a measure might be passed, and it was the opinion of the Committee on Claims that the bill should be passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. In other words, it is purely an exceptional case?

Mr. WARREN. It is.

Mr. COCKRELL. And it is not to be considered as a precedent in cases of ordinary death.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no; this is very exceptional. Such a case never occurred before, and I hope no such will ever occur again.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BUILDING LINE ON THE MALL.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. PENROSE. I will yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 4845) regulating the erection of buildings on the Mall in the District of Columbia.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, in line 4, after the words "four hundred," to insert "and forty-five."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now let the bill be read as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read as amended.

The Secretary read the bill as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no building shall be erected on the Mall of Washington, D. C., within 445 feet of a central line stretching from the center of the Dome of the Capitol to the center of the Washington Monument.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, let me understand it. How wide is that space to be?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The vista will be 890 feet wide. That is the width which was prescribed by the park commission, and was in itself a reduction of the original width designed by L'Enfant, which was over 1,000 feet.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill comes from the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; that committee has reported it favorably.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not concur with the committee in the views they have expressed in the matter. I shall not make any objection, however. I should like to ask if this measure will cause the removal of any buildings?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; it will not cause the removal of any buildings. It simply makes provision as to buildings hereafter constructed. I will state, however, to the Senator from Missouri that the Smithsonian Institution and the present Agricultural Department building are within this line. The testimony of the experts who appeared before the District Committee was that at any time in the future, if it should be deemed desirable, the Smithsonian Institution could be moved back. This bill, however, does not contemplate that.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the Senator mean that the original building there could be moved back?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It could be; but, as I said, there is nothing in the bill affecting it.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is, by tearing down and rebuilding?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; it could be moved back; and all the engineers' testimony was that it could be done without any injury to the structure. But this bill does not contemplate that at all. That question may arise a great many years hence, but it is not before the Senate now.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECLAMATION OF OVERFLOWED LANDS.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3788) to provide for an examination to determine the feasibility of reclaiming the overflowed lands of the Kootenai River in northern Idaho and Montana.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to appropriate $10,000, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior through the Director of the Geological Survey, for survey, reconnoissance, and engineering investigations to determine upon a plan of reclamation, for agricultural purposes, of the overflowed lands in the valley of the Kootenai River in northern Idaho and Montana. For this purpose the Director of the Geological Survey shall examine the entire drainage area of the Kootenai River and such adjacent country as may be necessary. The Secretary of the Interior shall withdraw from entry any public lands which may be reclaimable or which may be required for the necessary reclamation work. The result of the work herein provided for shall be reported to Congress at its next session.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROPOSED ALASKAN LEGISLATION.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. PENROSE. I will yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 3035) to amend an act entitled "An act making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1900.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Territories with an amendment, to insert the following after line 2, page 3:

The Secretary of the Interior shall, in the month of November, 1904, and from time to time thereafter, as in his judgment may be deemed advisable, advertise for and receive bids for the care and custody of persons legally adjudged insane in the district of Alaska, and thereafter, in behalf of the United States, shall contract, for one or more years, as he may deem best, with a responsible asylum or sanitarium west of the main range of the Rocky Mountains submitting the lowest and best responsible bid for the care and custody of persons legally adjudged insane in said district of Alaska, the cost of advertising for bids, executing the contract, and caring for the insane to be paid, until otherwise provided by law, by the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, on accounts and vouchers duly approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SPOONER. On page 2, line 3, of the bill occurs this language, concerning which I wish to interrogate the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]:

He—

That is, the governor—

may also grant reprieves for offenses committed against the laws of the district or of the United States until the decision of the President thereon shall be made known.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state to the Senator from Wisconsin that this is in the main a recital of existing law. The only change made in the law is this: Under existing law the governor of the Territory has the power, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to contract for the keeping of the insane in Alaska for a term not exceeding one year. This changes that provision so that the Secretary of the Interior may contract for more than one year, if he desires to do so. That is the only change. The other portion of the bill is a recital of existing law.

The bill has been reported by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], the chairman of the Committee on Territories, and he understands it, I believe, as I do.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I have no question whatever as to the part of the bill which deals with the care of the insane in Alaska. My question is, whether there is not an insane provision in the bill? It may be the existing statute.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is, I assure the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I know it may be the existing statute, but we are called upon here to reenact it. The Constitution lodges in the President of the United States the power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States and violations of the laws of the United States. My inquiry of the Senator is, whether Congress can confer that power upon anybody else?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is a question I have not considered at all; this is simply a recital of the law as it stands to-day on the statute book.

Mr. SPOONER. That does not make it any better.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] will allow me a moment, I can explain the merits of the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. NELSON. This bill came from the Committee on Territories, of which I am a member. The only change in existing law is found in the section which is amended, which is taken from the act of 1900 establishing a civil government for Alaska. That act, among other things, provides that the governor of the Territory, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, may make contracts for a sanitarium or asylum in which the insane of Alaska may be maintained. The only change in the law in that respect is a provision which permits such contracts to be made for a longer period than one year. All the other sections are in the existing law.

Mr. SPOONER. If my friend from Minnesota will permit me, I have no objection whatever to that provision or to the amendment to which he alludes. But the Senator from Minnesota is a very able lawyer and a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, and, although that may be an enactment of the law as it now exists, I ask him whether he regards as constitutional the provision of the bill to which I have referred?

Mr. NELSON. What provision of the bill?

Mr. SPOONER. The provision which reads:

He—

may also grant reprieves for offenses committed against the laws of the district or of the United States until the decision of the President thereon shall be made known.

What challenged my attention was this: The Constitution confers upon the President the power to grant reprieves and pardons. That means, of course, for offenses committed against the laws of the United States. How can that power be lodged in any degree by act of Congress in the governor of a Territory?

Mr. NELSON. I will say to the Senator that that may possibly be a debatable question, but that provision has been in the statutes since 1900.

Mr. SPOONER. I know it.

Mr. NELSON. And while the term "reprieve" is used, I think it simply amounts to this, that the governor may grant a stay of proceedings until the President can be heard from.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is all it amounts to.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; that is all it amounts to. The Senator must bear in mind the great distance of Alaska from this capital, and the fact that during most of the year communication is tied up and closed with that country so that it can not be reached. A man may be convicted in the interior of Alaska of a serious offense and have no means of reaching the President of the United States immediately. The bill is simply intended to allow the governor to grant a temporary stay of proceedings until the President can act. It does not interfere with the power of the President beyond that.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will allow me to suggest to him that I believe the exercise of that power by the courts has never been held to be in conflict with the constitutional power of the President.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course Congress may provide for a supersedeas, and Congress may require a sufficient time to elapse in capital cases before execution of sentence.

Mr. BACON. None of us on this side can hear what the Senators on the other side are saying. It is not the fault of the Senators who are speaking, I presume; but still I wish to call attention to the fact that we can not hear.

Mr. SPOONER. Congress might provide——

Mr. HOAR. A little more than that. The reprieving power is simply a stay of proceedings founded on additional reasons, or reasons wholly connected with the desirability of delaying the carrying out of a particular sentence, and that power is lodged in the courts everywhere. I suppose it is not anywhere regarded as in conflict with the constitutional function conferred on the President. So the exercise of the power, as it is intended to be limited by the Senator from Minnesota, is no violation of the constitutional function of the Executive.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Wisconsin, of course, does not suppose that I am undertaking to inform him of anything that I thought he did not know. I was only reminding him of what he knew very well—better, in fact, than I did.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think anybody knows anything about the Constitution better than the Senator does. But I agree entirely—if I may be permitted to speak in this hubbub—with the Senator from Massachusetts that the extension of time by the court, a stay of proceedings, has never been held, never could be held, and it never was suggested that it could be held, a violation of that provision of the Constitution.

I think, moreover, it would be entirely competent for Congress to provide that a sufficient time should elapse after the sentence of a man to death in Alaska before that sentence is carried into execution for communication with the President, so that an opportunity might be afforded him to either pardon or reprieve. That is one thing.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. I am about through, and I hope the Senator will not interpose just yet.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin, but I shall object to the further consideration of the bill when he has concluded, if it leads to any more debate.

Mr. SPOONER. I shall be through in a moment.

The word "reprieve" used here is a technical word, a word with a technical signification, and a word the meaning of which is well understood. "Reprieve" means "stay;" it does not mean "pardon." Where the Constitution lodges in the President the power to grant reprieves and pardons for violating the law of the United States, it is perfectly plain to me that it is not within the constitutional capacity of Congress to lodge that power in the governor of a Territory. The locus penitentiæ, if I may use that phrase, may be provided for otherwise. It may be provided for in the manner I have suggested.

It ought to be given on account of the distance between Washington and Alaska; it ought to be provided for by the lapse of time before the sentence can be carried out, which will enable the President to act; but distance has nothing to do with this question of constitutional power. If we have the right to confer this power to grant reprieves for a violation of the laws of the United States, which includes the whole gamut of crime, upon the governor of Alaska, we have the right to confer it upon the governor of Arizona; but I do not believe it is within the power of Congress to do that thing.

If the Senator will allow this bill to go over, I will draw an amendment which I think will safeguard it by restriction as to the carrying into effect of a sentence, the danger of which the Senator from Minnesota suggests, and which has great force. It is with me only a question of how it shall be done. That is all. As to the remainder of the bill, I have no objection to it.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow me just one word, then the bill can go over. As has been before stated, the law which has been in existence in Alaska for the last four years is reenacted by this bill. That is all.

Mr. SPOONER. I propose to offer an amendment to it.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator desires to submit an amendment I will allow the bill to go over to a later date; but, as I have stated, this bill is merely a reenactment of existing law.

Mr. SPOONER. That is no reason why it should not be amended.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is true; but I am simply stating the fact that this bill does not interfere with the law as it stands, except in one particular.

I ask that the bill may go over without losing its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will go back to its place on the Calendar.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. PENROSE. I do.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington. Will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me in order that I may secure the consideration and passage of a bill in relation to a light station in my State? I am sure it will not lead to debate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield for that purpose.

ROBINSON POINT LIGHT STATION, WASHINGTON.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3983) providing for additional employees' quarters at the Robinson Point post light station, State of Washington.

The bill was read; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to appropriate $5,000 for additional employees' quarters at the Robinson Point post light, in the State of Washington.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL GRAIN INSPECTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 199) to provide for fixing a uniform standard of classification and grading of wheat, flax, corn, oats, barley, rye, and other grains, and for other purposes, on which the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] gave notice that he desired to address the Senate this morning. The Senator from North Dakota is entitled to the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in the latter part of the Fifty-seventh Congress I introduced a bill for Government grading and inspection of grain in the leading grain terminal markets of the United States. This bill provides in substance as follows:

First. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall organize in his Department a bureau of grain inspection, and shall appoint a chief, whose duty it shall be to report upon the condition of interstate trade and commerce in grains, their grading, weighing, and inspection; to inquire into and suggest means for the prevention of defects in the present system of weighing, grading, and inspection, and to collect such information on the subject as shall be valuable to the agricultural interests of the country. Also that he shall employ a sufficient force to be known as "grain inspectors," one to be stationed at each of the leading centers of interstate grain trade in the United States, and that the inspectors are authorized to appoint deputy inspectors having the same qualifications as inspectors, to be paid from fees collected for the inspection of grain at the place where the duties of such inspector are to be performed.

Second. That it shall be the duty of said inspectors and deputies to inspect and grade all grain which has been shipped from any other State or Territory, or is intended for shipment into any other State or Territory or foreign country, before the same is unloaded from the car, vessel, or other vehicle in which the same is being transported, and to collect therefor such fees for inspection as may be deemed reasonable and be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture; provided, that the inspection of any consignment of grain may be waived when the grain is consigned to the owner thereof or his authorized agents or to a mill or private storehouse; or, for deposit in a special bin, to a public warehouse; or, if consigned to a market where the usages of trade recognize sales of grain by sample, when the consignor shall direct its sale by sample.

Third. That no inspector or deputy inspector of grain shall, during the term of his service, be interested directly or indirectly in handling, storing, shipping, or purchasing or selling of grain, nor shall he be in the employment of any person or corporation interested therein.

Fourth. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, as soon as may be after the enactment of such bill, to determine and fix, according to such standards as he may prescribe, such classification and grading of wheat, flax, corn, rye, oats, barley and other grains as in his judgment the usages of trade warrant and permit, having reference to the standard classification and grades now recognized by the several chambers of commerce and boards of trade in the United States; provided, however, that the reference to such various classifications shall serve only as a guide and suggestion in the matter of determining and fixing the United States standard provided for in the bill; and that he shall fix and determine such standard and such classification and grades as will, in his judgment, best subserve the interest of the public in the conduct of interstate trade and commerce in grain.

Fifth. That when such standard is fixed and the classification of grades determined upon, record shall be made thereof and public notice given, and thereafter such classification and grades shall be known as the "United States standard."

Sixth. That it shall be the duty of any railroad company, steamship company, or other firm or corporation or private individual engaged in the interstate transportation of grain to notify the United States grain inspector at the place of destination of any consignment of grain within twenty-four hours that a shipment or cargo is in its or their hands at the place of destination of said grain, and requesting inspection and grading of the same, which shall be done before the same is unloaded.

These, Mr. President, are the principal features of the bill. It contains many other provisions, but all relate to and are connected with these main provisions which I have mentioned.

It was not my intention to press this bill during the Fifty-seventh Congress, but to get the subject-matter of national inspection and grading of grain fairly before the public, that it might be discussed by both farmer and wheat dealer and receive such commendation or criticism as its provisions would warrant. I hoped thereby to secure such additional information as would enable me to perfect it in case I should find that it was deficient in any respect. Knowing the necessity and great demand for a reform in the present system of grain grading and inspection, I wished to secure the passage of a bill which would meet that demand, and which would produce only just and beneficial results.

Mr. President, my expectation that the bill would receive attention by the public has been fully realized, and I have been gratified with the amount of discussion which it has evoked both by organizations of wheat buyers and organizations of wheat growers. Without a single exception, so far as I know, the representatives of the grain trade, who have grown fat under the present system, have declared emphatically against the propriety of this proposed law, and, so far as I know, every organization of wheat growers and every farmers' organization which has passed on the subject, and whose members have grown lean under the same system, has declared emphatically in its favor.

The following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted by the representatives of the grain-trade organizations of the United States in convention assembled, at the New York Produce Exchange, New York City, January 6, 1904, and followed by other like organizations in other parts of the country, will show the attitude of the buyers.

This resolution provides:

Whereas a bill having been introduced into the United States Senate "to provide for the fixing of a uniform standard of classification and grading of wheat, flax, corn, oats, barley, rye, and other grains, and for other purposes:"

Whereas the passage of any measure disturbing the present system of boards of trade inspection, under which the present grain trade of the country has been built up, would be injurious to the best interests of the producer, dealer, and foreign buyer:

Resolved, That the delegates representing the larger portion of the grain markets of the United States, convened at the New York Produce Exchange, January 6, 1904, hereby declare their belief that the inspection of grain by the National Government at terminal markets would be detrimental to the agricultural interests and the grain trade of the country; that we are absolutely and unalterably opposed to any attempt to exercise Government inspection of grain, and having from past experience found the supervision of inspection under political bodies to be entirely unsatisfactory we are opposed to any attempt to exercise such supervision. We also declare in favor of having the inspection in all terminal markets under the supervision and control of the commercial organizations of such markets.

I especially call attention to the second paragraph, which recites that the passage of any measure disturbing the present system of boards of trade inspection under which the present grain trade of the country has been built up would be injurious to the best interests of the producer, dealer, and foreign buyer, and, in the resolution part, "that the inspection of grain by the National Government at terminal markets would be detrimental to the agricultural interests." I also call attention to the further fact that not a single reason is given or attempted to be given why national grading of our grain and a national inspection would be detrimental to the interest of anyone, and I assert, Mr. President, that none can be given.

These were the resolutions of men engaged in buying grain under the present system, which they do not wish to modify. Now, let us hear from the other side.

In one of the great wheat-growing counties of my State the wheat growers and farmers who sell their wheat met in convention. They are intelligent farmers; they know just as much about the wheat business as does this association which met in New York, or any other like association, and they unanimously passed these resolutions:

We, the farmers of the county of Barnes, State of North Dakota, meeting and assembled in Farmers' State Institute, held in Valley City, N. Dak., the 25th and 26th days of January, 1904, deeply feeling the wrong and injustice of the present system of grain grading and inspection, manifestly conducted for the benefit of the millers and grain buyers of Minnesota and at the expense and serious loss to the farmers and grain growers of this State, and believing in the unjust and unbusinesslike arrangement whereby and through which the grain buyer and miller fixes the grade and quality of the grain produced by us, and in the absence of any law or means by which said grain can now be graded and inspected by the producers, and that depriving the buyer and miller of such rights and privileges and clothing the Federal Government with the sole power to weigh, grade, and inspect the grain will be a great and lasting benefit to all agricultural interests of this and other States.

Now, therefore, we do hereby resolve that the bill introduced * * * in the United States Senate, now pending, known as the "McCumber grain-inspection bill," which provides generally for the Federal inspection of grain at terminal points, meets our most hearty approval, and we recommend that the utmost efforts be taken by our Representatives in Congress and all honorable means employed to effect its passage.

Mr. President, that is the sentiment of practically every farmer in the State. That is the unanimous conviction of every producer in western Minnesota, South Dakota, and North Dakota.

On the 21st day of January, 1904, there was a meeting in the city of Fargo, State of North Dakota, of representative wheat growers of the States of Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota. They have an association which meets annually, and which I think is known as the "Tri-State Grain-Growers' Association." At this meeting there were several hundred—I am informed by the press 1,500—representative wheat growers from these three States. Among the matters considered by that convention was the question of Federal inspection of grain, and incidentally this bill was referred to a committee for report. With their usual modesty and diffidence they selected for this committee men permeated more or less with the ideas of the great elevator syndicates. Well, the result was they brought in a report to this convention of farmers and wheat growers following out the lines laid down by the association in New York which I have mentioned.

The discussion which immediately followed would be interesting reading in this body. I regret the time will not allow me to reproduce it. It is sufficient to say that such a storm of dissent arose that not even this committee had the courage to attempt to sustain their report. A motion that this adverse report be tabled forever was carried with an enthusiasm and unanimity that showed keenly and strongly that the North and South Dakota farmers and that the Minnesota farmer took decidedly a different view from the New York convention of wheat dealers on the desirability of a change in the present system.

The rather strange feature of the resolutions of the grain-trade organization is that their objection has for its foundation their great solicitude for the interest of the wheat producers. The wheat producers say that this bill enacted into a law will protect them from the frauds practiced upon them under the present system of inspection in vogue not only in the State of Minnesota but in other great wheat centers, and imposed upon them by these wheat buyers.

The wheat buyers, on the other hand say that the bill would be a calamity, because it would be injurious to the interest of the wheat producers. The position of the latter is that the producers or farmers of our country do not know what is for their own interest, and that these wheat dealers' associations, who have but the one thought in mind, namely, the happiness and prosperity of the producer, should have the power placed wholly in their hands to determine what system of grain grading is for the real interest of the latter.

Every man in the State of North Dakota who raises wheat for sale is deeply concerned in the grade and price which he will receive for his product. What he wants is, first, the very best grade that his grain will bear and, second, the best price that grade will bring. He wants not only the right grade, but the right price, and he is entitled to both; and any system which denies him those just rights is a legalized crime which demands speedy abatement.

Every great elevator company which buys this wheat and sells it again, and every speculator who buys and sells it, is interested, first, in buying as cheaply as he can and selling at as great an advance as he can, and second, in buying in at as low a grade as he can and selling out at as high a grade as he can secure.

Now, with every reason of self-interest actuating these associations, they have the audacity to say to our farmers that a system of grain grading and inspection which allows them not only the power to a certain extent to fix the prices, but also to determine the grades and to manipulate grades in such a manner as to beat the producer out of the honest grade to which his grain is entitled, is the best system for the producer and that a law which would deprive these elevator companies or these dealers of that power would not be for his interest. Before I am through with these remarks I propose to probe into the deep and unselfish concern of the grain-trade organizations and other like associations for the welfare of our grain producers.

Nearly every bushel of wheat raised in North Dakota and sold is transferred either to Minneapolis or to Duluth, Minn., or Superior, Wis. Not only that grain destined for Minneapolis and Duluth, but also that shipped to Superior, Wis., is inspected and graded by persons appointed under the Minnesota grading and inspection laws. The legislature of Wisconsin has tried to get around this. The legislature of Minnesota has attempted to act in conjunction with the legislature of Wisconsin to avoid the difficulties which have arisen by these methods.

The farmers of our State have no voice whatever in determining, directly or indirectly, the personnel of the force which passes upon the grade and quality of every bushel of wheat which they sell. They have no means of securing any redress in case of combination or corruption in any manner which affects their grades, and therefore affects the amount which they will receive for their products, being without power to shield themselves. Let us see how the terminal elevators, so deeply concerned in their welfare that they would protect them against the pernicious effect of Federal inspection, do in fact safeguard their interests.

On December 12, 1903, there was published in the Evening Telegram, of Superior, Wis., a very interesting article under the title, in large headlines, "Did the grain ring make $300,000 on grade manipulation?" The writer of this article, among other things, says:

In order to give an example of what is being done I have compiled from the official records on file in my office, the office of the secretary of the Superior Board of Trade, the following statement of receipts, shipments, and grades at the Great Northern Elevator A in Superior for three months from September 3, to December 3, 1903, the first quarter of the new crop year. At the beginning of this period the elevator was practically empty, the unusually high premium on old wheat having the effect of emptying the elevators at that time. I do not understand that there is any scouring or drying machinery in Elevator A, so it is fair to assume that the grain was in the same average condition when shipped out that it was in when received. The very noticeable raising of grades could not, therefore, have been a result of cleaning, and the net increase of 192,000 bushels in quantity is not accounted for in the records. I use an approximate uniform price per bushel for each grade, both in receiving and shipping, so that the exact discrepancies may appear without introducing the confusion of the varying prices from time to time. These profits are in addition to the legitimate elevator charges, which would amount to $33,919.60.

The following is the prepared table, which I ask to be inserted in my remarks:

Now, let us observe for a moment the metamorphosis in grades, quality, and quantity of this grain from the time it entered into the elevator until it was shipped out.

First, it will be observed that no No. 1 hard wheat was taken in this elevator during this time. No. 1 hard is the highest grade of grain raised in t' e Northwest and brings the highest price. In fact, it is the best grain raised in the world. There were, however, shipped out 22,312 bushels. Where did it come from? There were taken in, No. 1 northern, 2,511,937 bushels; there were shipped out, No. 1 northern, 3,080,330 bushels, and there still remained in the elevator on hand 30,000 of No. 1 northern. Where did this extra amount of No. 1 northern come from? It is evident, therefore, that of wheat taken in graded lower than No. 1 northern, 598,402 bushels became No. 1 northern while lying in the elevator. How was this made up? Let us see: There were taken in 2,088,754 bushels of No. 2 northern, there were shipped out but 585,639 bushels of No. 2 northern, and there remained in the elevator 60,000 bushels of No. 2 northern, or a total of 645,639 bushels. That leaves 1,442,815 bushels of No. 2 northern to be accounted for, and this is accounted for to a great extent by the increase of No. 1 northern.

There were 307,753 bushels of No. 3 northern taken in; that is what they paid the farmers for. Now, what has become of it? Looking over the amount shipped out, we find No. 3—none. All of this 307,752 bushels changed into a higher grade after it got into the elevator. There were 299,284 bushels of rejected taken in, nearly 300,000. There were shipped out only 93,000 bushels of rejected. What became of that low grade? There were taken in of wheat without grade 1,675,266 bushels. There were none shipped out, and but 94,000 of rejected and no grade on hand. Now, it must be remembered in addition, as I understand it, that this grain was inspected into and inspected out of the same elevator by the same system and the same inspectors. Now, the value of this grain as shipped in, even after the dockage had been taken out, was $5,209,830.24. The value of this grain as shipped out, at the same price for each grade, was $5,540,207.50, leaving a clear profit by manipulation of grades and weights of $330,377.27. Under this statement this was the amount by manipulation of grades only. In addition to this, as stated before, the elevator charges amounted to $33,000. It is important to note, in addition to this, that after docking the farmer 172,074 bushels, the amount shipped out, together with the amount on hand, was nearly 30,000 bushels more than the gross amount received in the elevator before its dockage. So that, while the farmer was docked 172,000 bushels, the elevator sold about 30,000 more than the gross amount received without the dockage. This is the system which so many grain men think par excellence.

Now, after this grain trade organization in New York, which was so much interested in the wheat grower of North Dakota, had resolved that Government inspection would be detrimental to the interest of the farmer, it would have been a fitting close to the resolutions to have inserted the report which I have just read, and then resolved that this system which makes it possible to make more than $300,000 out of every 6,000,000 bushels of the farmers' wheat is for the real interest of the farmer and producer. I wish to quote here from an article written by H. C. Stivers in the Superior Evening Telegram of May 2, 1903. In this he says:

> I wish here to state the astounding fact that the official reports of the Minnesota grain-inspection department, together with the reports of the Duluth Board of Trade, show that during the past ten years the amount of wheat shipped out of the grain elevators at the head of Lake Superior was 26,868,000 bushels more than the total amount received during the same period by the same elevators. The amount of wheat in store at the beginning of this period was about the same as the amount in store at the end of the period. That is, the wheat received in Superior and Duluth during the past ten years weighed 26,868,000 bushels more when it was weighed out of the elevators than it did when it was weighed in, all of which surplus of wheat, worth, at 75 cents per bushel, more than $20,000,000, was net profit, clear, unearned gain, for the elevator companies. As the elevator people have to give full weight when they sell grain, the presumption is that the grain growers of the Northwest were robbed in the weight of their grain in a manner that would make Dick Turpin green with envy. Twenty million dollars is enough to lay a dollar on every foot of the distance of 3,787 miles. It is not difficult to see the reason why the elevator people insist that the day for changes has gone by and that the permanent and unchangeable manner of weighing, inspecting, and handling grain has been fixed for all time to come.

Now, of course I do not pretend to speak with personal knowledge of these published facts. We do know that a public record is kept of the kinds and grades of grain which are received into a public elevator and the quantity and kinds and grades that are shipped out, so it is easy enough for anyone having facilities to do so to get the requisite information on this subject. The editorial and the statements mention in detail a particular elevator, and I have no doubt of the substantial truth of the statements. All the information which I obtain must necessarily be obtained second hand, as I can not personally examine these records. I call attention to another fact which has come to me from Superior, and which I believe was published in one of the papers there, although I am not certain of this. This statement, which is given to me as absolutely correct, is as follows:

> In 1898 a Duluth firm, with offices in Minneapolis, sold to Joseph Leiter, or his representative at Duluth, 200,000 bushels of No. 1 northern wheat. When the time for delivery drew near the selling firm was unable to obtain the necessary wheat of that grade at Duluth. It shipped from Minneapolis this amount—that is, 200,000 bushels—of wheat out of the Peavey elevators at Minneapolis, where it was inspected by the Minnesota grain-inspection department as No. 1 northern. The cars arrived here, but the deputy inspectors refused to put a grade of No. 1 northern on the wheat, on account of the poor quality. The receiving firm called for reinspection, but the chief inspector at Duluth also refused to mark the grade No. 1 northern, as also did the board of appeals, which is supposed to be the highest court as far as inspection at the head of the lake is concerned. The difference in price at the time between No. 1 northern and No. 2 northern was in the neighborhood of 60 cents a bushel, making the difference in price of 200,000 bushels of No. 1 northern and No. 2 northern $120,000. Through the influence of the grain ring, of which the selling firm was a leading member, they succeeded in having the Minnesota inspection department send a special inspector from Minneapolis with instructions to grade this lot of wheat of 200,000 bushels No. 1 northern. This was done and the grain ring made a profit of the above difference in price.

If this statement be true, or anything near it be true, then certainly there is great ground for a change in the method of inspection and grading.

In a letter from a member of the Superior Board of Trade I have the following statement, which I have been authorized to use:

> We had another interesting deal here recently. A dealer of Duluth sold 500,000 bushels of wheat for December delivery. It was reported that he would have difficulty in filling the contract. It proved to be very easy. He had about 350,000 bushels of off-grade No. 2, No. 3, and rejected, and no grade in Elevator A. By a system of "Presto, change!" in vogue, at the request of the Minnesota grain ring he transferred the grade into No. 1 in the twinkling of an eye, and delivered warehouse receipts for No. 1 northern. Of course this scandalous business has ruined the reputation of Dakota wheat. A year or two ago it was selling at from 2 to 3 cents over Manitoba wheat. It is now worth 1 cent under Manitoba, although Manitoba wheat is somewhat damaged by frost. Reference to any market report will convince you that Manitoba wheat is now worth the most. Of course there are instances, in the case of an attempt to corner, when Manitoba wheat is of no avail and our wheat gets a premium.

The writer of this letter says the car numbers and the names of all parties in connection with this transaction are obtainable. The farmer has a right to complain when 60 cents per bushel is made upon his grain by false reports for speculative purposes. He knows that ultimately this profit means his loss.

And yet a system of grain grading permitting such frauds, or under which such frauds are possible, the boards of trade and grain buyers' associations earnestly declare to be to the interest of the producer. The Dakota wheat producer is not alone relying upon these extrinsic facts and circumstances. Unlike most farmers of the Middle and Eastern States, the Red River Valley wheat grower does not sell the bulk of his grain to the local elevator. He ships directly to the great wheat markets at the time of thrashing.

He is, therefore, brought into direct contact with the wheat grader and inspector, that important personage whose act of grading or inspection, carelessly or deliberately done, is to measure the value of his entire season's labors. He knows that the office of chief inspector is a political office, and that the appointee receives his position through the powerful influence of these wheat buyers, the elevator men; he knows that the chief inspector appoints his deputies. One deputy may have a hundred cars to inspect in a single day. He opens the car, takes out a handful of grain, determines what grade and what dockage should be made, and passes on to the next. If his grading or the amount allowed for dockage is not too rank it is generally accepted, rather than to go through all that is necessary in time and trouble in securing a reinspection. The chief inspector generally sustains his deputies on appeal. If he overruled them too often it would be publishing to the world the fact that he had appointed incompetent persons. After several ineffectual attempts to secure justice the owner of the wheat generally gives up trying to correct errors, although he knows that they are committed either through carelessness or incompetency or intent.

In my own personal experience I have known a special bin in an elevator to be filled with wheat from a single field, wheat that I knew was absolutely uniform in character, quality, weight, and cleanliness. This grain was thoroughly mixed in that bin and loaded into two cars, and yet, when it was inspected, one car was graded No. 1 northern, with very little dockage, and the other car, of identically the same kind, was graded No. 2 northern, with about three times the amount of dockage. Every bushel of this grain was No. 1 northern in quality. It had never had a drop of rain on it from the time it was harvested until it was graded, and therefore there could not have possibly been this difference. I ascribe this failure rather to incompetency than intent, and this is the experience of every shipper of wheat in the State of North Dakota.

Here is another thing that our Dakota farmers have learned: In the early part of the season for wheat shipments extreme caution is adopted by all the inspectors lest they should possibly grade too high before they become thoroughly acquainted with the real condition of the crop, lest by some possibility a greater grade would be allowed the producer than might be secured by the elevator man. In other words, every doubt is resolved against the wheat producer. The result of this is that after most of the wheat has been marked at a low grade it is found that this grain will stand a higher grade, and the elevators which have been filled with Nos. 2 and 3 wheat find that they have on hand Nos. 1 and 2 grades. Just to the extent that they gain by this the producer loses.

We have in our State an agricultural college. It is a good college—one of the very best in the United States. All the skill, science, and education of the professors of this college have been directed toward securing higher standards of farm products. Notwithstanding that fact; notwithstanding all of the assistance that is given by the Agricultural Department of the Government in securing the best possible grain; notwithstanding the fact that we absolutely do raise in the Dakotas and Minnesota a better quality of wheat than in any other place on earth; still our grain when sold abroad is regarded as inferior, and as it lands there it is inferior and brings a less price than the product of the Russian peasant, where no skill, no science, has been called in for the purpose of enhancing the quality of his product. Why is this? Why does not our good No. 1 hard and No. 1 northern, regarded by our own millers in this country to be grain which will make the best flour, bring such an inferior price in the markets of the world,-when the flour which is made from that grain brings the highest possible price in the United States and higher than any other?

The reason is this: The shipper of wheat will take, say, a million bushels of No. 1 northern and will add to this and mix with it three or four million bushels of No. 2 or No. 3 northern, have it all graded No. 1 northern and send it to the markets of Europe. When it reaches Liverpool the British miller examines the certificate of grading made at Minneapolis or Duluth and finds that it is officially designated as No. 1 northern, but an analysis of this wheat shows that it is of a poor grade; and not always observing the distinction in this country between a State government and the State official's certificate and the certificate of one of the Departments of the United States, he concludes that all No. 1 northern American wheat is a cheap and poor quality, and on account of this manipulation our good North Dakota grain must suffer.

I want to call attention to a few sentences from a statement made by a Prof. H. L. Bolley, of the State agricultural college, discussing the very bill under consideration. He says:

> As a teacher of agricultural botany I am not often interested in legislative features, bills in Congress, etc., but in regard to this matter of grain inspection, every year since I have been in the Northwest it has been becoming clearer and clearer to me that the manner in which the cereal products of the farm are graded and handled on the market is on a most simple and childish basis for a Government which professes to have such an educated farming public and such an efficient Department of Agriculture to oversee matters. Our agricultural colleges and experiment stations are spending an immense amount of energy in instructing the farmer just how to raise the cleanest and most perfect type of each of the cereal grains, and they are meeting with success. The great majority of our farmers are actually doing this type of work, viz: Producing a type and quality of these grains far more perfect than that to be found in any other country in the world. * * * The facts are that no region of the world produces a quality of flaxseed equal to the output of these three Northwestern States, but upon the foreign markets we find the American seed product always spoken of as "extremely inferior." Regardless of the praise that may be bestowed upon our present system of flaxseed grading and inspection, it can not be said that one could intelligently think of said grading, inspecting, and storing being accomplished in a much worse way. Good flax and bad flax, wet flax and dry flax, all jumbled together, eventually reach the consuming market.

Colonel Benton, an extensive wheat grower, in an address made before the Tri-State Grain Growers' Association, which I have mentioned, dealing with the subject of the present inspection, says:

> I have watched with some interest the grading of grain for the last twenty-six years in the State of North Dakota. The reason that I have watched this grading is because I have more or less grain to sell every year. The first few years that we grew grain in North Dakota we could get the grades that were offered, according to the rules that were to govern that grade. They finally established the rule that where grain weighed 58 pounds to the bushel and had 75 per cent of No. 1 hard wheat, that it was No. 1 hard wheat. Two years ago the inspectors from Minnesota sent word to the elevator at Wheatland, the place where I market my wheat, that they would give the No. 1 hard grade for no wheat. They told me that they could not give No. 1 for any wheat. I have seen wheat this year weigh 61 pounds, pure Scotch Fife wheat, graded as No. 2 and sold for the No. 2 price.

As everyone knows, the Scotch Fife is the hardest of all of our hard wheats, and even under the Minnesota rules, when grain having 75 per cent of Scotch Fife, weighing 58 pounds per bushel, is graded, that wheat should grade No. 1 hard; and yet here is wheat 100 per cent Scotch Fife, of a quality that weighs 61 pounds per bushel, graded as No. 2, because the inspectors at the great markets receive their orders to grade no wheat whatever No. 1.

Further on, Colonel Benton says:

> I have seen but one car of wheat this year sold in Wheatland as No. 1 hard wheat, and it was from the same field and threshed the same way that another car was that went No. 2. For the last ten years the grading of the wheat we have raised in North Dakota has been governed by Minnesota inspection. Last year an attempt was made to pass a grain-inspection law in Wisconsin. We got no relief from it. We have trusted to the Minnesota legislature for the last ten years. * * *
> If you go to the North Dakota legislature and pass any law that you want to, you can not enforce it, for when it comes to Duluth it is out of the jurisdiction of North Dakota and her laws. You can not establish State laws for the inspection of grain that will apply to all of the States. You can make a move like this (a national inspection law), which is in the right direction, and have a universal authority for the grading of grain, and then in Minneapolis they will only have to pay what the grain is worth. They need not be afraid of paying too much for the wheat so long as the Government says that the wheat is worth so much—and I want to say here that the raising of grain, and the growing of wheat that is No. 1 hard, and having to sell it for No. 2 or No. 3, and rejected, is getting played out. This is plain talk, but we are right at a crisis here.

These views of Colonel Benton are shared in by every North Dakota farmer and every South Dakota farmer and every Minnesota farmer. Anyone who has had anything to do with wheat raising in the State of North Dakota in the last ten years knows the absolute truth of this statement. I have hundreds of letters from all over the State, each one making this general complaint. Here is an extract from a letter of a member of our State legislature, and one extensively engaged in farming and shipping of grain. He says:

> I want to congratulate you upon the bill you are working to get through with reference to securing a national system for the grading of wheat. I regard it as one of the most important measures that affect the agricultural interests in the Northwest. Under the present system the farmers are being robbed every year of at least one grade of their wheat, and in this way: In the fall of the year, when they have to market their grain, the inspection at Minneapolis and Duluth is very rigid, and for the last two years it has been almost impossible to secure a better grade than No. 2 or 3 northern, and usually at a pretty heavy dockage. Now, were it not for the fact that as soon as the grain is out of the farmers' hands this damnable inspection loosens upon the grades, and the elevator people who have graded the grain 2 or 3 northern are allowed to deliver this wheat for No. 1 northern on contract sales.

I have given a few of these expressions of North Dakota wheat growers to meet the assertion of this National Wheat Dealers' Association that national inspection would be detrimental to the interest of the producer.

Smarting under these wrongs, our State has been for years trying to find some avenue of escape. In 1903 a committee of our State legislature, in conjunction with a committee from the Wisconsin legislature, sought by their combined efforts to find some source of relief. They were forced to fall back on Federal inspection and grain grading. This committee made a thorough investigation of the subject of wheat inspection and grading, and officially found conditions about as I have mentioned. I quote from the report of Hon. George M. Young, a member of this committee:

> That such abuses exist is a matter of almost universal knowledge among our farmers, who have been systematically robbed; but in addition to the facts presented by our farmers and in corroboration thereof I call to your attention the official report of the chief inspector of grain of the State of Minnesota, showing the total receipts and shipments of grain for the year ending August 31, 1901, from which I quote.

Now, from this table alone and from the official report that is given by the inspector there will be seen the robbery that is going on in the present system of State grain grading at the terminal markets at Duluth, Superior, and Minneapolis.

No. 1 hard—receipts, 341,567 bushels; shipments, 1,000,438 bushels.

More than three times as much No. 1 hard was shipped out in those three years as was taken in.

No. 1 northern—

That is a very good grade of grain—receipts, 10,970,414 bushels; shipments, 16,900,917 bushels.

No. 2 northern—receipts, 7,341,594; shipments, 3,978,311.
No. 3 spring—receipts, 1,335,830; shipments, 444,041.

It will be seen that of the higher grades the amount shipped out always exceeds by two or three times the amount taken in, while of the lower grades the amount taken in exceeds from two to three times the amount shipped out.

I will make this table a part of my remarks without quoting further from it.

The table referred to is as follows:

No. 1 hard—receipts, 341,567; shipments, 1,000,438.
No. 1 northern—receipts, 10,970,414; shipments, 16,900,917.
No. 2 northern—receipts, 7,341,594; shipments, 3,978,311.
No. 3 spring—receipts, 1,335,830; shipments, 444,041.
Rejected—receipts, 256,963; shipments, 134,471.
No grade—receipts, 1,335,521; shipments, 344,823.

Mr. McCUMBER. The quotation proceeds:

A study of these figures can not fail to show that the practice of raising grades and mixing the grain prevails under the Minnesota inspection to a very large and alarming extent. The practice has been to give lower and more rigid grades early in the season, while the bulk of the grain is being received, and higher and more liberal grades thereafter. The investigating committee of the Minnesota legislature—appointed in 1899 to investigate the charges made of unjust and inaccurate inspection made under the Minnesota law—concludes its review of the testimony taken with the following serious charge:

Remember, Mr. President, this was a committee of the legislature of the State of Minnesota dealing with their own laws:

"From this it appears that nearly one-third of the crop has been marketed each year before the farmer is enabled to get the grade that his crop merits."

Again, this same investigating committee in seeking for the cause of these hardships to the producer made the following charge: "That early in the season the inspection made by your inspectors was very severe against the producer, and that subsequently—later in the season, somewhere about the middle of October, and from that on—much more liberal grades were given."

The defense made by the chief inspector when called to the witness stand was in his words: "We take the benefit of the doubt until we get started, because we don't know what we are getting into." Another of his reasons was: "In order to have a little margin, one which we can carry our crop through on without exercising apprehension on the part of eastern buyers."

From the foregoing it will appear that the ills which our farmers complain of are not imaginary.

All of this is quoted, as I have suggested, from the report of Hon. George M. Young.

Now, Mr. President, what will be gained by a national inspection of grain? Generally I believe that it will rectify all of these abuses which have grown up under the present system. This bill proposes that the Secretary of Agriculture shall appoint experienced men to inspect and grade the grain. These men will not owe any debt of gratitude for their appointment to the grain men of the country. There will be no inducement for them to favor either the shipper or the producer. The producer of grain is only asking for his honest grades. He is content with that, but he insists that he has the right to these grades. He asks for honest weights and for honest dockage. I believe that under a national inspection it would not be a rule that in the early fall all doubts in reference to grade should be resolved against the producer. I believe that under a national inspection of grain it would be impossible for any man or set of men to say to inspectors: "You are to make no No. 1 grades this season."

I believe that under a national system of inspection of grain it would be impossible to buy in the product of the producer as No. 3 northern and at No. 3 northern prices, mix this product with one-quarter as much No. 1 or No. 2, and by this manipulation, and having it all graded as No. 1 or No. 2, make one grade clear off the farmer's grain. Under a national inspection system I believe it would be impossible to make up a shipload of wheat for Liverpool one-third No. 1, two-thirds No. 2, and receive a Government certificate that the whole, when mixed, is good No. 1 hard.

Under a national system of grain inspection I believe it would be impossible for the elevator man in handling 6,000,000 bushels of wheat to make a clear profit of $300,000 on manipulation of grades alone. Under a national inspection I believe it would be impossible for this same company in the handling of this same amount of wheat to make a net gain in bushels alone of nearly 200,000.

If Federal inspection were enforced I believe that it would be impossible that about three times as much No. 1 wheat would be shipped out of Duluth and Minneapolis elevators as is shipped into them. If we had Federal inspection I believe it would be impossible that in ten years' time these great terminal elevators could ship out 27,000,000 more bushels of wheat than they received during the same time. And this means much to the people of my State. If we raise 90,000,000 bushels of wheat and lose one grade, at 3 cents per bushel, that would mean $2,700,000. That would go a long way in paying all the expenses of State and county and city government.

These are all valid reasons for a change in the present system. It will be noticed that the Grain Dealers' Association gave no reasons why it would be injurious to the best interests of the producer, dealer, and foreign buyer to have national inspection. I have given reasons why it would be for their interest. Now, let the grain dealers meet those reasons. We have had national inspection of our meats for several years. The same reasons that could be urged against a national inspection of grain could also be urged against a national inspection of meat, and yet our meat-inspection laws have been the greatest possible blessing to the stock growers and packers and other men interested in American meats. It has given our meats a status which they never had before in the markets of the world. The certificate of the proper officer from the Department of Agriculture that this meat has been inspected and found to be pure is accepted in every market of the world. The same beneficial results would ensue from national inspection of grain.

The next important question is whether national inspection is feasible. Can the duties be performed by the National Government through the Department of Agriculture? The very fact that it is now done by the State answers the question. If under State laws grain can be graded and inspected by officials, certainly it can be done as well under a national law. If it can be done by the officers of the State, what reason on earth is there for saying that the same duties can not be performed by officers of the Government? There are only a few markets where it would be necessary to have inspectors; probably not any more than twenty-five cities in the United States. There would be no extra cost to the Government, because the small fee charged for each carload would cover the cost of inspection. The farmer pays for this now under the present system. I do not think that it will require but very little more force than is at the present time required for the inspection of meats. Judging from the reports of some of these grain-buying associations, they have a fear lest the present system of grades should be demolished by a single edict and a chaotic condition ensue. But these fears are entirely groundless, as will be seen by an inspection of the bill, which provides that the Secretary shall be guided by present commercial usages of the present system of grading. There are approximately eight distinct classes of wheat grown throughout the United States, three distinct classes of corn, two distinct classes of barley, and only one of rye, buckwheat, and oats.

Here I have prepared the classes showing where these several grades of wheat are grown and are marketed:

Class 1 is a red spring wheat grown in eastern Wisconsin, northern Minnesota, North and South Dakota, and Canada. The grades of this class are No. 1 hard, No. 1 northern, No. 2 northern, No. 3, rejected, and no grade. Class 2 is a hard winter wheat composed almost exclusively of the variety known as "Turkey wheat," grown in Kansas, Oklahoma, Iowa, southern Minnesota, southern Wisconsin, and to some extent in Illinois. Its commercial grades are No. 1 hard winter, Nos. 2 and 3, and rejected. Class 3 consists of a soft red winter wheat grown in Missouri, certain portions of Kansas, Oklahoma, northwestern Texas, and eastward. It is composed of the varieties, Little May, Mediterranean, Northern Fife, and an endless variety of local names. It comprises the larger class of the northern wheats, and is grade No. 1 red winter, usually prefixed by the term "soft." Class 4 is a white winter wheat, raised east of the Rockies, composed of Jones's Amber and Michigan White, and other local names.

This grain is grown to some extent in northern Indiana, Maine, eastern Pennsylvania, and southwestern New York. Class 5 is of relatively small importance, being a white spring wheat. It is grown in western portions of Nebraska, in California, and to some extent in Wyoming and Montana. Class 6 is grown west of the Rockies, in the Sacramento River Valley, also in the Colorado River Valley, as blue-stem wheat. It is the highest grade of white wheats in the Pacific region, selling from 3 to 5 cents above the other wheats grown there, and is sold under the grades of "high milling" and when mixed with other classes as "No. 1 milling." Class 7 is grown in the San Joaquin Valley, throughout Oregon, Washington, and Idaho. It is a club wheat.

This comprises the important classes of what we know for convenience as grade wheats, used for bread, pastry, etc. We have also another class of wheat raised in the corn belt, known in trade as "macaroni" wheat, composed of Russian red and all varieties of bright red and amber, and grown as spring wheat in the North and winter wheat in the South. These comprise the eight standards of American-grown wheat.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota will please suspend one moment while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1508) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection thereon of a public building to be used for a Department of State, a Department of Justice, and a Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senator from North Dakota may conclude his speech. The Chair hears no objection, and that order is made.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, looking at the subject from the standpoint of the producer, I absolutely fail to see wherein any injury can be inflicted upon the trade by a national grain-inspection system; on the contrary, I believe it would be a great blessing to both the producer and to a great number of wheat buyers. A system that will give confidence in our products not only to the producer but to the foreign purchaser can not but enhance the value of our product. A system that allows any kind of juggling or mixing of grains whereby any company or corporation secures more than legitimate returns for its investment must ultimately come out of the pockets of the producer. Under ordinary conditions, or at least conditions which were ordinary a quarter of a century ago, I myself would be averse to turning over to the Government the performance of any duty which could be done by private individuals as well. In all branches of business and trade I feel that the Government has no right to be a competitor with private individuals. Her power to levy a tax on this same individual for her own support gives her an advantage which could drive to the wall all competition.

But I do not regard this as a business or enterprise of the Government. It can not be considered in that sense. Under this bill the Government does not conduct the business of wheat selling any more than it conducts the business of wheat growing. It simply fixes the grades and classifications. It does the weighing, inspecting, and the grading, and gives the stamp of verity to all its acts. The Government does not make the gold or silver that comes to its mints; it simply weighs, coins, and stamps it and has its certificate written upon every coin, which carries with it absolute confidence and shields it from counterfeit. So would the certificate of the Government—national certificate upon every cargo of grain—carry with it a confidence in the character of that grain which would insure its easy sale in the markets of the world for what it is actually and truly worth.

Conditions have changed within the last twenty years. Combination—combination everywhere crushing the weak, combination cornering the markets, combination overriding and destroying the law of competition, combinations of great elevator companies, which fix our grades, determine what our prices shall be, place us entirely at their mercy. These are conditions requiring legislative action. We can not meet them as in days gone by. The great commercial interests are so closely bound together that there are no longer competitive channels to which we can go for relief. More than one-half of the population of the United States are agricultural. The Government, therefore, is interested and deeply concerned in their welfare from a national standpoint. There is no one single blessing which will give greater happiness, longer life, or higher character to the American people than the perpetuation of the rural home. Without this blessing no nation has ever remained long a progressive nation. With it no people have ever failed to become great and progressive. It is the pride and strength of our people to-day. It is the hope, and I believe I am justified in saying the one hope, of our people in the future.

A strong, healthful, country life must ever be maintained to check the disintegrating and deteriorating influence on the character of the people of our great and densely populated cities. The tendency of the latter is ever toward socialism, a condition where the scales of justice must always be held in a spasmodic grasp. The idea of law, order, and individual right grows naturally from the soil of our free homes. This proposition no one will deny; and if it be true, then any act which will benefit more than half of our population, which will tend to make wheat growing and farming successful, which will build up and make prosperous our American farms, from which we are to develop and supply the demand for the highest standard of American manhood and character, ought not to go begging for favorable consideration in an American Congress awake to the demands of our own interest and desirous of doing justice to all the people.

I have in the main discussed the inefficiency of the grading system as applied at the three great markets of Duluth, Minneapolis, and Superior. I am, however, informed—not only by those who have made a special investigation of the whole subject, but from the trade itself—that equally bad conditions prevail everywhere, and that the same abuses which I have enumerated are practiced in every section of the country, and that the same necessity exists for a national-inspection system.

While the association which met at New York condemned national inspection because of its political character, I do not know that they have ever condemned the political feature of the Minnesota inspection laws. I find that those, however, who believe that this Minnesota system is beneficial, by their association, also object to a national-inspection system, and those outside, who condemn the Minnesota system, say that the same abuses would follow a national grading and inspection of grain.

This is not true. Political strength would have nothing to do with the appointment by the Secretary of Agriculture. Failure to favor the wheat buyer would not be political death to the inspector appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture. Under the bill the appointee must not be interested by employment or otherwise in the grain business. If an inspector fails to do his duty, the wheat raisers of every State can have a voice in bringing him to account. Inspectors could be moved from one place to another section of the country whenever the interest of just and perfect grading and inspection demanded it. A rule could be made prohibiting the mixing of a lower grade cargo with a higher grade and claiming the high grade for the whole. This would be a death-blow to this abuse, as there would be no object in mixing grades unless there was a grade to be gained thereby.

I believe that the great bulk of wheat buyers—the small concerns of the country—would be greatly benefited by this bill and are actually in favor of it. It is true that many who are opposed to national inspection nevertheless see the evils and abuses of the present system all over the country and are exerting their influence and learning to secure greater proficiency and more uniform standards of grading.

Among these are Mr. John O. Foering, president National Grain Inspectors' Association, Bourse Building, Philadelphia, Pa., and Mr. George F. Reed, representing the executive committee of the Grain Dealers' National Association, Chamber of Commerce, Boston, Mass. These gentlemen are laboring diligently to secure a reform in the present system. I am indebted to them for much information furnished. The Secretary of Agriculture for the last two years has been making a special study of the subject to secure reforms and uniformity of grades, and I know they share with me the sincere hope that conditions may be bettered, even though we may differ as to the means of securing the same end.

The question here might be asked how this would affect anything but grains exported from or imported into another State or grains to be exported to a foreign country. In answer to that I may say that nearly all of our grain sold on the market enters into interstate commerce, and the small remainder would not seek to hold a grade of its own differing from the general grades. In other words, if the Government establishes a United States grade for grain, all grain will come into that list.

Now, Mr. President, I have not appeared before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in favor of this bill. I have thought that I could better discuss it at length before the Senate, and then after they had seen all of the points that could be brought out, both against it and in favor of it, they would be able better to consider it. I know that it affects one-half of the population of the United States, not only those who produce the grain, but those who are interested in it. I know that the system which is in vogue at present throughout the United States is one of great hardship to the entire agricultural people of the country. I believe a system very much like this affects the cotton growing States in the South, and that the farmer there suffers much in the same way the farmer suffers in the Northern States.

I believe, Mr. President, that we could meet this condition fairly by a system of Government inspection at the terminal centers where nearly all of the grain is sold, and I sincerely hope that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will take this matter under consideration. I know that it receives the concurrence of all the associations in the United States which actually represent the wheat-growing industry of the country.

Mr. President, when we have done this we have done for one-half of the population of the United States a favor and produced a condition which will benefit them more than all the legislation that has been enacted in the last fifty years.

COURTS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. CARMACK. I move that the House of Representatives be requested to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 8661) to detach the county of Linn, in the State of Missouri, from the western and attach it to the eastern judicial district of said State. I make this motion at the request of the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CARMACK. I enter a motion to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask that the post-office appropriation bill be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13521) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and read to line 6 on page 1.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, has called up for consideration the bill making appropriations for the Post-Office Department. This bill carries an immense appropriation. As it passed the House the gross amount contained in the bill was over $170,000,000, the largest appropriation that has ever been made in the history of this Government for this service.

This bill reached the Senate on March 26, was read twice that day and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and on March 29, which was yesterday, after a consideration of only a few hours, it was reported to the Senate. It is taken up for consideration to-day, when there is not a member of the Senate who could possibly have had opportunity to examine the measure, to study the new provisions affecting the administration of the Post-Office Department, or to ascertain the necessity for the large increases in the amount of appropriations for the postal service.

I have had considerable experience, Mr. President, in the consideration of appropriation bills, and I confess I have never known such haste in the presentation of these great measures as we have witnessed at the present session, and particularly in the appropriations for the Post-Office Department. For some reason, more fully known, I take it, to gentlemen on the other side than to those on this side, there has been a mysterious influence pressing from day to day, from the very beginning of this Congress until now, to hurry through, without due consideration, matters affecting this Department.

I am very far from saying, Mr. President, and I do not intend to be understood as saying, that I believe the Postmaster-General or any one of his present principal assistants has been unfaithful to his trust; but I do believe—and I think the evidence that has been permitted to ooze out shows—that there has been a laxity of discipline, a want of careful administration in the affairs of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. President, we have in all fairness, and not with simply partisan feeling, as has been stated in the debate, attempted to get at the real facts connected with the administration of the Post-Office Department; and for the first time to my knowledge, in the history of this body, the majority has seen proper to suppress and prevent proper inquiry into the conduct of a department. In my judgment, it is beyond all considerations of party, and the change from the policy pursued by the Republican party in the last twenty years is so radical that I think it will astonish the country.

It may be in the consideration of appropriation bills by this body—and I am rather inclined to that opinion—that the rule adopted within the past four or five years of distributing such bills to various committees and taking them away from the Appropriations Committee has prevented the same careful, earnest, and patient consideration which those bills heretofore received, and I know the change has greatly increased the expenses of the Government.

Now, when the Post-Office Department, the President of the United States, and both Houses of Congress have recognized the fact that the extravagant appropriations heretofore made have given opportunity to dishonest men to misuse and squander the money of the people, the time should be taken in this body and in the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to ascertain the facts in order to make provision which will prevent further robbery and thievery in that Department. But this privilege has been denied.

Mr. President, let me call the attention of the Senate and of the country to what we have attempted to do and have been thwarted in on every occasion by the majority of this body. The fact of corruption in the Post-Office Department, brought to our attention by the public press, induced the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] on the 23d day of November, during the extraordinary session, to introduce a resolution of inquiry into the conduct and expenditures of the Post-Office Department by the Committee on the Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments of the Senate be, and it is hereby, instructed to make inquiry into the conduct and expenditures of the Post-Office Department, and especially with respect to any charges of corruption, extravagance, and violations of law in the administration of the affairs of said Department.

Said committee is authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to compel the attendance and take the testimony of witnesses, and to examine all books, papers, and documents that may be needed for the purpose of such inquiry.

The Postmaster-General shall detail from time to time such officers and employees as may be requested by said committee in its investigation.

Upon the completion of said inquiry, and on or before the 1st day of May, 1904, the committee shall make report to Congress, which report shall embrace the testimony taken in the course of the investigation, the conclusions reached by said committee on the matters examined, and any report said committee may see proper to make, by bill or otherwise, with a view to correcting any abuses, defects, or illegalities that may be found to exist in the administration of the affairs of said Department.

That resolution went over for the day, and the next day it was laid before the Senate. The distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] asked that the resolution lie over, keeping its place on the Calendar. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] objected, and the resolution was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to remain there until this hour, to sleep the sleep of death, and thus to prevent inquiry into the conduct of the Post-Office Department.

On the 1st day of December, 1903, the Senator from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, feeling the responsibility more acutely than did any Senator in this body on the other side of the Chamber, offered a resolution calling for the production by the Postmaster-General of all the papers regarding the recent investigation in his Department, and giving the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads authority to make further inquiry, if necessary, into the administration of that Department. Upon that Senator's request the resolution was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

On December 7, 1903, the resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania was favorably reported by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and he asked for its present consideration. I asked that the resolution lie over one day, with the view of offering amendments to it; but later in the same day the Senator from Pennsylvania asked and obtained unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of his resolution, whereupon I offered sundry amendments, which the Senator from Pennsylvania agreed to accept. My amendments changed his resolution from a mere permission to the Post-Office Committee to investigate to a requirement that they should investigate and report, as I recall it, early in May, so that we might have the desired information by that time.

Mr. SPOONER. They were to report in May.

Mr. GORMAN. By the 1st day of May.

The resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], with the amendments proposed by me, is as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, in view of the charges of corruption, extravagance, and violations of law in the administration of the affairs of the Post-Office Department, is hereby instructed to direct the Postmaster-General to send to the committee all papers connected with the recent investigation of his Department, and said committee shall make further inquiry into the administration and expenditures of the said Department, and make report thereon to the Senate upon completion of said investigation on or before the 1st day of May, 1904.

Resolved, That said committee shall have power to send for persons, books, and papers, examine witnesses under oath, employ a stenographer, and sit, by subcommittee or otherwise, during the sessions of the Senate, at such times and places as the committee may determine; and the actual and necessary expenses of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

I doubt whether, in the history of this body, a mere resolution of inquiry or a resolution for investigation, under conditions such as admittedly existed in this case, was ever fought so vigorously or with such determination by Senators on the other side, with the exception of the Senator from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee. No inquiry was to be allowed, and no further information given beyond that already furnished the public by the press and the Post-Office Department and the statements of the attorneys employed by the President of the United States.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] immediately moved to refer the resolution, with the amendments which I had submitted, to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, stating that the committee should consider the propriety of making the investigation and frame the resolution as they saw proper. A long debate ensued, which ran until the 8th of December, when the Senator from Pennsylvania again, by unanimous consent, called up the resolution introduced by him, and the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] moved to refer it to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

After debate, which was participated in by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and by myself, the motion went over, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that the bill to carry into effect the Cuban treaty then under consideration had, by unanimous consent, the right of way. As is always the case, the unanimous-consent agreement was complied with, and the resolution again went over, which sent it to the Calendar.

On December 16 the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], becoming impatient at the delay and knowing that under the rules of the Senate it would require a majority vote to take up a resolution which had gone to the Calendar, speaking for all on this side of the Chamber, offered another resolution, asking for all the papers in the recent investigation made by the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, further directing the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to inquire into the expenditures of the Department, and to report by the 1st day of May next, and giving the power to examine witnesses under oath.

The following is the resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, in view of the charges of corruption, extravagance, and violations of law in the administration of the affairs of the Post-Office Department, is hereby instructed to direct the Postmaster-General to send to the committee all papers connected with the recent investigation of his Department, and said committee shall make further inquiry into the administration and expenditures of the said Department and make report thereon to the Senate upon completion of said investigation on or before the 1st day of May, 1904.

Resolved, That said committee shall have power to send for persons, books, and papers, examine witnesses under oath, and sit, by subcommittee or otherwise, during the sessions of the Senate at such times and places as the committee may determine.

Objection being made by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the resolution went over.

On December 19, three days afterwards, I submitted a resolution instructing the Postmaster-General to send to the Senate the reports of the investigation of the irregularities in the Post-Office Department made by Assistant Postmaster-General Bristow, together with the reports of Messrs. Holmes Conrad and Charles J. Bonaparte, special attorneys engaged by the President. That simple direction to the Postmaster-General to forward to this branch of the Government a document already in print, which had been given to a committee of another branch of the Government, and which the newspapers had published extensively and commented on, was immediately objected to by Senators on the other side, and we were denied the right even to have printed an official document, for that was all that was embraced in the request.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, instructed to send to the Senate the reports upon the investigation of the irregularities in the Post-Office Department, by Assistant Postmaster-General Bristow, together with the reports of Messrs. Holmes Conrad and Charles J. Bonaparte, special counsel for the Government, on the charges made by S. W. Tulloch, formerly cashier of the Washington City post-office.

Mr. President, I never could understand why so much sensitiveness should be shown and such extraordinary desire manifested to prevent this body from having facts which even the Post-Office Department, I will not say were compelled, but which they found it necessary, to make public.

Mr. SPOONER. My attention was diverted for a moment. To what resolution does the Senator refer in that connection?

Mr. GORMAN. The resolution offered by myself on the 19th of December, instructing the Postmaster-General to send to the Senate the report of the investigation of the irregularities in the Post-Office Department made by the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, together with the reports of Messrs. Conrad and Bonaparte, the special counsel employed by the President of the United States, a report, as I have said, that had been made public and printed elsewhere.

I do not know of any other case in the history of this body where such a request was ever before denied; but that resolution was antagonized, Senators on the other side insisting that such a resolution should not be passed. It was finally referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to lie there for how long a time I will show as I proceed. Finally every member of that committee recognized that the request was proper and that the facts ought to be in the possession of the Senate officially, so the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads reported the resolution. It is the only resolution they have reported relating to the investigation of the Post-Office Department, and we have been given the poor privilege of having the Bristow report printed as a public document.

These resolutions were debated at various times until the 6th day of January. On that date the resolution submitted by the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] came up for consideration, when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] promptly moved to refer it to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. After debate, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, together with the resolution offered by himself and the other resolutions pending looking to the investigation of the Post-Office Department. After debate, this motion again went over until the 8th day of January.

On that day I again asked unanimous consent of the Senate for the printing of the document to which I have referred—the report of Mr. Bristow, with accompanying papers—but immediately the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] renewed his motion to refer this resolution and all others relating to the post-office investigation to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

On the 11th day of January the President of the Senate laid before the Senate the several resolutions to which I have called attention, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said that he understood the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] desired to discuss the resolutions, so they went over again without prejudice.

On the 14th day of January the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] asked unanimous consent that the resolutions be postponed until the following Monday, as other Senators desired to discuss them. So on the 18th of January the Chair again laid before the Senate the resolutions, and, after debate, upon the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, the resolutions again went over.

On January 19 the several resolutions were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, as we believed with a distinct understanding that they would be reported back to the Senate. The statement made by the chairman of the committee in the course of the debate justified the belief, and was as follows:

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I am as earnestly in favor of the passage of a resolution to investigate the Post-Office Department as is the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY], a distinguished member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. The resolution which was offered by me was offered in good faith. I cheerfully accepted the amendment of the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] fixing a date prior to which that resolution called for a report, and directing the committee to make it. There seems, however, to be some diversity of opinion as to the phraseology and details of such a resolution. I therefore move that the resolution of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], the resolution offered by myself, the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Maryland, and those which may have been offered by any other Senator pertaining to this subject, be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and, as chairman of that committee, I pledge myself to call the committee together at an early date and to make a prompt report on this subject.

To which I made the following reply:

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, to the suggestion made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, that these various resolutions for an investigation shall be referred to that committee, I shall not object, in view of the Senator's statement that the committee will act upon the resolutions promptly and report them back to the Senate. I know the earnestness of that Senator and his very great desire that this investigation shall be proceeded with under a proper resolution.

It is now the 30th day of March, and the only action taken by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was in reporting a resolution for the printing of a document that had already been made public and printed at the other end of the Capitol. There has been no attempt to investigate; there has been nothing but suppression, and the resolutions still remain in the committee, where they will continue to sleep until the end of this session of Congress.

In the meantime this bill appropriating practically $170,000,000, and making radical changes in the provisions as to offices and the distribution of the work of the Post-Office Department, comes here from the other branch of Congress, and yet every item of information except that which has been permitted to ooze out has been denied us.

As a rule, Mr. President, it is highly improper to speak of what has occurred in a committee, but I can properly deal with the results of its labors. The post-office appropriation bill came to the attention of the members of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads at half past 10 o'clock on Monday morning. There were no data accompanying it, except that contained in the reports of the Postmaster-General and the statements made before a committee elsewhere, and there was not sufficient time for any member of the commitee to read all that had been said or to examine every provision of the bill. It was reported to the Senate yesterday when we were about to adjourn, and it is now brought up to-day at 2 o'clock, to be considered immediately.

Why this haste, Mr. President, if there is nothing to conceal? Why not deliberate as we have always deliberated in the consideration of a bill of this kind? I have never known in my service in this body, even in a short session of Congress, such haste as is here manifested.

It is said, Mr. President, that Congress must adjourn speedily. It is also said this suggestion emanates from a source outside of the halls of Congress, and, it seems, has the force of an order. The only intelligent explanation for such a decree is that it is inconvenient for one branch of the Government to have Congress on its hands; that if we investigate disagreeable facts may be brought to light and discussions may arise which will embarrass other branches of the Government.

I know not, Mr. President, whether these suggestions be accurate in every particular, but the bright men connected with the press in Washington, who ascertain quicker than ourselves the occurrences of Congress, of courts, and of the Departments, are seldom mistaken in statements so important as those to which I have referred. Every action of the majority in Congress indicates there is some great motive never before exhibited in the two Houses of Congress that makes them surrender to this mysterious power.

I have never been, Mr. President, in sympathy with the conduct of the Republican party, but, in common with all fair men in the party to which I belong, I have great admiration for the courage and independence the Republican party in Congress has heretofore shown. Never until now has it surrendered to the dictation of a power located at any other place, and I have watched that party since its infancy. When it first came in possession and control of both Houses of Congress, the country was shaken from one end to the other. A man was President who had the greatest task to perform that has ever fallen to any one since General Washington's time. He had an army under his command of a million of men, with which he could have made himself the dictator of every department of the Government and every branch of it.

The writ of habeas corpus was suspended, and the courts were practically under his control. And yet in the midst of the conduct of that great conflict the Senate never forgot its rights or the rights of Congress, and upon the suggestion that some of the Departments were not honestly conducted and not efficiently managed it appointed a committee on the conduct of the war, with power to examine into the expenditures and inquire into the management of the Army and Navy. Mr. Lincoln's power was almost unlimited, confidence in his integrity was supreme, and yet the Senate of the United States insisted upon having the facts, exposing the rascals, and advising the Administration in the conduct of the war. So with every Administration that has followed.

Mr. President, President Grant's Administration furnished another notable instance of the independence of Congress. The untold millions appropriated and the unusual conditions attending the restoration of the States south of the Potomac brought into high place men who proved unfaithful to their trusts, and corruption seemed to permeate the entire public service. The Republican majority did not hesitate to act and to investigate. No request for information made on this side of the Chamber by Thurman, Hendricks, Bayard, and other Democratic Senators was denied by the Republican majority.

Mr. President, through every Administration—that of Hayes, of Harrison, and of McKinley—this privilege has been granted. President McKinley did not think of denying information. He was only too glad to have a healthy opposition to inquire into the conduct of the men under him and the expenditures made. When conflict with Spain became inevitable, knowing we were unprepared in some departments of the Government, we placed in his hands for expenditure, after consultation with the representatives of both sides of this Chamber, $50,000,000. And I think it is not violating any confidence when I say that he insisted, notwithstanding the confidence of Congress in not making provision for a report, that every item should be subjected to an inspection by Republicans and Democrats on the Committee on Appropriations. He was a wise and patriotic man with nothing to conceal. He had served in Congress and he loved his Government. He knew that the purse strings must be with Congress, and that the question of the honesty of his Administration and its fair dealing ought to be subject to proper examination.

But, sir, we have reached a time when we hear honesty preached, and listen to splendid declarations for purity in government and in the service; and yet corruption exists. It came like a fog which has not yet lifted: but by some influence, great but unseen, investigation has been stifled. "No further data than that which we have seen proper to give you shall you have."

Mr. President, a most extraordinary scene took place in another body that assembles in this building, they resenting—and properly so—the suggestion that over 100 Members had in some way participated in the corrupt practices of the Post-Office Department. Honest men of both parties demanded that the facts should be furnished. Resolutions of inquiry were introduced, asking for reports covering all the details of the departmental investigation. Some power was sufficient to thwart a thorough investigation of all phases of the question: but they were graciously permitted by the Post-Office Department to have certain information in a form and substance which seriously reflected upon Members of Congress. The answer of the executive branch to Congress is in short. "We have investigated our own Department. A few men have been indicted. The courts have tried some. While it is true none have yet reached the confines of the prison, it is not desirable that Congress shall investigate further."

The Post-Office Department did, however, transmit to that body a report which, it is believed, was intended to transfer public attention from the men who have filched the money of the Government and abused their trust to Members of both Houses of Congress, who, in nearly every case, so far as I have been able to ascertain from this document, were simply engaged in the performance of their official functions as Senators and Members. But it has had its effect. The investigation, except so far as it relates to their own personal affairs, was instantly suppressed. It has also had its effect, however, in my judgment, in the country.

There is a school of very worthy men, men of education and fortune, whose business and mission in life it seems are to make the country believe that members of the Senate and House and of every legislative body in all the States of the Union are corrupt politicians, not to be trusted by the people. An impression has been made, and the public press, I am sorry to say, or at least a large part of it, is responsible for the belief by a large number of people that nearly all the corruption of government and its mismanagement come from the elected bodies in the States and from the Senate and House of Representatives. The men who propagate this idea do not believe in representative bodies. Their idea is to concentrate in the hands of some one man the power of a czar. Will we reach the point, have we reached the point, where another branch is ready to usurp all the power? Is it not a fact that legislation at this session of Congress is practically a farce? Mr. President, heretofore Congress, no matter which party has been in power, after deliberation, determined the character and scope of measures and then submitted the result of their labors for the approval or disapproval of the Executive. But, sir, who will deny that now in nearly every important matter Executive approval is sought before Congress is permitted to act?

Mr. President, the office of President of the United States is one that commands and should have the respect of every American citizen, and the occupant of that high position should not be lightly criticised. But, sir, there should be no hesitation on the part of any of us to resent any encroachment by the Executive upon the legislative branch of the Government. Recent occurrences in that direction have greatly disturbed the thoughtful men of all parties and have created a well-grounded fear that unless it is checked most disastrous results will follow. Mr. President, we can not allow acts of Congress to be changed by a simple order of the Executive or permit him to declare war. That is the duty of Congress.

Sir, I will not now attempt to recount all of the Executive acts which many of us regard as assumptions of power not warranted by the Constitution. But the Panama affair will plague us for all time as an unfortunate precedent in our dealings with the governments of South America.

Mr. President, the recent order of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions is a bold attempt at executive legislation and is an assumption of a power conferred solely and exclusively upon Congress. Mr. President, that great body of patriotic men who served their country so loyally and well from 1861 to 1865 deserve and have received special care and generous treatment from the Government. You and I sir, have always voted for the most liberal pensions and have ever stood ready to do justice to the old soldiers. They were not content with the act of 1890 as administered during the terms of President Cleveland and President McKinley, and up to the date of the recent order. For more than ten years they have petitioned Congress for the passage of an act creating a service pension.

At the beginning of this Congress bills were introduced in both Houses of Congress for the end desired, and were being considered by the Committees on Pensions. The committees, as constituted, are friendly disposed, and are anxious to grant any relief that the condition of the Treasury would warrant. In the midst of the consideration of this question the Secretary of the Interior issued his order putting a new construction upon the act of Congress of June 27, 1890, which construction practically grants a service pension. Until the date of this order few, if any, members of either House of Congress supposed that such a construction could be given to the present pension laws, and it is now regarded as purely a piece of executive legislation, and is so interpreted by the leading beneficiaries.

Mr. Dalzell, known as "Private" Dalzell, an earnest advocate of service pensions, has said in a public statement:

> The recent order of the Pension Office is quite equivalent to the passage of the service-pension bill. * * * When the present Congress turned down and refused to pass this righteous and long-promised measure to put us all on the rolls, Commissioner Ware stepped in, redeemed the promise, and, by a fair construction of the act of 1890, decided that age is one of the infirmities contemplated, if not expressly named, by that act.

He (Mr. Dalzell) further says that:

> True, if it is the law now, it was the law in June, 1890.

His plain intimation is that all claimants will be entitled to the increase from that date.

Further on in his statement he refers to the amount of money involved in the increase, and says with great force that the talk of the cost to the Government being three millions is "nonsense." He says it will be "nearer three hundred millions, or will amount to that or more inside of the next eight years, when the lowest pension drawn by any soldier or his widow, if this decision stands, will be $12 per month."

Here, Mr. President, is another significant statement by Mr. Dalzell. He says "Congress was slow to see its opportunity to redeem its promise to do for us precisely what Mr. Ware does, and the honor and the thanks belong to him, and to him alone, unless it shall appear, as many claim, that Mr. Ware merely carried into effect the order of the President."

The "order of the President" makes it unnecessary for Congress to further consider this question except to record the Executive decree by appropriating whatever sum may be estimated for by the Department.

Mr. President, in this condition we are informed by the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] and by others that the party in power in both Houses of Congress has determined that we shall speedily adjourn. Little time will be devoted to the consideration of important measures, as it is only considered necessary to submit to or approve any act or order of the President.

Congress must adjourn as soon as possible. Something might happen which would embarrass the situation. The Democrats, although in a hopeless minority in both branches, may have an opportunity in some way now unknown to bring forth some fact that would prove damaging to the party in power.

Mr. President, there are matters pending in Congress of great importance to commercial interests. Nevertheless we are ordered to disband, to leave Washington.

The senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], a man of distinguished ability and of great familiarity with the interstate-commerce law, convinced that some modification of that law is necessary to prevent the grave possibility of embarrassing a considerable part of our foreign commerce originating in the central and western section of the country, brought to the attention of Congress the fact that existing legislation, although not being enforced, would, if enforced, have that effect. He therefore introduced a bill with a view of correcting the condition of affairs.

What was the case the Senator had in mind? He knew that under the interstate-commerce law every railroad in the United States, if the law were enforced, would be compelled to publish its tariff rates on every bill of lading, not only on inland transportation, but on bills of lading to foreign countries, which included the charges by the steamship lines on the Pacific and on the Atlantic. Whether his bill is the one that ought to be passed is a question for consideration and discussion. But the object he had in view was quite as important as any that has ever been brought to the attention of Congress. He is a leader in his party, one of its most distinguished members, independent enough to act on his own judgment. And he was met how?

The introduction of the bill by him excited a good deal of interest throughout the country, but the moment it became public and was a subject of discussion, then occurred a most extraordinary interference with the legislation of Congress, but in keeping with all else that I have referred to. The Attorney-General of the United States immediately publicly repudiated the bill—I do not know whether of his own accord or by suggestion—and said that in no way was the Administration responsible for the action of the Senator from Ohio.

Now, think of it, Mr. President! A distinguished Senator, a member of the President's party, introduces a measure, and, before the committee to which it was referred could consider it, Congress and the public are informed by the Attorney-General that the Executive branch would not favor it.

Mr. President, I regret to be compelled to add that the honorable committee having charge of this measure has graciously submitted to the Executive decree, and the Senate will thus be prevented from considering it at this session.

This is an authoritative interview, as I understand, taken from the Washington Post of February 2, 1904, and written, as I believe, by the Attorney-General, so there can be no question as to its authenticity:

In response to a question as to his views on the wisdom of such an amendment to the law, he replied:

"Just one year ago it was proposed to offer, as an amendment to one of the pending bills in Congress, exactly this same measure. At the same time the President requested an expression of my views as to the proposed amendment, with the remark that its proponents claimed that it was in harmony with the suggestion made by me in an address at Pittsburg. I then prepared and submitted to the President an expression of my views. I then said and still think:

"'The scope of the proposed amendment is so broad that one ought not to attempt to define its limits without long reflection.'"

I will insert in the RECORD the interview, without stopping to read it:

[Washington Post, February 2, 1904.]

KNOX ASSAILS BILL—ATTORNEY-GENERAL REPUDIATES FORAKER MEASURE—NOT AN ADMINISTRATION BILL.

Attorney-General Knox, in answer to inquiries as to whether the Foraker bill was introduced with the knowledge and approval of the Administration, replied, "Absolutely, no."

In response to a question as to his views on the wisdom of such an amendment to the law, he replied:

"Just one year ago it was proposed to offer as an amendment to one of the pending bills in Congress exactly this same measure. At that time the President requested an expression of my views as to the proposed amendment, with the remark that its proponents claimed that it was in harmony with a suggestion made by me in an address at Pittsburg. I then prepared and submitted to the President an expression of my views. I then said and still think:

"'The scope of the proposed amendment is so broad that one ought not to attempt to define its limits without long reflection. At first glance, however, it seems to me that it would have the effect of repealing section 5 of an act to regulate commerce, which is popularly known as the "antipooling clause." That section makes it unlawful for railroads to pool their earnings or divide their traffic. As such pools were always held to be violative of public policy, they were held to be unlawful at common law. But as the States had committed to Congress alone the regulation of interstate commerce, the rule of the common law could not be applied to that commerce until Congress acted, which it did in the act to regulate commerce.'

SUBJECT WAS THOROUGHLY CONSIDERED.

"That act was the result of most prolonged agitation, chiefly in the States lying west of the Alleghenies. Measures covering what is now the fifth section were under consideration in both Houses for years. Volumes of testimony were taken respecting the subject and the most thorough debate resulted, after which the antipooling clause was adopted.

"The amendment also proposed to repeal the interstate-commerce law and the antitrust law so far as foreign commerce is concerned. This would result in giving foreign commerce an advantage over domestic commerce. By means of such a power the tariff protection will be largely nullified. It is well known that the steamship companies and railroads have in instances combined, so that foreign traffic has been carried from Berlin to Chicago at rates of 60 per cent lower than similar goods made in this country could be transported from New York to Chicago. Tin has frequently been carried from Wales to Chicago at a lower rate than the railroads would carry tin manufactured in Pittsburg to Chicago. Boots, clothing, hardware, etc., from Germany have been carried through to San Francisco at rates 66 per cent lower than was charged by the railroad carrier on similar manufactures of our own country from Atlantic ports to San Francisco.

"While it may be a wise policy to incorporate a rule of reasonableness into the regulation by law of contracts between individuals and contracts of industrial corporations which are private corporations, that rule has never been applied to what are known as 'quasi-public corporations'—railroads, for example—which exercise public functions and employ public rights.

"They owe duties to the public as the consideration of the grant to them of public franchise, among which is the duty to refrain from restraining competition in rates, service, and facilities. This amendment would tend to relieve them from many of their most important duties to the public. Its enactment, instead of being a protection to commerce, would be to effect an undoing of very much of the most important remedial legislation of the past fifteen years. If this proposed amendment shall be regarded as wise legislation, it ought not to be done secretly, but openly, with full knowledge of the public and full opportunity to it to be heard on the subject. Such an amendment as is now proposed ought not to be attached to any bill in the closing hours of a moribund Congress.

"The statement that the proposed amendment is in line with the suggestion I made in an address at Pittsburg in October, 1902, is a great mistake—a mistake based upon a misconception of the rule of the common law and the difference between the application of the rule to undertakings that are strictly private and those that are public or quasi public. In that address (the main purpose of which was to show that the power of Congress was not exhausted by the Sherman Act), in discussing the exercise of that power over the industrial trusts, I said:

WHAT MR. KNOX SAID AT PITTSBURG.

"'The extent to which legislative control over commercial activities should be exercised is, of course, a question for legislative wisdom. * * * Primarily it is for the Congress to decide whether it has the power, and whether and to what extent it will execute it, what character of restraints, whether all or those only which are unreasonable and injurious, shall fall under the ban, whether legislation in the first instance shall extend to all commerce or only to commerce in articles of vital importance to the public.' * * *

"I stated if the common law were incorporated into a Federal statute the rule for its interpretation would be as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States, namely:

"'Public welfare is first considered, and if it be not involved and the restraint upon any party is not greater than protection to the other party requires, the contract may be sustained.'

"The proposed amendment overlooks the fact that the public welfare is involved in any restraint that public corporations may impose upon themselves, and therefore the amendment does not propose to introduce the rule of the common law, but its enactment would be a legislative grant of power to restrain commerce, prohibited by the common law, as all restraints which affect the public welfare injuriously are void at common law.

"The above are a few of the objections to the proposed legislation which immediately occur to me."

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly; with great pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. I rose merely to interject into the Senator's speech a statement which it seems to me should be made in fairness to the Attorney-General. He did not make those statements until he was challenged to do so by the public press of the country. A number of newspapers—Democratic newspapers, if you please—proceeded to charge, as soon as the bill had been introduced, that it was the work of the Administration; that I had introduced the bill at the instance of the President, and assigned reasons why that should be the case. It was under such circumstances that the Attorney-General, I thought with perfect propriety, stated the truth, that the Administration was not consulted about it; did not have anything to do with it, and had no responsibility for it.

It never occurred to me that it was necessary for me to consult the President or the Attorney-General or anybody else when I desire to introduce a bill in the Senate. I introduced that bill acting on my own judgment, and at the proper time I shall bring the matter, if I can do so, before the Senate for consideration.

The situation has changed somewhat, however, since that bill was introduced. I have been studying with a great deal of diligence the latest decision of the Supreme Court with the hope that I may reach the conclusion that it is not so necessary now as I thought it was at that time. But whether I regard or shall regard the legislation as absolutely necessary in the sense I then thought it was, I shall bring the matter before the Senate in due time in order that we may have a full discussion of the whole subject.

I have no opinions about it that I want to conceal. I do not share at all the opinion expressed by the Attorney-General as to the unwisdom of the legislation. But he had a right to entertain the opinion he expressed, and if he saw fit I suppose he had a right to express it, though ordinarily it would be regarded, I think, as a better practice for an official of a coordinate branch of the Government to wait until he was reached in due course before expressing himself about somebody else's action. But as to all that, if the Senator will excuse me for another word, I shall hope to do justice to it at the proper time.

Mr. GORMAN. Now, Mr. President, that is the speech and statement of a very able and a very loyal soldier in the Republican party. At this juncture of affairs for him to have said less would have been unwise.

I am delighted, however, at the concluding sentence of the Senator's statement, that he does not believe the practice of the officers of the executive branch in commenting upon the conduct of Senators or of the Senate is wise, and he thinks it ought to be abstained from. I hope at that later period, after December 1, to which the Senator refers, when this matter will come up, we may be able on both sides to discuss it with more freedom and with a firmer determination to resent and resist and stop this interference which has grown up on the part of executive officers.

Now, how important was the great interest which the Senator from Ohio desired to promote? It was the development of our trade to the Orient through the most extraordinary action of the transportation lines that has ever occurred. It was done under the immediate direction, I think, of one of the greatest men in the transportation interests in the United States, Mr. James J. Hill. The grain from the central West along the Red River and in the Dakotas, the corn from Iowa, and the cotton from Mississippi and Texas, the manufactured goods from North and South Carolina, under the action I have referred to, were being shipped to the Orient at a rate lower than that charged for inland points and on the ocean at a less rate than that charged by any other ships that float. It is claimed that it is due to that phenomenal low rate that we have increased our shipments of cotton, grain, and other products.

The law, as the Senator from Ohio knew perfectly well, requires a publication of those rates and the filing of them with the office in Washington. Merchants, as well as the transportation interests, claim that a compliance with the law would put in jeopardy this new trade, as the publicity of rates would give to our competitors, the German and English merchants, an advantage which would be destructive to American interests.

The Senator from Ohio proposed that Congress should deal with the question—Congress alone having the right to modify existing law—and, after considering all the facts, make such modifications as might be deemed proper, not necessarily, however, in the form or to the extent proposed by the Senator. As I understand, his suggestion was only tentative, and for the purpose of bringing the attention of the Senate to the matter; but, as I have before said, the Attorney-General's instant condemnation has resulted in suspending all consideration by the Senate.

Prior to the introduction of the bill of the Senator from Ohio the question had been raised, and was then pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission, as to the proper construction of the present law, commercial bodies and the transportation interests holding that the filing and publication of tariffs on the import and export trade was not required.

The Interstate Commerce Commission held public hearings in December, 1903, and in January, 1904, at which hearings appeared before it representatives of export associations in the foreign trade, manufacturers, and gentlemen representing the transportation interests. It was regarded as one of the most important questions that had arisen before the Commission

On the 5th day of February, 1904, after patient hearings and long consideration, the commission held that the interstate-commerce law "now requires the publication of import and export tariffs in the same manner as domestic tariffs."

The commission also held that—there may be cases in which a modification of the rule would be of service to the carrier without detriment to the public, and perhaps other instances in which such modifications should be granted in the interest of both the carrier and the public. This can only be accomplished by an amendment of the act, since the provisions of that statute are mandatory, and the Commission has no power to modify their requirements.

Mr. President, the concluding decree of the Interstate Commerce Commission is a very remarkable one. It practically suspends the present act of Congress until Congress should have reasonable time to modify the law.

Here is the exact language:

The carriers will be afforded an opportunity to adjust their tariffs and arrangements, and, if so advised, present the subject to Congress: Provided, however, That in the meantime all carriers which do not publish and maintain import and export tariffs shall file with the Commissioners as promptly as possible a statement of the rates actually charged. If the act is not amended within a reasonable time, it will be the duty of the commission to enforce the publication of import and export rates in a manner now provided by law.

So, Mr. President, the commission informs us that "the carriers will be afforded an opportunity * * * to present the subject of modification of the law to Congress." It further says, "If Congress fails to act within a reasonable time, it will be its duty to enforce the law."

But, Mr. President, we understand the decree has gone forth that Congress must dissolve before this matter is even considered. Conditions affecting trade and commerce must wait for adjustment. It is inconvenient; it may become troublesome for Congress to remain in session. It is now the latter part of March, and Congress is expected to adjourn within a month, when July is the usual time for the termination of a long session. But then, it is feared, political conditions may be affected if the question of an amendment to the interstate-commerce law should be considered now.

"We will wait a reasonable time for Congress to act," says the commission.

What is a "reasonable time," in the opinion of the executive branch? I suppose the answer will be, "Until after the next general election."

Mr. President, the country will understand that this supreme disregard of the rights and duties of the legislative branch of the Government can not, in safety to our institutions, be long tolerated. And yet there is little hope that the party in power will permit Congress to remain in session for the consideration of these grave questions. That party seems to be content to give to the executive branch full opportunity to execute or suspend the law, or, by Executive order, practically ordain new legislation.

Mr. President, the American people believe in obeying the law. The security of their lives and property depends upon it. They have always resented the one-man control in anything. They believe that the conduct of commissions and of the President must be in strict conformity with the laws of Congress.

It may be, Mr. President, that this conduct will be tolerated during this year. It may be that we can condone, for the time being, many things which have occurred. I would have great concern for the future of our country if I believed such a state would continue.

It is no answer to our criticisms to say the President is honest. No one questions that; but honesty is not a rare virtue. You rarely find any but honest men in public life. States do not trust gentlemen upon this floor who are dishonest. One may occasionally creep in, but he soon passes away. The members of both Houses of Congress occupy high positions, and are as honest and patriotic as any President. I have said nobody questions the President's honesty; but his judgment, his actions, his conduct of public affairs are open and ought always to be subject to criticism, no matter how much and how often he or any man proclaims his superiority.

Sir, in private life I have never known any gentleman, acting as a trustee, conscious of his own rectitude, believing the trust under him was honestly administered, who would for a moment hesitate to open the books to anyone in interest. Therefore I can not understand why we have been denied the same privilege by the Departments of this Government. I am loath to believe the charge that, when facts were presented as to alleged peculations in the Post-Office Department, an investigation was refused. Yet, sir, in a recent publication, one of the attorneys selected by the President to examine into the Tulloch charges made that statement against ex-Postmaster-General Smith.

Mr. Bonaparte, the attorney referred to, is an intense civil-service reformer, and for some years past seems to have reveled in an opportunity to make disagreeable statements in regard to gentlemen in public life. Yet Mr. Bonaparte's statements have considerable force from the fact that the President honored him by associating him with Mr. Holmes Conrad in an investigation of the charges against the administration of the Post-Office Department. Both of these gentlemen have insisted that there should be further investigation, and, under the circumstances, it seems to me, Mr. President, it is due to the former Postmaster-General and his assistants, as well as the present officials, that an impartial inquiry should be instituted.

What we desire, and what I think the country has a right to expect, is that the books of the Departments shall be open to the examination of both parties in Congress. And if there is additional fraud, rascality, or extravagance let it be exposed. If men holding responsible positions in the public service have been unfaithful to their trusts, turn them out. That is all we have asked and is all we desire. From November until now we have insisted upon this right, and it has been as persistently denied.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not intend to get into any controversy with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] upon the subject of the resolutions pending before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads relative to an investigation of the Post-Office Department. That matter clearly does not belong to a bill making appropriations for the year 1905 for the expenses of the Department of the Postmaster-General.

The resolution offered by myself, to which the Senator from Maryland has referred, was offered after deliberation and in good faith. I had reached the conclusion that it would not be amiss for the Senate of the United States to order an investigation of the abuses alleged to have existed in the Post-Office Department. I reasoned that if on investigation, it turned out that nothing was found requiring further investigation, it would do no harm and would tend to establish public confidence in the investigation, exhaustive in character, which had been made by the Postmaster-General and by the Department of Justice.

I anticipated and felt confident that that investigation, being exhaustive, would leave little or nothing for the Senate committee to do. I felt that the passage of that resolution, or of a similar resolution, and some performance under it, might perhaps have been the means of relieving the Senate from the oratorical and political pyrotechnics which have been indulged in upon the other side of the Chamber upon this subject. Perhaps, however, that wish might have been vain, and some other occasion would doubtless have been found to give vent to the flood of oratory here and at the other end of the Capitol.

Therefore, having watched the progress of events, I have reached the conclusion that it is not of very great importance whether the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads act on any resolution or not. In that belief I think most of my Republican colleagues, and perhaps some of my Democratic colleagues upon the committee, share.

There seems to be a disposition to believe that at this time it is unnecessary and impracticable for any committee of the Senate, with any advantage to the public service, to enter upon even the form of an investigation. I have, however, steadily voted upon the floor of this Chamber and in the committee in favor of the resolution providing for an investigation.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania contend that any Senator on this side of the Chamber has voted against the resolutions of investigation?

Mr. PENROSE. No, Mr. President; I believe they have invariably voted for those resolutions, and upon numerous occasions have been insistent upon their consideration by the committee and upon early action and report one way or the other.

Mr. President, I shall not say any more upon the subject of the so-called "resolutions of investigation." I believe that the American people have entire confidence in the fact that the Administration has made every effort, and has made an exhaustive effort, to expose and to punish every person in the Government employment connected directly or indirectly, in such manner as to be open to indictment, with the various frauds contemplated in the Post-Office Department.

The resolutions not being pertinent to the appropriation bill, and no effort having been made to insert them by way of amendment to the bill, a discussion of them is hardly necessary at this time.

But there is one part of the remarks of the Senator from Maryland which, as chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, I can hardly permit to pass unchallenged; and if their inaccuracy is any proof of the inaccuracy of the Senator's other statements, it should go far toward making the Senate consider carefully the statements which he has made upon the vast range of political subjects hardly pertinent to the appropriation bill under discussion.

The Senator has stated that extraordinary haste has been exercised and exhibited in the preparation of this bill. It is true, Mr. President, that the bill was received by the Senate on Saturday last and was then referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the Senate. Immediately the clerks of the committee were put to work, the bill properly prepared and annotated, as is usual, the committee called on Monday morning, and, sitting continuously on Monday and Tuesday, on Tuesday afternoon at a late hour their labors were completed.

But, Mr. President, since last December the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads has had the preparation of that bill under consideration. While the bill was not formally before the Senate or before the committee, various amendments were before this body and various matters were anticipated. I do not recall that a single stated meeting of the committee occurring, as its regular meeting does, on Wednesday, has been omitted since the committees were organized by the Senate and their announcement made by the presiding officer of this body.

I have before me on my desk the hearings which have been taken by the committee. I happen to see, from the first that I take up, that almost one month was devoted by the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to the consideration of the question of the rural carriers; one month, always on the stated meeting days, and sometimes on other days, the committee, with a quorum usually present, heard representatives of the rural carriers and representatives of the Post-Office Department upon the various complicated questions involved in the issue presented in the paragraph referring to the compensation, the duties, and the privileges of the rural carriers.

I hold in my hand the testimony, amounting to many pages, of representatives of the newspapers throughout the United States, for and against, some advocating a prohibition and some an extension of privilege in connection with the activities of the rural delivery carriers in relation to the circulation of daily newspapers.

I have here reports of testimony taken at other hearings, which it is unnecessary for me to mention, but dating back, as is shown by the one I hold in my hand, to December 10 last, indicating that the Post-Office Committee of the Senate has gone to very great pains and has been willing to hear everyone—citizen and Senator or Representative—upon the questions pending before it.

If the Senator from Maryland has not received his notice of the meetings of the committee, or has failed to respond thereto, or has forgotten the same, I regret that he has felt called upon to cast any reflection upon the deliberation which the committee has exercised.

In all my experience in a membership upon that committee, extending over the whole period of my service in the Senate, I can say, without any charge of egotism because I happen to be chairman, that never has the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the Senate devoted more care, more work, or more deliberation and painstaking to the preparation of the bill.

As a matter of fact, the post-office appropriation bill is one of the shortest appropriation bills that comes before this body. It is one of the simplest, being largely an appropriation for clerical force, well defined in the estimates of the Department, and well understood.

The bill contains only thirty-four pages, being, I believe, the shortest appropriation bill that comes up for the consideration of the Senate, and containing, as I have said, a simpler character of matter than almost any other appropriation bill.

In fact, I do not recall in the three Congresses preceding this one, in which I have been a member of the Post-Office Committee, that more than two sessions of that committee, not averaging more than two or three hours on each occasion, were ever required to perfect the appropriation bill, and I believe the Journals of this Senate will bear out the fact that the bill has generally been completed by the Senate in a day.

Mr. President, not only has the Senate committee proceeded with an extraordinary deliberation and a very great effort to give everyone the fullest hearing, but it has in no wise been guilty of that extravagance which was also suggested by the Senator from Maryland.

If, in his opinion, the appropriations for the Post-Office Department bear a character of lavish extravagance, his criticisms are more applicable to the Post-Office Department and to the other end of this Capitol than to any action of the Senate committee.

In the post-office appropriation bill as it comes to the Senate from the House there is an appropriation of $170,466,400. With two exceptions, Mr. President, the committee of the Senate has made practically no increase of any moment in this bill.

In the absence of a report from the committee, it may not be amiss for me to state for the information of the Senate that there were but two large items added to this bill which involve any considerable increase.

In the one case the proposition was accepted for the purchase of a site for a post-office building in the city of New York after the proposition had been passed by the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, by the Secretary of the Treasury, and by the Postmaster-General, and being recommended by them all as more advantageous to the Government.

Being a question of emergency which had to be met, and an opportunity which might be lost, it was considered wisest and best, I believe by a unanimous vote, that this item should be inserted in the appropriation bill, rather than a provision for rental as presented in the bill as it came from the House.

The only other point in which any considerable increase was made was in the addition of 600 clerks to the Railway Mail Service over and above the number allowed by the House. The Department had requested an increase of 1,200 clerks in the clerical force of this rapidly growing branch of the Post-Office service.

The House had granted 600, and, at the request of the Department, the Senate committee reported in favor of the additional 600, making the full amount of the original request, which was 1,200 clerks.

With these two exceptions, Mr. President, an examination of the bill will disclose that the Senate committee has made but few increases—a few thousand dollars in each case in the offices of the Second and Third Postmasters-General, not amounting in all to more than two or three hundred thousand dollars, if that much. Therefore, so far as any a tion of this committee is concerned, or so far as any probable action of this Senate is concerned, the charges of inconsiderate extravagance are hardly fitting to the case.

That the expenditures of the postal service for the approaching fiscal year are extraordinary is shown to be not the fact by an examination of the enormous growth of the public postal business of the country. The Postmaster-General says, on page 2 of his annual report:

> It will be seen that the gross revenues for the fiscal year ended June 30 last are nearly $1,500,000 in excess of the estimates, which attests the wonderful business activity of our people, and also indicates that the extension of postal facilities and the improved methods of doing postal business result in largely increased receipts, and were it not for the very large expenditures on account of the introduction of rural free delivery there is no question but that the Post-Office Department would be more than self-sustaining at the present time.

As showing the astounding progress and great growth of the Post-Office Department there is, on page 3 of the report of the Postmaster-General, a table showing the receipts, etc., of the Post-Office Department from 1792 down to 1903. That table shows the following to have been the receipts, expenditures, etc., of the Post-office Department at each decade from 1792:

Statement of receipts and expenditures of the Post-Office Department, by decades, 1792–1903.

Year.	Number of offices.	Receipts.	Expenditures.	Surplus.	Deficit.
1792	195	$67,443	$54,530	$12,913
1802	1,114	327,044	269,866	57,178
181	2,610	649,208	540,165	109,043
1822	4,709	1,117,490	1,167,572		$50,082
1832	9,205	2,258,570	2,265,171		7,601
1842	13,733	4,546,849	5,674,752		1,127,903
1852	20,901	6,925,971	7,108,459		182,488
1862	28,875	8,209,821	11,125,364		2,825,543
1872	31,863	21,915,436	26,658,192		4,742,766
1882	46,231	41,883,065	40,482,021	1,400,984
1892	67,119	70,930,475	76,980,846		6,050,371
1902	75,924	121,848,047	124,785,697		2,937,649
For the year 1903	74,169	134,224,443	138,784,487		4,560,044

As will be observed, in each of those decades, with one exception, from 1812 down to the present time, there has been a deficit, greater or less, at the end of each fiscal year. The Postmaster-General says:

> The postal service is growing with great strides. A large post-office may have sufficient clerical force at the beginning of the fiscal year, July 1; on October 1 it may need 100 additional regular clerks; on January 1, 50 more, and so on.

It is the best evidence, Mr. President, of the prosperity of the country that the present increase is commensurate with the increase in previous years.

Probably in no case does a single item of appropriation in this bill exceed the estimates of the Department, and in most cases it falls considerably below the estimates. Therefore it seems to me that the charges of inconsiderate action and of extravagant action are absolutely devoid of any basis.

In addition to the amendments to which I have referred, the committee struck from the bill some half dozen matters in the character of general legislation, as to the wisdom of which the committee was in very great doubt. With these exceptions the bill stands as it came from the House, and it was the wish of the committee and its purpose to make as few alterations in the House bill as were possible under the circumstances.

I will leave to others, Mr. President, any discussion as to the status of the resolutions of investigation. I have nothing further to say about the measure at this time; but of course I shall be prepared, when we proceed with the reading of the bill, to explain any items or furnish any information which may be desired.

LOUISIANA PURCHASE EXPOSITION.

During the speech of Mr. PENROSE,

Mr. ELKINS. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to yield to me at this time that I may offer a resolution.

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ELKINS. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the Senate a copy of the report filed in the Department of State by Thomas W. Cridler, commissioner for Europe of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition.

Mr. TELLER. I want to suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that the word "requested" in that resolution is not the proper word in such a case. It should be "directed to transmit," etc.

Mr. LODGE. If this resolution is going to occasion discussion, to be injected in the middle of the speech of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], I shall have to object to it.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask that the resolution may go over. I shall be very brief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution goes over.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13521) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there is no need of my endeavoring to add anything of the clear and vigorous explanation that has been given by the chairman of the committee in regard to the conduct of the appropriation bill in committee. He has shown beyond peradventure not only that there has been no unusual haste in dealing with this bill, but that the committee has been occupied with different phases of it throughout the winter, has held many hearings on different portions of the bill, and was thoroughly prepared to take the bill up when it reached us from the House.

The bill, as the chairman stated, is a very short bill. The items are large, and the appropriations are grouped under comparatively few heads. It is not a bill which takes a very long time to go through. The committee was occupied two entire days upon it, working as industriously as possible, and I think thoroughly considered every suggestion that was made.

That the committee was diligent in getting the bill ready there can be no question, and that they pressed the work upon it is equally true. They did so because they were anxious to do all that lay in their power and that came within their jurisdiction to advance an early adjournment. The majority of this Senate, the party responsible for the conduct of business here, has deemed it best to bring about an early adjournment if they could; but, so far as I am aware, no instructions have been received by anybody from any quarter in this Senate in regard to adjournment.

It was not to this side of the Senate that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] on a certain occasion applied the term "cuckoos," which afterwards became more or less famous. No instructions have been received here, but the majority of the Senate have deemed it best to secure an early adjournment and for what seemed to them good and sufficient reasons. When the Senator from Maryland refers to a President desiring "to get Congress off his hands," he mixes up his Presidents. That was the phrase of an Administration which enjoyed the support of the Senator, and not one of ours. No Republican Administration that I am aware of ever used the phrase, but I remember very well that President McKinley and President Roosevelt have both on proper occasions expressed their pleasure at the assembling of Congress. Let the phrase "getting Congress off his hands" rest with the distinguished President who discovered it.

Mr. President, our friends on the other side seem hard to please. When we came together here in November Senators will remember that great fault was found by members of the minority with the assembling of Congress in extra session. We were told it was totally unnecessary, and the profound scheme was invented of demonstrating this fact to the country by postponing the vote upon the Cuban tariff bill until the regular session. It was believed at the time, I think, by those who invented that notable scheme that it would demonstrate to the people what a failure the extra session had been. I doubt, Mr. President, if to-day there is a man in this country, outside of Congress, who can recall just when the Cuban bill actually passed.

Now, Mr. President, we find from the distinguished Senator from Maryland that the Democratic party, the minority, are opposed to adjournment, as at the beginning of the session they were opposed to our meeting; and the Senator charges us with a readiness to go away and leave a great deal of important public business unattended to. I think that the record of legislative activity since the Government has been in control of the Republican party will compare favorably with the record of Democratic activity from 1893 to 1897, in the way of affirmative and positive legislation. It is not necessary for me to go through all the measures and contrast what was done during those two periods, respectively. I do not recall at this moment a single important measure passed from 1893 to 1897 except the Wilson bill, which was subsequently repealed.

The Democratic Administration did not find time even to enforce the Sherman Act, and since the recent decision of the Supreme Court the eminent gentleman who was President of the United States at that time has deemed it necessary to come forward in an apology and an explanation and in his own terse and lucid style tell the country why it was they did not find time to enforce the law; that he and his friends were as hostile to trusts as anyone could possibly be. I do not think it is necessary for me or anyone else to defend the Republican party against the charge of not being sufficiently active in legislation as compared with our opponents. The statute book of the United States and the history of the country tell the story.

Then, when it comes to a practical suggestion of what we ought to stay here for, the only one that I gleaned from the very interesting speech of the Senator from Maryland was that we ought to remain in session in order to amend the Sherman Act, with a view to making it less effective than it now is. It seems to me that to open up a debate on that subject, affecting the business interests of the country, with every kind of scheme offering, without proper opportunity to consider them, and on the eve of a Presidential election, would be as injurious a thing for the business of the country as Congress could possibly engage in.

But the truth is, Mr. President, the Democratic attitude of dislike to the meeting of Congress, followed now by an equal dislike of the adjournment of Congress, result from unhappy restlessness like that of a fever-stricken patient tossing and turning in the vain hope of finding a more comfortable place. I suppose that the idea is that we ought to remain here in order to give our friends upon the other side further opportunity to seek an issue. I should not think that their efforts in that direction this winter had been so encouraging as to make them desire to stay longer looking for issues. Recall briefly the record.

The first point selected for attack was Panama. It has passed into history, and as an issue it does not seem to have been a very glittering success or to promise much for the Presidential campaign.

The next object of assault was the Navy. That also, when leaned upon, turned out a broken reed, which pierced the hand. The next was pensions, and there we are met with the same protestations which we were met with on Panama—that they approve of pensions to the soldiers; they would give the most ample pensions to all, but they disapprove of the method. They approved the canal, but they disapproved of the method. The position is not a very stable one, nor does it invite an enthusiastic popular support. Mr. President, I think if the objects in these cases were good, the methods are easily defensible.

And now, last of all, we come to the Post-Office and to the charge that we have been suppressing information and preventing an investigation. The Senator from Maryland contrasted those who now have the honor to sit on this side of the Chamber with their predecessors, greatly to the disadvantage of those who are now here. He represented that our attitude was something entirely new, and yet in the same breath he told us that far back in the time of General Grant the Democratic party was loudly demanding that "the books should be opened," just as they are now doing.

Mr. President, the Democratic party have no doubt many virtues, but inventiveness is not one of their best points. The cry of "suppression," of "open the books," of "stifling investigation," I have heard from my friends on the other side ever since I have been in public life.

I heard it in the other House. I have heard it continually here. I have heard it here I think every year that the Republican party has been in power, and I suppose it is the natural if not novel cry which the opposition must always attempt to raise against the party in control, especially if that party has had a long tenure of power. But a well-worn political cry of this kind is not proof and is always appraised at its true value. When a party is distressed for an issue, a sham outcry must serve.

Now, as to this particular case. The post-office investigation was begun last spring. It was started by the present Postmaster-General, a member of a Republican Administration, acting with the approval and under the direction of a Republican President. That investigation was pushed with the utmost thoroughness as all the world knows, pushed relentlessly into the remotest corners of the service.

There was not a portion of the service which was not examined. There was no office too small to escape examination. There was not the slightest effort to shield anyone or cover anything up. Everything was laid bare. No investigation, I venture to say, was ever made more thoroughly, more relentlessly than that investigation carried on by the Postmaster-General and his Fourth Assistant. All the results of their investigation have been laid before Congress. Masses and masses of testimony were taken; reports on every part of the Post-Office Department were furnished.

There was nothing shown in the committee to give, in my opinion, any reason for opening a Congressional investigation keeping the Department in a further state of disorganization, and going imperfectly over ground which had been already well gone over. There could be no object in entering upon such a proceeding except some possible campaign or political benefit.

I did not think, Mr. President, I do not think now, that there was any reason why the Senate should enter upon such an investigation. Members on the other side were invited to bring forward any specific charges. If they have been brought forward here or elsewhere, I have not been aware of them. The committee was entirely ready to investigate any specific charge against any portion of the postal service, but the committee was not ready to go to work and do over again and do badly and clumsily what had already been very well and thoroughly done by Mr. Bristow and a corps of trained detectives. It seemed to the majority of the committee to be wholly needless—a mere waste of public time and public money.

Moreover, Mr. President, the other House have taken up the matter. They have investigated it. They have had a report which it seems to me was a very useless report and about which, I think, a great deal was said that was quite needless and in regard to which many false impressions were spread abroad. At this moment they have a committee of very distinguished men of both parties who are looking into the question of the post-office administration.

Now, why should we go to work and engage in duplicating what the House is doing and try to do over again what Mr. Bristow has done and done well? It seems to me, as I have said, that it would be a sheer waste of the public time and of the public money; that it would not promote good service in the Post-Office Department, but would hold up the reorganization and reforms which have been undertaken as the consequence of the investigation of last summer.

Mr. President, the resolution of investigation was debated here. It was not delayed by us. There never was a day, I can say for myself, from the time I made the motion to refer until it was voted upon that I was not ready to vote. I think that all resolutions of investigation of that character ought to go to the committee which is to be charged with the work, if the work is to be undertaken, and through that organ the Senate should learn whether in the opinion of the committee specially charged there is any reason for an investigation. The committee has discussed this matter again and again, and no new, specific matters were brought forward, nothing but an attempt, as I have already said, to revise work already done. Against that a majority of the committee voted.

Mr. President, that is all I desire to say about the resolution of investigation. The facts in the investigation are before the public. They have all been published. The public know precisely what has been done. They know the number of men who have been indicted—not a few, as the Senator from Maryland said. They know the number who have been brought to trial. They know that in every trial thus far, with one exception, a conviction has been obtained. They are aware that the work has been thoroughly done and the punishment meted out and that the other prosecutions are being pushed.

The Senator from Maryland seems to be very much afraid lest the Democratic party, with insufficient knowledge at their command, shall misrepresent us before the people in the ensuing campaign. I do not think that the amount of testimony which they may get together will affect the total sum of Democratic misrepresentation in a political campaign. It is sure to be ample. At all events I am quite ready to take my chance on that.

The majority in this Chamber have decided not to give their time to what they consider a needless and a useless investigation where all the facts are known. There is nothing to conceal, because the facts have all been brought out into the light of day by a Republican Administration. We are willing to leave that question to the people of the United States. We are also willing to leave to the people the question whether an early adjournment is not in the interest of the public business and the business of the country. We are entirely ready to leave all these questions, as the Senator from Maryland suggests, to the people of the country, and we are not feeling at all disturbed as to what the verdict will be.

Still less are we disturbed by the attacks made upon the President, upon whom the opposition seem to center all their assaults. Personal campaigns of that kind always end in failure. You can not successfully assail a President for violating the law when your chief objection, as made by the Senator from Maryland, is that he enforced the law in the merger case. The high character and distinguished public services, the courage, and honesty of President Roosevelt are known to the American people. On those, too, we await the verdict of November with entire confidence.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I do not desire to make a set speech this evening, but I wish to say a few words in regard to the statements made by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. It is not my purpose to speak against this appropriation bill. The bill, with the exception of a few items in it, has my approval. I wish to say, however, that I do not agree with the junior Senator from Massachusetts in some of the statements he has made.

Now, in regard to the extra session of Congress, if any member on this side of the Chamber opposed that extra session of Congress, I have never heard of it. But if the newspapers speak correctly, the leaders of the Republican party on the other side of the Chamber labored day in and day out with the President to prevent the extra session of Congress.

The Senator also states that when the Cuban bill was pending before the Senate, this side of the Chamber objected to taking a vote at the extra session of Congress on that measure. I believe that the junior Senator from Massachusetts will find that that statement is incorrect.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly certain the statement is not incorrect.

Mr. CLAY. I am certain the Senator from Massachusetts is incorrect. I think it can be demonstrated that the proposition came from the other side of the Cnamber that we adjourn and that we vote on a certain day in the regular session of Congress, and there is a Senator on this floor who knows it is absolutely correct. The proposition came from the other side of the Chamber that they desired to adjourn and go home at once; and the proposition was made that if this side of the Chamber would consent to it, there would be a vote on a certain day in the regular session of Congress, and it prevailed.

Now, my friend the junior Senator from Massachusetts also tells us that the Democratic party is very restless. He says we did not want any extra session of Congress and that now we are anxious to stay here. Personally I would be glad to get away, but if we have a duty to perform we ought to stay here and perform it. The Senator says that we want to stay here for the purpose of getting up an issue. I could reply and say that Senators on the other side desire to get away in order to keep down an issue, to keep the books from being opened and the truth from being known. I could say that with as much propriety as the other statement was made by the junior Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, I did not rise upon this occasion for the purpose of making a speech. Yet, in regard to the investigations which have been referred to, let us be frank and honest with each other. When that resolution was introduced by my friend the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], asking Congress to make an investigation, it came back here, and the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Maryland met with his hearty approval, and he accepted it. That resolution was debated on this floor for four or five days, and the statement was made on the floor of the Senate that there had been an agreement to let the resolutions go to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and they would receive favorable consideration. These resolutions have been there since December, and it has been impossible to get them back into the Senate.

Let us see whether or not there ought to be any further investigation. I do not hesitate to say it is the duty of Congress to keep in touch with all the Departments of this Government and to know how every dollar that is appropriated to carry on this Government is expended. We ought to know whether or not the Government of the United States is building her ships as cheaply as private parties can build them. We ought to know whether the Post-Office Department in purchasing supplies is buying them as cheaply as private parties can buy them.

We ought to know whether or not the $70,000,000 spent for the War Department every year is spent for the best service of our country. This applies to a Republican Administration; it applies to a Democratic Administration. It is the duty of Congress to investigate at least every two years the Departments of the Government to see if we have economical and honest service. I maintain, Mr. President, that nothing produces more economy than vigilance upon the part of Congress to see that the public expenditures are economically made.

Now, let us see whether or not the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General thought there ought to be further investigation. You take the First Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Heath, and I do not intend to do him injustice. I have never in my life intentionally done a man injustice. What are the charges that are made against him? If they are false, he ought to have the privilege of showing it; if they are true, he is a guilty man and deserves the fate that Mr. Machen has received.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. MALLORY. The Senator refers to the ex-First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. CLAY. I refer to the ex-First Assistant Postmaster-General—not Mr. Wynne, for I esteem him most highly as an honest and upright man. Let us get at what the ex-Assistant Postmaster-General was charged with:

(1) A printed circular from the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General required all post-office employees to give bonds, to be furnished by a single surety company designated in the circular.

Named by Mr. Heath.

I lay down the proposition that the Post-Office Committee ought to know why this particular company was named and why all the employees were required to go to this company for the purpose of giving security. The employees of that company ought to be brought before the committee, and Mr. Heath ought also to be brought before the committee, and we ought to know whether any employee of the Post-Office Department received anything from this surety company by reason of this special favor. I say the Senate ought to take three months, if it is necessary, to go to the bottom of every fraud connected with his office.

Now, that is not all.

(2) By order from the First Assistant Postmaster-General the cashier of the Washington City post-office was required to pay to one J. Holt Livingston the price of furniture said to have been purchased for use in Cuba and Porto Rico, although Livingston admitted to the postmaster that he had not even yet begun to manufacture the furniture.

Again:

(3) Mr. Heath ordered the employment of one Oliver H. Smith as "laborer" in the Washington City post-office, and yet caused him to be paid as though for clerical services, and to be promoted to the position of "finance clerk" at $1,700 a year.

That is not all.

(4) Mr. Heath ordered the employment of eight females as charwomen, or cleaners, in the Washington City post-office, but instructed the postmaster that their names should not appear on the pay rolls, and that they were not expected to report for duty.

Also:

(5) Mr. Heath caused the transfer from other post-offices of many clerks to the Washington City post-office, without request from the Washington City postmaster and without need for their services in that post-office, and instructed the postmaster to "consult" with one of these clerks, a Mr. D. G. Miller, and arrange hours of duty which would be "satisfactory" to him—Miller.

Again:

(6) Similar favoritism was shown, by Mr. Heath's orders and for personal reasons on his part, to one George C. Clavis, jr., another clerk in the post-office.

(7) Mr. Heath secured the appointment to office or promotion as "finance clerks" and "auditors," in several cases at salaries of $1,600 and $1,700 per annum, of a number of persons whose names are given and who at no time performed duties appropriate to such offices, in direct violation of the law and rules relative to classification of clerks.

Again, if you will take this report and read it through, and I do not desire to discuss it at length this evening, you will find that the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Bristow, says:

First. The discussion of the "Tulloch charges" has revealed the existence of deplorable and gravely discreditable abuses during the years 1898, 1899, and 1900 in the Washington post-office and the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Now, what else does Mr. Bristow say? The inference to be drawn is that Mr. Heath has escaped indictment because of the statute of limitations, if you will read the report.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me a moment?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a letter dated March 2, from the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department. A part of it is as follows:

What I intended to say this morning was that if the evidence had warranted the indictment of Mr. Heath owing to his former high position in the Department I would have been glad to have seen him take his medicine like the others, but that it was my deliberate judgment then, as it is now, that the evidence did not warrant his indictment. In other words, that all the evidence before the Department amounted to a suspicion only, and was not of such a nature as to warrant the finding of an indictment against Mr. Heath. There was certainly no disposition on the part of anyone connected with the Department to shield Mr. Heath or anybody else, and had there been a case against him he would have taken his medicine along with the rest.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from West Virginia is the only champion thus far the ex-Assistant Postmaster-General has had on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask the Senator to kindly correct that. This is from the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department.

Mr. CLAY. Then I correct it, and I say that the ex-First Assistant Postmaster-General has not a single champion on the floor of this Chamber. There is no one to come to his rescue and defend him under the facts and charges in this case.

Mr. SCOTT. He does not need any defense according to the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department.

Mr. CLAY. He does not need any defense! He does not need any defense, when this report shows that the First Assistant Postmaster-General had appointed a man by the name of Louis chief of the supply division, a division to purchase all the supplies, at a salary of $1,700 per year. No, he was not appointed to that position.

Mr. SCOTT. Why did they not indict him, then, if that is true?

Mr. CLAY. One minute. Listen to me, if you please. I want to say to the Senator that this report shows that the First Assistant Postmaster-General was exceedingly anxious to have in control of the division that supplied the Post-Office Department a man in perfect sympathy with him. He could not appoint Mr. Louis to that office because he was not under civil service. What did he do? He went immediately and appointed him cashier of the post-office in Kansas City, at a salary of $2,000 per year. He never did go there. He never spent a day in the post-office in Kansas City. He stayed here in Washington and purchased supplies, on a salary of $2,000 per year, when it appears that he was cashier in the post-office in Kansas City. He stayed here for some time. Mr. Heath said to the postmaster in Kansas City that the Civil Service Commission knew of this appointment. This report says so. This statement was not true.

If you will turn to these contracts you will find that Mr. Louis changed many of the contracts for supplies after he got charge of this office, and increased the rate from 20 to 75 per cent.

Now, it is a very interesting story. I tell you you may jump on Bristow, and some of us have been very angry with him, but he has done a work that I appreciate. But the work ought to be carried on.

It appears from his report that the Department was paying 16 cents a pound for ink. They were buying good ink from a responsible firm. This man Louis came, and he was working under Mr. Heath. He was Heath's appointee. He knew that when the bids were received the same company tried to furnish good ink at 16 cents. Another company bid 20 cents. He let a contract for that ink at 30 cents a pound.

I maintain that the Post-Office Committee ought to have sent for the firm that furnished the ink at 30 cents a pound. They ought to have sent for Mr. Heath and all the employees, and we ought to have known why the price of the ink was advanced from 16 to 30 cents per pound.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator believe that the statements which he is now quoting from Mr. Bristow's report are true?

Mr. CLAY. Why, I say this——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course the Senator can accommodate me by answering that question.

Mr. CLAY. I have no reason to doubt the report being true. I do not know anything about it, because I have not had anything to do with it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator doubt it?

Mr. CLAY. I have read what the report says from the beginning to the end, and I have taken it for granted that the statements were true. I will say this to the Senator: If they are not true, they utter a malicious and gross slander against Mr. Heath, and he ought to have the right to defend himself before the committee.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator have any doubt about their correctness? He has been quoting from them pretty copiously.

Mr. CLAY. I have stated to you my views.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator said he had no doubt of it. It therefore appears that what the Senator wants us to do is to investigate an investigation which he admits to be correct.

Mr. CLAY. In answer to that let me say to the junior Senator from Indiana that the report shows that Louis took the highest priced ink and paid 30 cents for it, but there is no proof going to show why he did it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. One moment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I want to ask a question right there. Does the Senator deny that?

Mr. CLAY. Do I deny what?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The statement he has just quoted.

Mr. CLAY. I do not.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator admit it?

Mr. CLAY. I do admit it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well. As I said, that leaves the Senator in the position of wanting us to investigate an investigation which he now admits to be correct.

Mr. CLAY. If the junior Senator from Indiana had just kept quiet there would have been no trouble to answer.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Go ahead.

Mr. CLAY. In the first place, the report shows that he paid 30 cents for ink when the Department had been getting practically the same ink for 16 cents. It stops there. I maintain that we ought to send for the men who furnished the ink at 30 cents a pound and their clerks, and that we ought to send for the employees of the Post-Office Department, and we ought to ascertain why it was that the contract price was increased from 16 to 30 cents per pound, and find out whether or not anything was paid to any of the employees by reason of increasing the price of the ink nearly 100 per cent.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. SCOTT. Is it not currently reported that the reason for changing the ink was that the ink at a lower price when used on the stamps could be washed off and the stamps reused; so that ink was put out and the other ink purchased?

Mr. CLAY. I will state to the Senator from West Virginia that Mr. Bristow says in his report that really the ink he bought at 16 cents a pound was superior to the ink he bought at 20 cents and 30 cents a pound.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. In one moment. I will say also that Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General Bristow charges in his report that in order to buy a large quantity of ink even the First Assistant's employees burned up and destroyed a large quantity of ink on hand.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, I hope it will not interrupt the Senator if I ask him a question.

Mr. CLAY. Not at all. I am always glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask the Senator again as to this particular statement which he makes from the Bristow report, whether he believes it to be true or not true.

Mr. CLAY. I do not see the point.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, perhaps the Senate does, or I think it will. Does the Senator admit that the statement which he quotes from the Bristow report about ink and every other item is correct?

Mr. CLAY. Well, I say this to the Senator: If Mr. Heath's office purchased ink at 30 cents a pound and at 26 cents a pound, believing it was a superior ink and that the other ink was unfit for use, then that would free him from any dishonorable conduct. If, on the contrary, he purchased the same kind of ink, paying 30 cents for it when they had been paying only 16 cents, it is the very highest evidence that there was something improper in the transaction.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, he is quoting statements from an investigation which he indorses. Therefore I put the question to him again that I put twice before, whether or not he believes the statements which he quotes from the report to be true? If he does, then his position is the position of a Senator asking the Senate to investigate an investigation which he himself indorses.

Mr. CLAY. I will state to the Senator my position. Admit that the report as far as it goes every word of it is true, and of course you are bound by it. I say the report ought to go still further. It ought to probe to the bottom, and we ought to be permitted to show why we paid out in one year $100,000 more for the same supplies than we paid the previous year, and of the same quality. Now, I say to my friend from Indiana that your friends, Conrad and Bonaparte, special counsel appointed to make this investigation, were just as well satisfied of the guilt of the First Assistant Postmaster-General from their standpoint as they were of the guilt of anyone else.

I do not know whether Mr. Heath is guilty or not. I simply read the charges made against him by your appointee, the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, and the evidence furnished. Your special committee of lawyers to investigate this case say:

> We very respectfully recommend that a thorough investigation be ordered, if it has not been already ordered, of the administration of the Washington post-office, of the administration of the New York post-office, and of the administration of the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General within the past three years.

Mr. Bristow said he ought to be investigated further; Conrad and Bonaparte said likewise; the President of the United States said likewise; the testimony shows that he ought to be investigated. But no one on the other side of the Chamber will vote to have him investigated.

My friend the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] corrected a statement made by him. He did not intend to make it. It is true that every member of the minority of that committee has insisted that this investigation ought to be made.

Now, I do not think we ought to make the investigation simply for political purposes; but I insist that if we want to perpetuate our free institutions, we must have honest and economical government. I was taught fifteen years ago—nay, twenty—when a member of the legislature of my State, that an investigation annually into our receipts and expenditures was in the interest of good government.

I believe in an investigation by Congress of the Post-Office Department, of the Navy Department, of your Land Department, of Indian affairs every two years. Let a committee take months and make such investigation and report to Congress, and such work will always result in good government.

My friend from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] said a man with clean books, a man with clean hands, ought never to refuse to have his books investigated. I want it distinctly understood that much of the valuable information I have been able to obtain leads me to believe that hundreds of thousands of dollars were paid to employees who were representing the Government and who purchased supplies at unreasonable prices. Much of that valuable information came to me by the efforts of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General.

I tell you these investigating resolutions have a most peculiar history. We began here in December for the purpose of investigating the Post-Office Department. I do not know whether or not it is true, but I have been informed by the newspapers that instead of Congress investigating the Post-Office Department that Department is having Congress investigated. We were then about to investigate the Post-Office Department, and we are told that the charges had been made up against Congress long before we had ordered this investigation.

I say if Mr. Heath has been wronged we ought to right the wrong. I stand here to-day and say if Mr. Heath vindicates himself Mr. Bristow is a slanderer and ought to be turned out of office. I do not know whether or not Mr. Heath is guilty. I make no charges. I repeat what has been said and say that we ought to have the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

Mr. President, it applies to Democrats as well as Republicans. I stand here and announce to-day that fraud is just as liable to take place in one Administration as in another. It often does. It is the duty of the Republicans to watch the Democrats and see that they do no wrong. It is the duty of the Democrats to watch you. In a government like ours political parties are absolutely essential to honest government. I have no patience with a public man who is simply investigating to find charges to advance his own political party. A man who will stand upon this floor and denounce another as guilty of theft and as guilty of fraud simply for the purpose of advancing his own political interest or the interest of his party is unworthy of holding this high position.

But these investigations ought to be had with a view of finding out the truth. They ought to be made fearlessly. They ought to be made vigilantly. They out to be made honestly, with a desire to find nothing but the truth.

I beg the pardon of the Senate. I had not the remotest idea of occupying more than a few minutes. Some time later I will address the Senate again in regard to the post-office bill. There are only a few items in the bill that I shall desire to discuss. I will do it when we get to them in the reading of the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I should like the attention of the Senator from Georgia just a moment. It has never been my purpose to regard a man as being guilty until he has been proven so by a jury of his countrymen. Mr. Heath may be all that the Senator from Georgia pictures him to be or says that Mr. Bristow pictures him to be. I quote here from a part of the record of Mr. Beach, a well-known attorney. I have no doubt the Senator from Georgia knows him. Mr. Beach says:

> That the evidence had all been before the grand jury, such as it was, and that no member of the grand jury had said anything to him about indicting Perry S. Heath, and that he would not again bring it to their attention.
>
> It should be borne in mind that all the evidence in this case in any way involving Mr. Heath had been presented to the grand jury; and had that body been so disposed, an indictment might have been voted and the district attorney requested to prepare it.

Now, Mr. President, it appears that all the evidence was before the grand jury, that the foreman of the grand jury was a lawyer, and that these attorneys decided that they had no case against Mr. Heath; and until Mr. Heath has been proven by a jury of his countrymen to be a scoundrel and a thief I shall regard him, as I always have in the past, and in an association of twenty years, as being an honest man.

Mr. CULLOM. By leave of the Senator from Pennsylvania who has charge of the bill before the Senate, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Illinois withhold that motion for a moment?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

CONDUCT OF IMPEACHMENT TRIALS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to make a motion for an amendment to the rules. The rule requires that notice of such a motion shall be given the day beforehand, but I should like to make a motion now in order that it may be printed—the motion is in writing—and referred to the Committee on Rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to present at this time a motion to amend the rules. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. HOAR proposes to amend the rules for the conduct of impeachment trials by adding after Rule XI the following:

"In all cases of the impeachment of any officer other than the President of the United States, or the Vice-President of the United States, or any officer upon whom the powers and duties of the office of President of the United States shall have devolved, the trial shall proceed as follows:

"The Senate will hear an opening statement from one of the managers of the impeachment on behalf of the House of Representatives, who may be designated for that purpose either by the House or by a majority of the managers, if it shall be desired by either.

"It will then hear an opening statement on behalf of the accused by himself or one of his counsel, if he shall so desire it.

"The case shall then be referred to a committee of nine Senators, to be appointed by the Chair, who shall proceed to take all the testimony on both sides as soon as may be, and report the same to the Senate. The times and places of sitting shall be such as ordered by the Senate.

"Said committee may sit during the sessions of the Senate or in vacation, and the regular sessions of the Senate shall not be interrupted by its procedure. The committee shall cause all the testimony by them heard to be reduced to writing and reported to the full Senate. It shall determine all questions of the admissibility of testimony and shall report all objections thereto and its determination thereon when the testimony is complete.

"The Senate shall thereupon proceed to the determination of the case after hearing both sides. If it shall be claimed that any testimony was improperly excluded, the Senate shall first determine such question, and in such case may recommit the case to the committee, that it may hear and report such testimony, or may direct the testimony to be received at the bar of the Senate, if it shall see fit. If it shall determine that any testimony was improperly received, it may order the same to be stricken from the record before the final argument of the case. The trial shall thereafter proceed as heretofore provided."

The proposed amendment modifies Rules VII, XV, XVII, and XX of the rules concerning impeachments so far as they require all the proceedings to be before the Senate itself, and the purpose is to shorten such proceedings and make them more convenient.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to add one word in explanation, the design of this amendment of the rules is to provide that all testimony may be taken before a committee of the Senate instead of being taken before the Senate itself, reserving the right to submit to the Senate on a report questions of the admissibility or exclusion of witnesses; that if testimony be improperly excluded, then to send the case back to the committee to hear it at the bar, but that all arguments shall be before the full Senate, and in other respects the proceedings to go on as now provided.

Now, Mr. President, if I may be permitted to add one word, which I did not intend when I rose, I will say that it is evident the Senate is in danger of being confronted by a very great public inconvenience hereafter. Suppose, for instance, that some President of the United States should direct half a dozen marshals in different parts of the country to do something that would be regarded by the two Houses of Congress as unlawful. Perhaps the evidence of the order could not be produced so that the President himself could be impeached. We might have half a dozen impeachment trials coming on at the same time, breaking up for an entire year the legislative business of this country. We might have an officer in a court whom it was desirable to get rid of so promptly that we might break up the whole of a short session of the Senate. As things are now in this great country we might have two or three officials guilty at the same time. There has already been a time when four judges of the United States courts were reported for impeachment in the same year, but they all resigned. That was after the war.

Mr. SCOTT. I will suggest that I have no doubt what the Senator from Massachusetts is saying is very interesting, but we can not hear a single word of it here.

Mr. HOAR. I think it is perhaps better that the Senator from West Virginia did not hear it, for if he had I fear he would not have thought it so interesting. [Laughter.]

I only wish to add one other statement. This suggestion comes from the practice of the law committee of the House of Lords, from whom we get all our precedents in judicial proceedings before this body. I am not aware that any impeachment trial in the House of Lords has ever been committed to a committee, although I am not sure whether that be the case; but, as everybody knows, all the great questions of law which that great court decides—coming up from all the courts, coming from Scotland, and all the cases that come from the colonies, except those which go to the privy council—are referred to the law committee of the House of Lords, usually consisting of perhaps three or four lords only.

I do not feel sure that an examination of this whole plan by the lawyers of the Senate may not disclose some difficulty or defect in it which would make it impracticable; but it seems to me that it is worthy of careful consideration by the Committee on Rules of the Senate, and now is an especially opportune time to change our rules on the subject, if we are ever going to do so, for reasons which it is unnecessary to suggest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the presentation of his motion to amend the rules may be made now and referred to the Committee on Rules. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion will be received and so referred.

Mr. TELLER. And printed.

Mr. HOAR. Yes; and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made, in the absence of objection.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, does not object, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PENROSE. I will yield to the Senator for that motion.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 31, 1904, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 30, 1904.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. HEMENWAY, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. BURTON in the chair) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 14416, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SURVEYING THE PUBLIC LANDS.

For surveys and resurveys of public lands, $400,000, at rates not exceeding $9 per linear mile for standard and meander lines, $7 for township, and $5 for section lines: Provided, That in expending this appropriation preference shall be given, first, in favor of surveying townships occupied, in whole or in part, by actual settlers and of lands granted to the States by the acts approved February 22, 1889, and the acts approved July 3 and July 10, 1890, and, second, to surveying under such other acts as provide for land grants to the several States, except railroad land grants and such indemnity lands as the several States may be entitled to in lieu of lands granted them for educational and other purposes which may have been sold or included in some reservation or otherwise disposed of, and other surveys shall be confined to lands adapted to agriculture and lines of reservations, except forest reservations, and lands within boundaries of forest reservations, except that the Commissioner of the General Land Office may allow, for the survey and resurvey of lands heavily timbered, mountainous, or covered with dense undergrowth, rates not exceeding $13 per linear mile for standard and meander lines, $11 for township, and $7 for section lines, and in cases of exceptional difficulties in the surveys, where the work can not be contracted for at these rates, compensation for surveys and resurveys may be allowed by the said Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, at rates not exceeding $18 per linear mile for standard and meander lines, $15 for township, and $12 for section lines: Provided further, That in the States of California, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Utah, Washington, Wyoming, the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, and the district of Alaska there may be allowed, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, for the survey and resurvey of lands heavily timbered, mountainous, or covered with dense undergrowth, rates not exceeding $25 per linear mile for standard and meander lines, $23 for township, and $20 for section lines; the provisions of section 2411, Revised Statutes of the United States, authorizing allowance for surveys in California and Oregon, are hereby extended to all of the above-named States and Territories and district.

And of the sum hereby appropriated there may be expended such an amount as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may deem necessary for examination of public surveys in the several surveying districts, by such competent surveyors as the Secretary of the Interior may select, or by such competent surveyors as he may authorize the surveyor-general to select, at such compensation not exceeding $6 per day, and such per diem allowance in lieu of subsistence not exceeding $3, while engaged in field examinations, as he may prescribe, said per diem allowance to be also made to such clerks who are competent surveyors who may be detailed to make field examinations, in order to test the accuracy of the work in the field, and to prevent payment for fraudulent and imperfect surveys returned by deputy surveyors, and for examinations of surveys heretofore made and reported to be defective or fraudulent, and inspecting mineral deposits, coal fields, and timber districts, and for making by such competent surveyors fragmentary surveys, office examination of surveying returns, and such other surveys or examinations as may be required for identification of lands for purposes of evidence in any suit or proceeding in behalf of the United States.

Mr. RODEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting, after the word "States," in line 18, page 76, the words "and Territories." I think these words have been omitted inadvertently.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. RODEY. I understand that a point of order applies only to a provision changing existing legislation, and I do not understand that a mere appropriation bill making appropriations from year to year is existing legislation in the sense of the rule, because one appropriation only takes effect at the end of a fiscal year, after the previous bill has died a death of limitation.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I call the attention of the gentleman to this fact——

Mr. LACEY. Before the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] proceeds, will he allow me to make an explanation?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman from Indiana, as I understand, bases his point of order upon the fact that there have been no land grants to the Territories. That is true as to every Territory except New Mexico. Owing to the long time that elapsed before New Mexico was admitted to the Union, a special act was passed making the land-grant provision applicable to New Mexico, notwithstanding its Territorial character. I think, therefore, that the words "and Territories" ought to go in there to meet the situation in that particular Territory.

Mr. RODEY. I move the same amendment in line 19, after the word "States."

Mr. LACEY. The language might be amended so as to read "States and the Territory of New Mexico." That is the only Territory to which the provision need be applied.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this amendment changes existing law. I submit that there is no law authorizing surveys under the act which provides land grants to the Territories.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that the question what is the existing law may have an important bearing as to the proper ruling in this case. As the Chair understands, this provision for surveys is in furtherance of a public work or object now in progress. Does that include for surveys the Territories as well as the States?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I understand not. It might include the Territory of New Mexico, but it does not include the Territories in general.

Mr. RODEY. In my amendment I had in view only the case of New Mexico. If the word "Territories" be used, it will not affect the other Territories, because no other has a land grant. That is my information—that there is no other Territory having a specific land grant such as New Mexico has. There are land laws applying to Arizona, and perhaps Oklahoma as well, but not of the scope of the act of 1898, granting lands to New Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. RODEY] state whether the Territory of New Mexico is now excluded from the operation of the law?

Mr. RODEY. The language of this paragraph as reported by the committee would exclude New Mexico because it refers only to "States." I will say to the Chair and to gentlemen of the House that on June 21, 1898, New Mexico had a very extensive grant of land given it by Congress, and more of the character of work described is to be done there than in many of the States.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will ask the gentleman if there has been any difficulty in having the work done heretofore?

Mr. RODEY. I do not know that there has been any particular difficulty, save that we have not had it done as fast as we want it, because the States have had the work done to our exclusion, every time, for lack of funds, and I thought I would have it affirmatively appear in this act if possible, so that we could not be left out, as the Territories always are when their necessities conflict with those of the States.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] desire to be heard further?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have nothing further to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The question seems to be in some doubt as to what is existing law; but this provision merely gives a preference, in the carrying on of this public work, to certain localities, and it would not seem that a provision in the nature of this amendment would do any harm, unless there are land grants or other classes of lands to which this provision will apply. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think there is no objection to the amendment.

Mr. RODEY. I suppose there is no objection to the other amendment; it is in the same line.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the two amendments will be considered as adopted.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all the powers now exercised by the Court of Private Land Claims in the approval of surveys executed under its decrees of confirmation shall be conferred upon and exercised by the Commissioner of the General Land Office from and after the 30th day of June, 1904.

Mr. RODEY. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that paragraph just read is subject to the point of order as being new legislation, but if it is going to stay in the bill I wish to offer the following amendment.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, before the discussion begins I reserve the point of order myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana reserves the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. RODEY. I will ask to have my amendment read, if the Chair please.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Mexico will understand that if the amendment is now presented it can be read for information merely.

Mr. RODEY. Yes, sir; I so understand.

The CHAIRMAN. Pending the decision on the point of order.

Mr. RODEY. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 79, line 13, after the word "four" add:

"Provided, That after such date all the books, records, plats, papers, and archives of said Court of Private Land Claims shall be deposited by said court in the office of the surveyor-general of the Territory of New Mexico, from which official duly certified copies of any portion of the same may be obtained on payment of the legal fees therefor."

Mr. RODEY. Mr. Chairman, the reason for that amendment is this: The Court of Private Land Claims will die a death of limitation on the 30th day of next June. The paragraph inserted here, which my amendment or addition is offered to, justly and properly confers the duties of that court upon the Commissioner of the General Land Office after that date, so that he, with equal authority, may wind up any little business that may remain to be done in the way of approving surveys, etc., within the purview of the jurisdiction of that court.

I have a bill, sent me from home within two or three days, which I was about to introduce, to provide that the records of that court be left at Santa Fe with the surveyor-general.

Gentlemen will appreciate that nearly all of the business of that court relates to land grants in the Territory of New Mexico, and that the records consist not only of the court dockets, but also of all sorts of Spanish archives and muniments of title, on which the court acted when it confirmed the claims or dismissed the applications for these grants. Therefore people from New Mexico will want continually to examine these records and to consult them from day to day, and many of them are of such a character that it would cost this Government a large amount of money to make translations and transcripts of them, while if citizens living in the vicinity can go and examine them they will not need either translations or transcripts, and can avoid the consequent cost and get what they want in much less time.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Where are they now?

Mr. RODEY. They are now in the court of private land claims at Santa Fe, in quarters provided by this Government, in a Government building. This amendment provides that they shall be placed with the surveyor-general of New Mexico, from whose office most of the records originally came, and which now has custody of the Spanish and other archives of the Territory. When this land court was organized, the archives of the surveyor-general were by act of Congress made evidence to be used before it, and they were filed there. Then plats and surveys were made, evidence was taken, records made, etc., and the land was segregated from the public domain after decree of confirmation. All of that procedure is valuable and indispensable information to the people in that vicinity and to the owners of the grants and others. Of course these records will still be in the custody of the Government, in the office of its Surveyor-General, subject to his control, and it can be considered that they will be, in fact, in the control of the Land Department of the United States.

There are transcripts already in the General Land Office here of nearly everything done in the Court of Private Land Claims; but these records mentioned in this amendment are the original papers, under which the title to land has been given to individuals, and they are continually necessary for examination by our people and for use in our courts. If you carry them away and bring them to Washington there will be transcripts required, with all the concomitant expenses necessary in securing them again in the Territory. I submit to the House that this amendment ought to carry, and these records ought to remain where they actually belong and where they can be used and are mostly needed.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, of course if the amendment is offered I will make the point of order. My judgment is that all papers in regard to these land claims should be filed at the proper place, with the Commissioner of the General Land Office. If duplicate sets of these papers are necessary, they should be filed with the surveyor-general of New Mexico; but certainly it would be a great mistake to allow these original papers to be filed with the surveyor-general of the Territory of New Mexico. They all belong to the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office here in the city of Washington.

It would be strange if we were to divide up our papers on public lands and scatter them around in the different Territories and States. We do not know what kind of a building they are kept in out there. They may be destroyed by fire. If they want a duplicate, the duplicate can be furnished from the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in the city of Washington.

Mr. OTJEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. OTJEN. Were they originally kept here in the Land Department?

Mr. RODEY. No; they have always been kept in Santa Fe, and originally in the surveyor-general's office. This is the first effort to take them away.

Mr. HEMENWAY. These papers were transferred to the court of private land claims that has been out there deciding these cases. That court goes out of existence by limitation on the 30th day of June, and of course these papers must be disposed of.

Now, the proper place for them to come is the Land Office in Washington, and then if it is necessary to file duplicate sets in the Territory of New Mexico they can be filed there. It certainly would not be proper to allow the original papers to remain there. They belong in the Land Office. I shall not discuss the merits of the case, and I shall insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the point of order is asserted to the paragraph and the amendment of the gentleman?

Mr. HEMENWAY. No; I do not want to get into the trouble that we experienced yesterday. I reserved the point of order. I do not oppose the provision because this legislation is in here, which all concede to be good and necessary legislation, but I do not propose to let it stay in if there is to be attached the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. RODEY. I will not insist on my amendment if the gentleman will let the remainder stay. I want the rest of it to stay. It is proper legislation; but I ask the gentleman to allow the amendment to be considered too.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question to decide is the point of order raised to the paragraph.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman will withdraw his amendment, I will not insist on the point of order; but if the amendment is to be offered, I shall insist on the point of order.

Mr. RODEY. I will withdraw my amendment if the gentleman will not insist on his point of order, as the paragraph without my amendment is proper and necessary legislation for our Territory.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order and the amendment are both withdrawn. The Clerk will proceed with the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

For necessary expenses of survey, appraisal, and sale of abandoned military reservations transferred to the control of the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 5, 1884, and any law prior thereto, including a custodian of the ruin of Casa Grande, $6,000.

Mr. BARTLETT. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask that I may proceed for ten minutes, as I may not conclude what I desire to say in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

[Mr. BARTLETT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I do not think a five-minute debate is any time to discuss outside subjects. I think we ought to confine ourselves to the bill, and therefore I simply wish to contradict the misrepresentation which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] makes and which, it seems to me——

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman uses the word "misrepresentation." I desire to know what the gentleman means by that.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I am going to explain it.

Mr. BARTLETT. But the gentleman ought not to use such a word as requires explanation.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not use the word in any offensive way.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman must not use the word in an offensive way.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I must tell the truth.

Mr. BARTLETT. But, Mr. Chairman, I would not insist upon it, but the gentleman can not say it is the truth that I made any misrepresentation.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is a friend of mine. I do not wish to use language which is offensive to him. I do not mean at all that he intended to misrepresent me. I will say this, that the gentleman does not fairly represent what I said—unintentionally, I have no doubt.

Mr. BARTLETT. That will do.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. If that is any better.

Mr. BARTLETT. That will do.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I wish to be courteous always.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I shall explain why he did not. The gentleman stated that I said the Caucasian race was no better than the negro race. If the gentleman will read my language, he will find that I never uttered any such sentiment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, may I read what the gentleman said?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No; the gentleman can not at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to yield.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I never intimated—I think the gentlemen who listened to me will bear me out in the statement—and I certainly never would intimate that I do not believe the Caucasian race is superior to the negro race. Of course, I recognize the superiority of the Caucasian race; I suppose everybody does. All I said was—and I think any gentleman of fairness who will take the trouble to read what I said will acknowledge this—that what is to determine the relative grade of any class of people, if distinctions are to be made, is merit, not race. Of course, I believe, as everybody knows, the Caucasian race as a whole is vastly superior to the colored race; but I do not believe it follows that every white man is superior to every colored man. I think there are some colored men who are superior morally, intellectually, and physically to some white men, and in such cases I think it is preposterous to contend that the white man is still superior just because he is white. The statement which the gentleman made that I said——

Mr. BARTLETT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Not now. The statement which the gentleman put in my mouth I do not suppose was intended to misrepresent me; but he did say that I declared that the Caucasian race is not superior to the negro. I wish to deny having made that statement. The gentleman certainly misunderstood me if he thought I made any such statement.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I read what the gentleman said?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not want to take up the time of the House in that way. I certainly believe that anyone who heard my remarks or has read them as published knows that the tenor of my remarks was not in accordance with what the gentleman has stated. I have just repeated what I intended to say and what I believe I did say, and what is now and always has been my view on this question.

As to the statement of the gentleman that there was some mob in Massachusetts, I remember something about it, now that he reads the statement from a newspaper; but I think I said the other day what I repeat now, that I denounce just as thoroughly any such incident in Massachusetts as I do in the South. I stated, and I repeat now, that one of the reasons for my regret at the frequency of such occurrences in the South is that they do stimulate similar occurrences all over the country. If I allowed myself to imitate the gentleman from Georgia and occupy ten minutes here in order that every such incident in the South might be put in the RECORD, I am afraid the session of this Congress would have to be much prolonged.

Mr. CRUMPACKER and Mr. BARTLETT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] is recognized.

Mr. BARTLETT. I wish that I may be permitted for just a few minutes——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has been recognized. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Georgia later, when it may be in order to do so.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I believe it is the sentiment of all thoughtful people throughout the length and breadth of the country that the law is supreme. But during the last twenty-five years there have been over 3,000 mob executions in this country. More than 3,000 citizens of the United States, entitled to the protection of the Constitution and laws of the country, have been seized by lawless mobs and put to death.

Mr. MADDOX rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not feel that I ought to.

Mr. MADDOX. I am not asking the gentleman to yield. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman's parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MADDOX. I want to know whether this discussion is to go on. If so, I want to take a hand in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that whether the discussion shall proceed depends upon the disposition of the committee. The question of the gentleman from Georgia is not strictly a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MADDOX. If this thing is to go, I shall insist on occupying some time upon it. I would not care myself to bring up this question or to say anything about it. But I make the point of order now that the debate should be confined to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order must be sustained.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. BARTLETT. To make a request. I desire that I may incorporate in my printed remarks the articles referred to in my speech. I do not propose to insert anything in relation to anything else. I simply desire to quote in my published remarks the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts in his former speech and also to call attention to these different occurrences in the States.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by the insertion of certain papers or articles. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that a point of order was made upon this discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was made that the discussion was out of order; and the Chair sustained the point of order.

Mr. MADDOX. I want to withdraw that point of order, inasmuch as my colleague [Mr. BARTLETT] precipitated the matter here; but I will make it on the next speech of this kind.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to indulge in the discussion of this question more than to say that I believe the best people of the country are a unit in desiring to have the law enforced everywhere. Mob law is not sectional. I confess with regret that the record of the last twenty-five years will show that my own State has had its full share of these disgraceful exhibitions of a lack of self-control on the part of the people. It simply illustrates to some extent a weakness in human nature. Human nature is a good deal the same throughout the whole country.

Now, my purpose, Mr. Chairman, was to have read in my time an editorial from the Nashville American, one of the ablest papers in the South, denouncing mob violence. I do this for the purpose of justifying the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and the statement of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] that mob violence is contrary to the prevailing sentiment in all parts of the country. I send the editorial to the Clerk's desk to be read. It should be heard by every Member of the House.

The editorial referred to, from the Nashville American, Wednesday, March 16, 1904, is as follows:

THE BRUTAL WHITE.

Not long ago Governor Vardaman succeeded in preventing the lynching of a negro in Mississippi. But there was a lynching in that State that for fiendish brutality has not yet been surpassed, even when the victims have been roasted at the stake. It occurred at Doddsville recently, and these are the circumstances as related by local newspapers: Luther Holbert, a negro, had a quarrel with a white man, and, following the usual Mississippi method, they exchanged shots, the negro escaping and the white man being killed. The negro, knowing the penalty for killing a white man in that section, fled, of course accompanied by his wife, who had had no part in the quarrel. They were captured by the mob, and this is what was done to them according to the statement of an eyewitness in the Vicksburg Herald:

"When the two negroes were captured they were tied to trees, and while the funeral pyres were being prepared they were forced to suffer the most fiendish tortures. The blacks were forced to hold out their hands while one finger at a time was chopped off. The fingers were distributed as souvenirs. The ears of the murderers were cut off. Holbert was severely beaten, his skull was fractured, and one of his eyes, knocked out with a stick, hung by a shred from the socket. Neither the man nor woman begged for mercy nor made a groan or plea. When the executioners came forward to lop off fingers, Holbert extended his hand without being asked. The most excruciating form of punishment consisted in the use of a large corkscrew in the hands of one of the mob. The instrument was bored into the flesh of the man and the woman in the arms, legs, and body and then pulled out, the spirals tearing out big pieces of raw, quivering flesh every time it was withdrawn."

After these tortures the mutilated bodies were burned. Had this negro outraged a white woman? Oh, no; he had merely killed a white man who was shooting at him. His wife had committed no crime, but simply fled with her husband. Yet she was made to share his fate and with him to suffer the most cruel and brutal tortures the devilish ingenuity of the degraded savages could devise. The Vicksburg Herald truly says: "If there is any hell, and if it is the abode of devils, they must have turned green with envy of the genius of their brethren on earth."

"White men," the members of this mob call themselves. They were brutal, cowardly curs who are a disgrace to civilization, a dishonor to the human race. These miserable savages doubtless regard themselves as respectable citizens in their community. Perhaps they are. Then what a community it must be! Think of any State in the Union in this twentieth century containing a community of white men capable of producing such brutes, such barbarians, such savages as these.

The red Indians, whom we dispossessed of this country, in all the bloody history of cruelty and torture, were never guilty of more savage cruelty than this. The negroes, in their most bestial state of voodooism, could be guilty of nothing more savage and brutal. The white man is given to much boasting, but in many instances he is but a thinly veneered savage who shows his capacity and his disposition to descend rapidly to the depths. But for the restraining influence of organized society and the law this class of whites would soon descend to savagery. The conduct of mobs shows this. The more frequent the mob the more brutal becomes its conduct, the more savage its excesses, the nearer the general approach to anarchy and barbarism.

It would seem that even men of dull and muddy minds, men who have no high thoughts or worthy conceptions, who read little and think less, could see this and appreciate the fact that in observance of the law lies safety for individuals and for society. The mob feeds upon its own brutal instincts. Yesterday it sought only to hang negro ravishers of white women, and organized society, moved by intensity of sentiment rather than guided by clear, cold judgment, rather winked at it. To-day the mob mutilates, dismembers, hacks to pieces, bores into their bodies with corkscrews, and burns the bodies of negroes for offenses which, in some cases, do not amount to a misdemeanor. In this instance the negro man had killed a white man in a fight, and the negro woman had done nothing except to stand or to flee with her husband. It is high time for thoughtful, decent people to ask, Where is this thing to end?

The Southwestern Christian Advocate, published at New Orleans, says of this latest exhibition of unrestrained savagery in Mississippi: "We believe firmly that the Vardaman gubernatorial canvass is at the bottom of this heart-sickening affair. Mr. Vardaman wanted to be governor, and in order to attain his wish he went in to convince his fellow-citizens that the negro is, if anything at all, less than human. Many who heard him were too glad to have him say it. They turned from the speaker convinced that the negro is unworthy of consideration, and has no rights which they need respect."

Governor Vardaman can not escape the terrible responsibility for his utterances. He may be sincere in his views. So also were the New England witch burners. Vardaman took an easy method of popularizing his candidacy for governor among the cheap whites by inflaming them against the negro, and this was made easier by Roosevelt's action in the Indianola post-office affair. Vardaman as governor will find it difficult to suppress mobs which he encouraged as a candidate, and which he still encourages as a mouthing politician. It is such men as he, mere surface skimmers of logic, who deeply stir the brutal passions which find expression in such sickening and savage conduct as that of the Doddsville horror.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DALZELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 13740. An act for the relief of the Western Alaska Construction Company's Railroad.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 8681) to detach the county of Linn, in the State of Missouri, from the western and attach it to the eastern judicial district of said State.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 63.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to cause a survey to be made of the Mermentau River, from its headwaters at the junction of Bayous des Cames and Nez Grand Lake (including those portions of Lake Arthur, Grand Lake, and White Lake lying directly across its course), to a point in the Gulf of Mexico beyond the bar at its mouth, with a view of ascertaining the cost of securing a permanent channel to a depth of at least 20 feet.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5188. An act for the relief of the L. S. Watson Manufacturing Company, of Leicester, Mass.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the reestablishment, by permanent and conspicuous monuments, of the west boundary line of the State of South Dakota, the same being the boundary line between the State of South Dakota and the States of Wyoming and Montana, an estimated distance of 206 miles, at a rate per mile to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, $20,000.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana proposes an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 80, at the end of line 8, insert ", to be immediately available."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Yellowstone National Park: For the administration and protection of the Yellowstone National Park, to be expended by and under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, including $2,500 for maintenance of buffalo, $7,500.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves to strike out the last word of line 8, page 84.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I notice that these various parks of the United States generally have but one executive head, but when we come to Washington the Rock Creek Park is under a commission. The head of the Rock Creek Park Commission is the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, and receives the salary of that station in the Army. It is so with reference to the Yellowstone Park, where Maj. John Pitcher, United States Army, is in charge, receiving the salary of that station in the Army.

The Yosemite Park is in charge of Maj. Joseph Garrard, United States Army, who receives the salary of his station in the Army. The same is true with reference to the parks in California, which are in charge of Capt. Charles Young, United States Army; the Mount Rainier Park, which is in charge of Grenville F. Allen; the Crater Lake Park, which is in charge of William F. Arant, and the Hot Springs Reservation, in charge of Martin A. Eisele, the superintendent.

But when we come to the city of Washington we find the Rock Creek Park Commission. The chairman of that commission is the Chief Engineer of the United States Army. The Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia is a member of the Commission, and in addition to these two executive heads we have three additional gentlemen, and the point of my inquiry is directed to them.

Why is it that you have here three additional commissioners for Rock Creek Park, in opposition to the general organization of our national parks? We find Samuel P. Langley, at $10 a day, a member of the Rock Creek Commission; Henry V. Boynton, at $10 a day, a member of the Rock Creek Commission; R. Ross Perry, at $10 a day, a member of the Rock Creek Commission—a useless commission in Washington to take care and custody of this park, where it is not needed; a commission highly expensive and purely ornamental, not provided for any of the other national parks throughout the country. Why this favoritism? Why this lavish waste, wholly indefensible? Why does Rock Creek require, in addition to an executive chairman and vice-chairman, three commissioners, except to provide a soft sinecure at $10 a day for three men? Will Congress longer submit to this imposition? Are the siren voices of place holders to weigh against duty with the Appropriation Committee or with Congress? Are the legislators charged with protecting the public interest to be seduced from their duty because perchance some one loses a place that he draws two or three thousand a year salary for and for which he renders no service? If glaring frauds like this system are to be perpetuated because officeholders want to continue to draw public pay for no equivalent, we had better close up the session of Congress and go back and find out how the taxpayers feel about it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will state to the gentleman from Indiana that the Rock Creek Park Commission is created by law. The bill passed Congress some years ago creating that Commission. Of course the Committee on Appropriations have nothing to do with the passing or amending of that law, and we appropriate in compliance with it. I understand the gentlemen mentioned, General Boynton and others, are men of high character and of special information——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. There is nothing against the character of these men, but it is a useless expenditure, and Congress should repeal the law. No doubt the gentleman is correct in stating the fact as to the existence of the law, but the onus is upon Congress and upon the Committee on Appropriations to strike out this useless appropriation, a waste of $ 0 a day of the people's money.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I would say rather it is the duty of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] to introduce a bill to repeal this law, if he thinks the law is wrong.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But under the peculiar system of the House it is in the power of the Committee on Appropriations to strike out useless appropriations, even although the Commission is authorized by act of Congress.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman will permit, the Committee on Appropriations can not undertake to determine what is good law and what is bad law. If we did we would have a great job on our hands.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But the gentleman puts items into the appropriation bills sometimes subject to points of order, and in many instances abuses are corrected and reforms accomplished.

Mr. HEMENWAY. We appropriate as nearly as we can in compliance with the law. Now, if the gentleman thinks the law is not a good law it would be proper and right for him to undertake in the regular way to bring about its repeal.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But the gentleman with his colleagues do provide for new laws in the interest of reform in appropriation bills, and if he should make one at this time this is one that will not be objected to, in my judgment, nor the point of order be made, if he should deem it proper to put it in this appropriation bill. I present this inviting field for reform to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sequoia National Park: For the protection and improvement of the Sequoia National Park and the construction and repair of bridges, fences, and trails, and extension of roads, to be expended under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, $10,000.

Mr. BAKER. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, two days ago a very interesting colloquy took place on this floor between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. HEMENWAY. May I interrupt, Mr. Chairman, so as to inquire as to what is pending?

Mr. BAKER. I moved the formal amendment, which is customary.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I would suggest to the gentleman that inasmuch as notice was served that no discussion would be permitted except the discussion allowed under the five-minute rule, after the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] addressed the committee, I hope the gentleman will not undertake to bring in matters not pending in the bill. I will say to the gentleman that after this bill is passed there will be several measures before the House upon which there will be ample opportunity to discuss such questions as he may desire to discuss upon this bill. I do not like to make the point of order, and I hope the gentleman will not offer any matter except something that is pertinent to the pending bill.

Mr. BAKER. It is a singular thing that the "gentleman from New York" seems to be the only person on this floor that never can get an opportunity to speak under the five-minute rule. It is the most remarkable thing, Mr. Chairman, ever experienced by the "gentleman from New York."

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why, I would suggest to the gentleman that I had to make the point on my colleague [Mr. CRUMPACKER] just a few moments ago.

Mr. BAKER. I was not present and was not aware of that fact. The purpose for which I rose was to insert in the RECORD a communication I have received from the Interstate Commerce Commission this morning which bears directly on the colloquy between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Missouri, and to make a few words of comment thereon.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why not insert it in the RECORD by unanimous consent?

Mr. BAKER. I will, if the chairman of the committee will permit me to make some little comment on it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Does the gentleman want about two minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist upon the point of order?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think I had better.

Mr. BAKER. May I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether he will object to my putting in the RECORD the communication I received from the Interstate Commerce Commission and a little comment of my own?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that under general leave permission is granted.

Mr. BAKER. I wish to make some comment on the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD certain reports and comments thereon. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and leave is granted.

Mr. BAKER. The report in the RECORD is as follows:

Mr. OLMSTED. The gentleman is aware, doubtless, that steel rails are higher now than before the present tariff bill was passed.

Mr. CLARK. Well, I suppose they are.

I should hardly have thought that the gentleman from Pennsylvania would have been so anxious to thus call attention to the effectiveness of the steel trust, which, sheltered behind the exorbitant schedules of the Dingley bill, is thus able to extort higher prices for its steel rails. The report continues:

Mr. OLMSTED. And wages are higher.

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. And yet the railroad rates are lower.

Mr. CLARK. The volume of business is greater and, therefore, the profits are greater. What have you got to say to that? [Laughter.]

Mr. OLMSTED. There is an increase in the price of rails, an increase of wages, but notwithstanding all that your farmer pays a lower rate of transportation by about 12½ per cent than he did before.

The trouble with the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] is that he has transposed the facts. Instead of wages being higher, they are certainly lower than they were during the heyday of these so-called "prosperous" times, while so far from the farmer paying 12½ per cent less transportation charges to the railroads he is paying very much more, as I will show, according to the statement which I have this day received from the auditor of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

This statement shows that Mr. CLARK's claim that the volume of business of the railroads is greater is correct. But more than that, it shows that freight rates have also been increased, so that the people paid to the railroads in 1901 $81,600,000 more for the transportation of freight than they would have paid if the same rate had been charged as was charged in 1899.

In 1902 they paid sixty-four and one-half millions more, while in 1903 they paid one hundred and fifty-five and one-half million dollars more. Or, in other words, instead of freight rates being 12½ per cent less, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania claims, through increased freight rates the railroads charged $300,000,000 more, the excess for the year ending June 30, 1903, being about 13⅛ per cent over what would have been collected if the total tonnage of that year had been carried at the same average freight rate as was charged in 1899. These have, indeed, been "prosperous" years, but, as the House will see, the prosperity has been absorbed by the gentlemen who control the great railroads and the trusts of the country.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that the farmers have paid a lower rate by 12½ per cent, and yet, according to this statement of the Interstate Commerce Commission, on hay carried within the territory to which the official classification refers there has been an average increase of about 80 cents per ton. This increased charge on that very important farm product has amounted to something over $9,000,000. Will the gentleman contend that that $9,000,000 of increased transportation charges benefits the farmer, or does it benefit the gentlemen who ontrol the great railroads, who are, as everybody upon this floor knows, the same men who control the leading trusts in the country and who have been so lavish in their contributions during recent years to Republican campaign funds? Another item of freight in which the farmer is certainly vitally interested is that of the transportation of bituminous coal, in which, according to this statement, there has been an increase in charges of 10 cents per ton, the railroads thus securing an increased revenue of over $10,000,000.

Take, again, the item of lumber, in which there has been an average increase of 2 cents per hundred pounds, or 40 cents per ton, on which the railroads have collected in these increased freight charges some $8,000,000. Is that for the benefit of the farmer?

As the reports show, the apparent slight reduction of the average rate per ton for 1902 as compared with 1901 is really no reduction at all, but is due to the heavy increase in low-grade tonnage, 30,000,000 tons more of coal, coke, and ores being carried than during 1901. But even then the excess of freight charges over 1899 netted the railroads $64,500,000. In common with other prices, freight rates increased from 1897 to 1900. Since 1900 they have, as I have shown, still further increased.

As to the question of wages being higher than they were at the time of the passage of the Dingley bill, it may be technically true that there is a slight nominally higher wage paid to-day than at that time, but their purchasing power is lower, and that increase, whatever it is, is very small and is but a very small proportion of the enormous increase in the cost of living, brought about by the trusts sheltered by the Dingley bill.

Dun's Review, the recognized authority on this subject, recently published comparative prices based upon quotations of 350 articles, with due allowance of the relative importance of each. From which it will be seen that the increase in price from July 1, 1897, to February 1, 1904, was from $72,455 to $102,028. During February of this year there has been a further increase, so that the figures on March 1 were $103,615. In other words, the cost of the necessities of life have been increased 43 per cent.

Here are the figures for the periods stated:

January 1, 1890	$99,191
July 1, 1897	72,455
January 1, 1900	102,289
May 1, 1902	95,295
March 1, 1903	101,067
October 1, 1903	97,378
February 1, 1904	102,028
March 1, 1904	103,615

Not even the most enthusiastic protectionist will claim that there has been an increase of wages during that period of half 43 per cent, while since January 1, 1904, there have been marked reductions in wages of all classes of employees, not excepting those employed by the railroads, who are charging these greatly increased freight rates.

As I showed to the House on December 14, 1903, very general reductions in wages had taken place all over the country during the previous three months. These have been continued since January 1, not a week passing without prominent newspapers recording reductions. I will only cite a few.

[From the New York Times, December 30, 1903.]

Report current Jones & Laughlin Steel Company, employing several thousand men, notified employees reduction in wages from 33 to 50 per cent and an increase of from eight to twelve hours.

[From the New York Times.]

PITTSBURG, January 1.

Three thousand employees of Edgar Thomson Steel Works accepted reduction in wages. Tonnage men receive the heaviest cut, i. e., from 12 to 22 per cent.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, January 4, 1904.]

Reduction by Carnegie Steel Company of rollers' and heaters' wages from $2.72 per hundred tons to $1.74. Men willing to accept reduction to $2.

[From the New York Times.]

The reduction in wages average 42 per cent and is greater than the reduction made in 1892. Shearmen from $2 cut to $1.10.

[From the Washington Star, January 14.]

The Illinois Steel Company notified skilled steel workers of cut in wages from 25 to 45 per cent.

[From the Washington Star.]

CHICAGO, January 18.

Three thousand five hundred employees Illinois Steel Company returned to work to-day. Men accept a reduction in wages from 10 to 28 per cent.

[From the Brooklyn Eagle.]

PITTSBURG, March 19.

American Sheet and Tin Plate Company issued an ultimatum, unless 20 per cent reduction agreed to mills will be run on nonunion basis, and demand of manufacturers reduction conceded by Amalgamated Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers. New scale for reduction averages 8 per cent, in addition to 10 per cent cut on January 1, equal to 18 per cent in scale 1903-4.

[From the Washington Post.]

INDIANAPOLIS, March 21.

United Mine Workers and operators signed new scale to-day. No change from original proposition of operators. Reduction, 5.55.

The reduction in wages of the steel workers is interesting in view of what Judge E. H. Gary, chairman of the executive committee of the steel trust, said on November 20, 1902:

Speaking for the greatest corporation in the world, I can say that, in spite of the thousand questions of economical production and distribution which press upon us, our first concern is the welfare of our workingmen.

I can say that honestly. Never for a moment do we lose sight of the interests of the men who work our steel mills, mines, railways, or boats. We have more than once advanced wages. It is to our interest to be just to our employees.

In my opinion there are good times and good conditions in prospect for them.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR,
Washington, March 30, 1904.

Hon. ROBERT BAKER, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to telephone conversation of yesterday, I inclose herewith statement and copy of my letter of December 19, 1903, addressed to Mr. E. P. Bacon, Milwaukee, as requested. The statement is not precisely the same as the one sent to Mr. Bacon, owing to recent revision. The only difference, however, is that the tonnage and revenue for the year ending June 30, 1899, have been included in the inclosed statement, and the increase for the subsequent years based on the average rate per ton for the year ending June 30, 1899, instead of for the year ending June 30, 1900, the latter being the basis used for statement sent to Mr. Bacon. The difference in the average rate per ton for these two years, however, is very small, that for 1899 being 95.20, and for 1900 95.24 cents per ton.

Respectfully, yours, J. M. SMITH, Auditor.

Statement showing the total number of tons of freight carried by the railroads of the United States for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1899, 1900, 1901, 1902, and 1903, with the total revenue accruing therefrom; also the revenue which would have accrued at the average rate of 95.2 cents per ton for the years ending June 30, 1900, 1901, 1902, and 1903, this being the average rate for the year ending June 30, 1899, and the increase in the revenue for the years 1900, 1901, 1902, and 1903, resulting from the increase in the average rate per ton for those years.

[Prepared by Interstate Commerce Commission.]

Year ending June 30—	Number of tons of freight carried.	Total freight revenue as charged.	Amount of freight revenue at average rate per ton of 95.2 cents, being the average rate for year ending June 30, 1899.	Increase.
1899	959,763,583	$913,737,155	$913,737,155	----------
1900	1,101,680,238	1,049,256,323	1,048,799,587	$456,736
1901	1,089,226,440	1,118,543,014	1,036,943,571	81,599,443
1902	1,200,315,787	1,207,228,845	1,142,700,629	64,528,216
1903	1,221,475,948	1,318,320,604	1,162,845,102	155,475,502

The figures given for the year 1903 represent about 98 per cent of the total mileage.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR,
Washington, December 19, 1903.

Mr. E. P. BACON, Milwaukee, Wis.

DEAR SIR: Referring to our conversation when you were in Washington in November last, regarding advances in freight rates, I very much regret that I have been unable to furnish you the information desired at an earlier date.

I inclose herewith a revised statement intended to take the place of the one sent you with Commissioner Clements's letter of September 15. This statement is based on the actual tonnage carried for each of the years shown, and, I think, makes a more correct showing than the previous statement. The actual tonnage and revenue are shown, and also what the revenue would have been for the years ending June 30, 1901 and 1902, at the average rate per on charged for the year July 1, 1898, to June 30, 1899.

It will be seen that the increase for the year ending June 30, 1901, on this basis is $81,163,753. For the year ending June 30, 1902, while the tonnage and revenue were both greater than for the previous year, the difference is not so great, being $64,747,890. This is due to the fact that the average rate per ton for this year ($1.0458) was a little over 2 cents per ton less than the preceding year ($1.0693). This falling off in the average rate per ton appears to be due to a heavy increase in low-grade tonnage over the previous year. For instance, in the items of coal, coke, and ores alone there was an increase for this year over the preceding year of nearly 30,000,000 tons.

As I understand it, what you desire most is an estimate as to the increased revenue on a few important articles, such as hay, sugar, iron and steel articles, and coal, resulting from advances in rates.

In the official classification, which governs the class rates in the territory north of the Ohio and Potomac rivers and east of the Mississippi River and Lake Michigan (not including Wisconsin and a small portion of the extreme northern part of Illinois), both hay and sugar in carloads were advanced January 1, 1900, from sixth to fifth class. Between New York and Chicago this advance amounts to 5 cents per 100 pounds, or $1 per ton. Between New York and the territory lying between that point and Chicago the advance would be less—in some cases as low as 40 cents per ton—while in the territory west of Chicago and east of the Mississippi River the advance would be in some cases as high as $1.40 or $1.50 per ton. An average advance of 80 cents per ton on these two commodities in official classification territory, I think, is a fair estimate.

When here, I believe you mentioned that the report and opinion of the Commission in the case of the National Hay Association gave total tonnage of hay for the entire country for the year ending June 30, 1900, as something over 7,000,000 tons. I find that this report (p. 284) gives the figures as follows:

	Tons.
Reported by originating roads	4,112,092
Reported received from connecting roads	3,721,714
	7,833,806

It is clear that the tonnage reported by originating roads constitutes the total tonnage, and that reported as received from connecting lines is part of the same tonnage, carried over two or more roads.

The total tonnage of hay reported by originating roads for the years ending June 30, 1900, 1901, and 1902 was as follows:

	Tons.
1900	4,112,092
1901	4,086,700
1902	4,981,509

It is calculated from the statistical reports of the Commission that of the total tonnage carried by the railroads of the United States about 65 per cent is carried in the territory governed by the official classification above described. Taking the total tonnage of hay for the last year mentioned, 1902, viz, 4,681,509 tons, 65 per cent, or the amount carried in official classification territory, would be 5,042,980 tons. Taking 80 cents per ton as the average increase in rate would make the increase in revenue for that year $2,434,384, and for the four years (nearly) during which the advanced rates have been in force no thing over $9,000,000. There was no advance in the classification of hay in the southern and western classifications.

The total tonnage of sugar originating on reporting roads for the years in question was as follows:

	Tons.
1900	2,050,578
1901	2,301,932
1902	2,254,571

Sugar was advanced at the same time as hay (January 1, 1900) and to the same extent, viz, from sixth to fifth class, the increase between New York and Chicago being 5 cents per 100 pounds or $1 per ton. Taking 65 per cent as the proportion of the total tonnage carried in official classification territory, we have for the year ending June 30, 1902, 1,465,571 tons. Taking the average advance to be 80 cents per ton, the increase in revenue for that year would be $1,172,456, and for the four years (nearly) during which the advanced rates have been in force about $4,500,000. In the western classification no advance was made in the classification of sugar, while in the southern classification it was advanced from sixth to fifth class. In the latter territory, however, sugar shipped from the regular shipping points, such as New Orleans and Mobile, is almost invariably carried at commodity rates. It does not appear that any general advance has been made in these rates, and recently material reductions have been made.

At the time the carload rating of hay and sugar was advanced (January 1, 1900) the carload rating on about seventy other articles was also advanced from the sixth to the fifth class in the official classification, but there is no way of arriving at even an estimate of the tonnage of these articles, and no estimate can, therefore, be made as to the increased revenue resulting from the advance in classification of such articles.

At the beginning of the present year all iron and steel articles were advanced 10 per cent in the territory governed by the official classification. The statistical reports of the Commission do not appear to include all iron and steel articles in the table, which gives the separate tonnage for particular commodities. The report for the year ending June 30, 1902, gives the following articles of iron and steel, and tonnage of same, originating on reporting roads:

	Tons.
Iron, pig and bloom	14,714,989
Iron and steel rails	4,849,255
Other castings, and machinery	9,6 6,433
Bar and sheet metal	10,624,712

Machinery is not included in the list of iron and steel articles and does not take same rates. The third item as given above must, therefore, be eliminated. The total of the other three items is 30,188,356 tons. Taking 65 per cent of this as the tonnage carried in official classification territory, we have 19,622,821 tons. The advance ranged from one-half to 1½ cents per 100 pounds. The average was probably about 1 cent per 100 pounds, or 20 cents per ton. Assuming the tonnage for 1903 to be about the same as for 1902, the increased revenue for the present year on these commodities will be about $4,000,000.

The total tonnage of bituminous coal for the year ending June 30, 1902, was 134,402,501 tons. There appear to have been few changes in the rates on this commodity in southern and western territory. In the territory of the official classification advances have been made which probably will average 10 cents per ton. Again taking 65 per cent of the entire tonnage as the amount carried in this territory, we have 100,361,625 tons. As will be seen, an advance of 10 cents per ton gives an increased revenue of a little over $10,000,000.

In June of the present year the rates on lumber and other forest products from all lumber-producing points in the southern territory east of the Mississippi River to Ohio River points and points north thereof, also from points in Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas to the same territory, were advanced 2 cents per 100 pounds. For the year ending June 30, 1902, the total tonnage of lumber and other forest products was 67,700,050 tons, of which about 20,000,000 tons originated in the territory above described. An advance of 2 cents per 100 pounds, or 40 cents per ton, would, therefore, be $8,000,000.

The above estimates are made from the best information at hand, but would probably vary considerably from the actual figures were they obtainable. As I understand it, however, you merely wish to get a fair idea as to the effect of the advances in rates on principal commodities, and I think the estimates given will answer this purpose.

If there is any further information I can furnish you, I shall be glad to do so.

Respectfully, yours, J. M. SMITH, Auditor.

The Clerk read as follows:

For improvement and ordinary care of Lincoln Park, $2,000.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last word. May I ask the gentleman from Indiana a question? As the gentleman himself knows, the beauty of the grounds around the Capitol has been considerably increased by reason of the fact that the trees are now labeled. Now, the city of Washington probably has the greatest and finest collection of trees that are to be found anywhere in the world outside, possibly, of some special gardens or grounds devoted particularly to the purpose. I think if all the trees in the city of Washington could be named, so that visitors here who are interested in such subjects might be able to tell the names of the trees they are looking at, it would be a very valuable and interesting thing.

I understood a short time ago, from Doctor Galloway, of the Agricultural Department, and also from the superintendent of public buildings and grounds, that these trees in the parks and in the Mall, and so forth, were to be named. Can the gentleman tell whether there is any possibility of that under the bill as it stands?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have heard about the proposition to name the trees. The gentleman in charge of public buildings and grounds spoke about the matter of improving the parks. I agree with the gentleman that it would be a very proper thing to do, and I have no doubt they can do it under this provision.

Mr. MANN. You think the matter covers it now, do you?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not know whether the matter did cover it. [After a pause.] The Chairman will pardon me, on page 92, in line 17, I see a provision for "labels," so they can put labels on the trees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Executive Mansion: For care, repair, and refurnishing of Executive Mansion, $35,000, to be expended by contract or otherwise, as the President may determine.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if that appropriation is sufficient? The estimate was $60,000, and I would like to ask him if $35,000 will fill the necessities of the White House?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, the President advises me that the estimate of $60,000 was sent down without his knowledge or approval by the officer in charge. The President thinks $35,000 is ample for the purpose, and I desire to state that the President does not ask for any new stable of any kind or description.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Improving channel in Gowanus Bay, New York: For continuing improvement of Bay Ridge and Red Hook channels, $175,000.

Mr. BASSETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to speak about the improvements in New York Harbor. I had hoped that this appropriation would be somewhat larger, but the most striking decrease of an estimate is the sum granted for continuing the work on Ambrose Channel, a few lines farther on. The estimate was $600,000 and the appropriation is $50,000. Careful inquiry has elicited the information that the reason for this enormous cut is because considerable unexpended money is on hand. But it is plain that either the word has gone out to retrench to make a show of saving or else the Government has allowed gross and wasteful delay in pushing this work. The truth is that this work, as well as the work on the Bay Ridge and Red Hook channels, has progressed far too slowly. Not only is this unfair to the harbor, but it is uneconomical to the country, because it is a very great interest loss on the capital already invested.

In the long run the best economy for all is in following the lines of least resistance. When a country is the fortunate possessor of the most magnificent port in the world, natural, capacious, midway between the icebound waters of the north and the tropical heat of the south, it is right for the whole country to see that the small expense necessary to maintain it is ungrudgingly given. New York receives and exports about two-thirds of all the goods that come into and go out of the United States, to say nothing of its being the terminus of nearly all the coastwise trade. The chief engineer in charge of the harbor work says in his last report:

The entire cost of improvement of New York Harbor up to date is less than 1 per cent of the increase in annual value of foreign commerce of the port since the improvement began, and is less that one-quarter of 1 per cent of the value of the present foreign commerce per year.

This harbor and the metropolis that surrounds it is one of the great arms of power of this nation. Nature made it great, because nature placed this unusual harbor opposite the lowest grades leading from the Atlantic into the interior. Every State is helped by its progress. It grows as the country grows. There should be no jealousy. New York desires the prosperity of every State and is not lacking in generosity. It only asks for itself a modicum of the nation's aid. But some things it can not do, some functions it can not perform. Chief among these are harbor improvements, which must be done by the National Government or else not done at all. To maintain the usefulness of this harbor the State of New York is beginning the expenditure of more than $100,000,000, nearly as much as the completion of the Panama Canal is estimated to cost. New York is not lying back or trying to induce the Government to do anything that it can do itself. Proportionately to its commerce and to its usefulness to the country, its demands are most modest and should, when r ea sonable, be cheerfully complied with.

Cheaper dockage facilities are the present need. Freight is running more and more to big ships. Manhattan Island is already lined with docks, most of them much too small for the big ships on account of the contracted pierhead line. The whole country is interested in seeing lower dockage charges in New York Harbor. In my district, opposite the South Brooklyn shore, are some of the largest piers in the world and more are building. They abut on the channels here referred to. They mean low dock charges. To make this great area, now only partly utilized, properly available for commerce, a breakwater on a shoal about one-third of a mile off shore is requisite. I have introduced a bill looking to the construction of this breakwater, which I trust will receive favorable consideration by this House. These improvements are all in the same line, and that is to make the harbor available for the largest ships and by spreading out to reduce the cost of wharfage.

France has been taxed for centuries to embellish Paris; modern Germany has poured money into Berlin, its beautiful capital; but New York, the metropolis of America, asks and receives nothing except a moderate improvement of her waterways, which under the law are under the sole control of the Federal Government, and suitable buildings, not for her own use, but for the Government to transact its local business. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Toledo, Ohio: For continuing improvement, $70,000.

Mr. SCARBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read:

Amend line 6, page 100, by inserting:
"Improving Waccamaw River, South Carolina: For special improvement of Waccamaw River, South Carolina, between Conway and Bucksville, in Horry County, $15,000.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. What does the gentleman from South Carolina say with reference to this being work that is authorized by existing law?

Mr. SCARBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I call the Chairman's attention to the fact that the amendment which I offer stands as an independent proposition and is not designed to be an amendment to that section relating to river and harbor improvements under the act of 1899.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand the gentleman from South Carolina to say that this improvement is included in one of the river and harbor bills for which there is an authorization?

Mr. SCARBOROUGH. The Waccamaw River is not under the contract system, but the amendment which I offer stands as an independent section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that under those circumstances there is no question but that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. SCARBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I would like the Chair to state on what ground it is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The river and harbor bill alone provides for authorizations of appropriations for rivers and harbors. The sundry civil bill simply makes provision for such improvements as are authorized and placed under contract by the river and harbor bill.

Mr. SCARBOROUGH. I understand that to be the rule, but I understand also, Mr. Chairman, that the sundry civil bill does also sometimes carry independent propositions.

The CHAIRMAN. At no time, at least as far as any action of the House is concerned. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Chair can answer the question better than anyone else. Is there going to be any river and harbor bill reported this session? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that there is a diversity of duties devolving upon him, one as Chairman of this present Committee of the Whole House and the other as chairman of the committee having something to do with legislation of the House, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. The Chair will answer the question of the gentleman from Missouri some time when he is on the floor acting as chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the two chairmen are mighty close of kin.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Boston, Mass.: For continuing improvement by providing channels 35 feet deep, and of authorized widths, from the navy-yard at Charlestown and the Chelsea and Charles River bridges to President Roads, and thence by route designated as No. 3 through Broad Sound to the ocean, $350,000.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I will send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 100, line 14, strike out the word "three" and insert the word "six;" so that it will read "$650,000."

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana reserves the point of order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Chairman, I desire on this paragraph, to which I have offered the amendment, to say that I find the original estimate offered by the Engineer's Department is $650,000. I have failed to get any information from any quarter as to why that estimate was cut down. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that on June 13, 1902, two years ago, there was appropriated $600,000, and a provision continuing contracts for $3,000,000 in addition, for the harbor of Boston to make a channel 35 feet deep.

Though Boston is the second commercial city in this country, its harbor at the present time is incapable of accommodating the largest steamers, and on the basis of the appropriation laid down by this committee, instead of that channel 35 feet deep being finished in some three years it will not be finished for some ten years from now, and by that time our harbor will not be able to accommodate the steamers of the depth which will be building at that time.

As a matter of fact, if this system of dragging work is continued we might as well abandon the improvements altogether and allow Boston to be relegated to the position of an inferior port.

I should like to have some gentleman from the Committee on Appropriations or from any other committee explain to me why it is that the engineering department of the United States, when it has money appropriated for the work of doing this great and necessary improvement in a harbor of a great commercial city such as Boston, can not speedily carry on that work and do it in accordance with the wishes of the business and commercial community. I call attention to the fact that the gain in the export trade of Boston during the past ten years is very small and that proportionally to the other ports we are losing. One of the reasons undoubtedly is the neglect of Congress in the past in not increasing the depth of the harbor to keep pace with the great increase in the tonnage and displacement of the great trans-Atlantic steamers, and as many of the largest steamers of the present can not enter our harbor owing to an insufficient depth of water, they have naturally gone to the port which can accommodate them—New York.

The figures just published by the Department of Commerce and Labor tell the story. They show that during the calendar year 1903 the exports from the port of New York were $516,000,000, which is an increase in exports of $158,000,000 over 1893. Boston, during the calendar year 1903, had exports of but $86,000,000, this being an increase of but $3,000,000 over 1893. The comparative showing made by Boston is pitiable. No doubt many explanations of this condition of affairs can and will be made, but the fact remains that one of the main causes is the inadequate depth and facilities of our harbor. Our condition in this respect is even worse than is generally believed. We are supposed to have a depth in our present main ship channel of 27 feet, but only last year a vessel took ground in this channel a little outside of Fort Warren at 24 feet. Probably by this time this shoal or ledge has been removed.

While we are making our tortoise-like progress toward improvement, we find that New York has a depth at present of 35 feet in her ship channel, and within a few years will have a ship channel with a depth of 40 feet. At our rate of progress we will only secure a depth of 35 feet some eight or ten years from now. The tendency in ocean shipbuilding is toward larger and deeper ships, as with the increase in cargo capacity comes a proportionate decrease of expenses. Boston now gets only the second-class ships and New York gets the first class. Meanwhile, during the slow progress of the work in our harbor, New York will continue to attract the first-class boats, and, at the present rate of progress, by the time our 35-foot channel is finished the best boats will demand a greater depth of water and Boston will continue to get only the second-class boats. In other words, the object of the improvement of the channel, which was to give facilities to the largest and best boats, will not be realized, owing to the slowness of the work and the small amounts expended from year to year.

Boston, in order to be in the race at all for the export trade, or for the import trade either, should have a depth of water in her main ship channel equal to that of New York. Anything less will make our port inferior and will keep it so. Boston is slow in demanding its rights. The engineers of the War Department recognize this fact and treat the port accordingly. The truth of this statement can be shown by an examination of the different treatment given Philadelphia and Boston since 1902.

The present bill is an instance in point. It carries an appropriation of but $350,000 for the improvement of Boston Harbor channels, while for the improvement of the Delaware River at Philadelphia the pending bill carries an appropriation of $1,000,000. The estimate of the engineers for Boston, I understand, was $650,000, and this has been cut down to $350,000; but I fail to find that there has been any cut down on the engineers' estimates for Philadelphia. Why this difference? The reason is that the engineers are pushing the work on the Delaware River and are lagging on the work at Boston.

An examination of the appropriations for the past two years shows that the work at Philadelphia is being pushed forward with about twice the speed of the work in Boston. Here are facts. The appropriations for the making of a 35-foot channel in Boston Harbor and 30-foot channel in the Delaware River at Philadelphia were made by the river and harbor bill of June 13, 1902. This act appropriated for B ston the sum of $600,000 for immediate use, and provided in addition $3,000,000 to be expended by the Secretary of War in continuing contracts. The same act appropriated for Philadelphia $600,000 for immediate work, and provided in addition $2,400,000 to be expended by the Secretary in continuing contracts.

It is extremely difficult to ascertain the exact status of any continuing appropriations from any of the appropriation bills brought into this House, as the facts are never clearly stated.

I have ascertained, however, from the Engineer's Department that there has been appropriated for Boston since June 13, 1902, only $1,025,000, which, with the $350,000 carried in this bill, will make the total $1,375,000 to date, and that there has meanwhile been appropriated for Philadelphia $1,400,000, which, with the $1,000,000 carried in this bill, will make the total $2,400,000 to date. In other words, there will be expended on the Delaware River in improvements $2,400,000, as against an expenditure of only $1,375,000 in Boston Harbor for the same time.

What is the reason for this difference? The reason is that the interests of Boston in the last Congress were not pushed by our Massachusetts Congressional delegation as were the interests of Philadelphia by the Pennsylvania delegation. The engineering department was slow in Boston, and was allowed to remain so; in Philadelphia it was pushed, and has continued to be pushed.

Since the appropriation of $3,600,000 for Boston was secured in June, 1902, nobody has lifted a hand to push the work. Every effort should have been made to rush the completion of the improvement and to demand a deeper channel, no less than 40 feet. The Philadelphians have not been idle. They have caused the engineers to push the improvement, and in this session of Congress we find them demanding more. The Pennsylvania delegation have introduced bills to have the Delaware River channel deepened to 25 feet, and they have sought the aid of the New Jersey and Delaware delegations for that purpose. The Philadelphia commercial and business bodies have met and passed resolutions in favor and have submitted them to Congress. The Philadelphia papers have taken hold enthusiastically, and each Member of Congress receives daily a Philadelphia paper which keeps constantly before his mind the desire of that port for a deeper channel.

The result will be that when the short session of Congress convenes in the winter the Pennsylvania delegation will claim and probably obtain an additional appropriation, as their money will be used up, while the Massachusetts delegation will be told to wait, as they have a good unexpended balance. The Pennsylvania delegation, backed as it will be by the New Jersey and Delaware delegations, will get the additional appropriation, in all probability, and, at the present rate of progress in Boston Harbor, will obtain a 35-foot channel before Boston. Unless the Massachusetts delegation does far more energetic work and are backed up by the business associations and the press, Boston, with one of the finest natural harbors in the world, will not only remain behind New York as regards facilities for the handling of the great steamships of the future, but will fail to maintain her present superiority over Philadelphia.

In other words, we will fall behind in the race. Boston has yielded more in revenue to the United States Government than any other port, with the exception of New York, and has received less in Government appropriations than even the ports of Savannah, Ga., or Galveston, Tex.

Now, in this bill we find Boston cut down to $350,000. I should like to ask some gentleman of this House why the appropriation is cut down, and why the Engineer Department can not use the money which is available for its use, and if that department makes an estimate of $650,000, why is not that amonnt granted by the committee?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, in this bill for every single river and harbor improvement the committee has given the exact amount recommended by the Chief of Engineers. When the original estimates were made for the information of Congress in advance of the time when this bill was to be reported to the House large amounts were inserted, as is customary. Later the committee asked the Chief of Engineers to tell them what amount of money was necessary for each of these improvements, and the Chief of Engineers sent in his estimates, which we follow to the letter.

For the improvement now under discussion there will be on June 30, 1904, $306,000. To that we add an appropriation of $350,000, making $656,000 in round numbers available for improvements at Boston Harbor during the next fiscal year. The Chief of Engineers has advised us that this is all the money that will be necessary, all the money that can be expended there during the next fiscal year.

Mr. McNARY. Will the gentleman kindly explain to this House where that sum of $306,000 which he mentions comes from? Does it come from money appropriated last year which the Engineer Department did not expend in Boston?

Mr. HEMENWAY. There have been appropriated at different times for this improvement, which is limited in the aggregate to $3,000,000, different sums of money. Out of the sums heretofore appropriated there will be remaining on June 30 of the present year $306,000. To that we add $350,000, making alt gether $656,000.

Mr. McNARY. As a matter of fact that is not so. The gentleman surely knows that the document which he has in his hand shows that about $1,800,000 remains on hand somewhere for Boston.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman from Massachusetts says that "the gentleman from Indiana" knows that th at is not so. "The gentleman from Indiana" knows that it is so.

Mr. McNARY. I reiterate that the gentleman knows that it is not a fact that there is no more than $306,000 on hand.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, I am talking about the amount of money that will be on hand June 30 that has been appropriated. Of course the Chief of Engineers can not tell to a cent what will be on hand, but he can estimate. Of course there is money on hand now to continue this work up to June 30; and there will remain on hand at that time, according to the estimate of the Chief of Engineers, $306,000.

Mr. McNARY. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not yield to the gentleman. As I was remarking, there will be on hand June 30 next $306,000. We add to that, following the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, $350,000, making the available fund on hand, all told, at that date, $656,000, which the Chief of Engineers says is all the money that can be expended on that improvement during the next fiscal year. Now, then, under the continuing contract system this work is limited to $3,000,000. Those in charge of the work may contract to the full extent of $3,000,000, and we appropriate the money as necessary. We have provided in this bill every dollar that the Chief of Engineers says will be necessary for the next fiscal year.

Mr. McNARY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. The question that I asked the gentleman from Indiana, and from which he has wandered away, was this: Where does that $306,000 of which he speaks come from? Is it the amount of money which was reported unexpended, having come over from last year's appropriation in consequence of the work not being done? Is it to be added to the $1,800,000? In other words, have we available for the port of Boston now $1,800,000? I repeat, where does the $306,000 which the gentleman says will be available on June 30 come from? I have been unable to find that out; and I would like to have the gentleman state it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The $306,000 that will be on hand June 30 is the unexpended balance of appropriations heretofore made. In other words, the Department has not expended and will not expend the amount of money heretofore appropriated, so that there will remain on June 30 of this fiscal year, according to the estimate of the Chief of Engineers, $306,000 of the appropriations already make and not yet expended.

Now, to-day we add $350,000, making altogether available $656,000 for the work of the next fiscal year.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the fact that he says "appropriations already made." That is a convenient term. He does not state when the appropriations were made, whether last year or when.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman will permit me, the appropriations already made by Congress——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I move to strike out the last word, just to answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HEMENWAY. On January 1, 1904, there was unexpended, of moneys heretofore appropriated, $665,000. The Chief of Engineers estimates that from January 1, 1904, to June 30, 1904, he will expend $359,000 on this work, which will leave a balance, on June 30, of $306,000. To that, I say, we add $350,000, which will make, June 30, $656,000 to continue the work during the next year. I am sure there is provided for that improvement every dollar that can be expended during the next fiscal year.

I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNDER THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION.

Improving Mississippi River: For continuing improvement of Mississippi River from Head of Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River, including salaries and clerical, office, traveling, and miscellaneous expenses of the Mississippi River Commission, $2,000,000.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after word "dollars," at end of line 19, page 103, the following:

"Improving the Missouri River: For continuing improvement of the Missouri River by cleaning out and deepening the harbors of Hermann and Washington, and by cleaning, deepening, and confining the channel and by doing revetment work on the banks between the mouth of said river and Booneville, $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction, orders, and superintendence of the Secretary of War, and to be immediately available."

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is new legislation and a change of existing law.

Mr. CLARK. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman from Missouri upon what theory this is a proper amendment.

Mr. CLARK. On the theory that the work on the Missouri River ought to be continued.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that that is a question to be decided by another committee, and the appropriation for it should be included in another bill.

Mr. CLARK. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I knew you were going to report a river and harbor bill, I would not offer this amendment. [Laughter.] But I must offer it either on this bill or on the river and harbor bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. What leads my colleague to hope that he would get any appropriation on the river and harbor bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the better course for the gentleman from Missouri is to postpone offering his amendment.

Mr. CLARK. I do not want to take the time of the House, but I want to make one remark about this situation. As a matter of fact, if the Government engineers had let the river alone in the neighborhood of Hermann, the harbor would have been all right; but they went to work and did certain things on the north side of the river—put in certain improvements, so called—that threw the sand and silt that ought to have gone down the north side over onto the south side, and filled up the harbor. Hundreds and thousands of acres of the richest land in the world are falling into the river every year, thereby filling up the channel and impeding navigation.

Here is a petition which states the case very clearly:

To the Congress of the United States:

The petitioners, the undersigned residents of Warren and Franklin counties, in the State of Missouri, represent and show to the Congress of the United States that the Missouri River is a navigable stream and a common highway of the United States; that its length is about 2,900 miles from its source to its junction with the Mississippi, and to the Gulf of Mexico 4,200 miles; that it is navigable at high water about 2,500 miles from its said junction with the Mississippi toward its fountain head; that said Missouri River is a turbid, rapid stream, bordering or flowing through seven States of the Union, with a vast number of tributaries, the chief of which are the Gasconade, the Osage, the Kansas, the Platte, the Cheyenne, and the Yellowstone.

That from neglect, inattention, and other causes there are numerous obstructions to navigation in and along the Missouri River, so much so that instead of being confined to a narrow channel at ordinary stage, as was the case generally in former times, the waters thereof now spread out over a far greater area of land, forming many sandbars and islands, which have the effect of diverting and separating the waters into two or more smaller channels, so that the river in its present condition is not only diminishing and destroying the commerce between the several States, but also hundreds of thousands of acres of very rich and valuable farming lands along the banks thereof. An instance is here given where said river has within the past two decades washed away about 15,000 acres of such valuable bottom lands in said Warren and Franklin counties, and the river is threatening to destroy about 15,000 acres more of such land yet remaining, as will more fully appear from the survey published by the Missouri River Commission, hereto annexed.

That the instance given above is an aggravated case, but there are other instances along said river equally distressing. The result is that a great public necessity exists for the regulation and improvement of the channel of the Missouri River and the preservation and protection of its banks and lands adjoining in the above-named counties for the purposes of commerce.

Wherefore, the premises considered, the petitioners hereby respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to take such steps and to make such appropriations of money for the regulation and improvement of the channel of the Missouri River, and the preservation and protection of its banks and the lands adjoining in the above-named counties of Warren and Franklin, in the State of Missouri, together with other places of like character, as will aid and promote commerce along said river for the general welfare of all.

Dated, Marthasville, Warren County, Mo., August 15, 1902.

That petition is signed by Hon. Edward G. Busch, mayor of the city of Washington, Franklin County, Mo., as well as president of the Missouri River Improvement Association; also by Jesse H. Schaper, secretary, and Alton Reuther, treasurer of that society, and by several hundred citizens of the great counties of Warren and Franklin.

I filed that petition in the House in December, 1902, and it has been among the archives of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors ever since; likewise other petitions, from Hermann and elsewhere. Recently I received the following letter from Mr. Busch, which explains itself:

WASHINGTON, MO., March 22, 1904.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: After receiving your letter of recent date I ventured to refer the matter of Missouri River improvement to President Roosevelt direct, and the President has ordered an inspection and report on the river at this point to be made, asking that the report be returned to the White House.

Mr. W. R. Dewitt, United States engineer, was here yesterday and has inspected the river and surrounding conditions and will make his report to Major Chittenden at once.

I would be very thankful to you if you would call on the President for Major Chittenden's report in a few days from now. I feel that the report will be that revetting the river banks is very much needed here in order to retain a wharf at our city, and in order to retain to river at our city this work must be done within the next six months, and possibly that will be too late, as the chances are that the next June rise will cut a channel through the bottom opposite here and throw a sand bar in front of our city.

Therefore, I would ask it as a special favor of you to get the report from the President, and then get an appropriation for river work at this point out of the sundry civil bill under the emergency clause during the present session of Congress. The "emergency" in this case warrants your immediate and best efforts.

You will remember that in the fall of 1902 we sent you a large petition asking for river improvements. Would you please call up this petition and have it duly considered at this session of Congress, so that it will be ready for action in the next session of Congress? Hoping that our case will appeal to you favorably, I am,

Very respectfully, yours, EDW. G. BUSCH.

The Globe-Democrat says:

Talk of abandoning the Missouri River is nonsense. That great river has a big future in irrigation, navigation, and sanitation.

And again the Globe-Democrat says:

It is a mistake on the part of the Government to abandon the Missouri River Commission. It should rather be strengthened for engineering work. The Missouri has an important future in irrigation, and its navigable uses are by no means to be regarded as ended. In building the great irrigation dam on the Nile the British Government has aided the craft that regularly navigate the river.

Missouri's delegation in Congress ought to work together to induce the Government to study the possibilities of the broad stream that winds through so many States and is destined to be of untold advantage to all. Continuous investigations ought to be carried on by engineers, under the direction of the national authorities, until the best comprehensive plan for its improvement is fixed upon. A river of continental magnitude can not be abandoned as unmanageable. What the Missouri River needs is to be fully and scientifically interpreted.

Recently the Post-Dispatch contained this very sensible editorial:

The two little stern-wheel packets Kennedy and Grapevine, which plied between St. Louis and Hermann, Mo., have been withdrawn from the service. The Missouri River is deserted. There is not as much traffic left on it as it bore at the beginning of the century. Not even an Indian canoe vexes its muddy surface.

It is an unnatural condition which must be corrected. Here is a great natural highway, inviting the enterprise of business men, costing nothing, demanding no tolls, open to the freest competition, yet it is abandoned and the country's trade is forced into the narrow channels of monopoly.

An enlightened public policy requires the reopening of these free routes. The National Government has a duty in the matter which it can not shirk. With comparatively trifling expense the great rivers—Missouri, Mississippi, Ohio, and Illinois—can be made fit for competitive enterprise. If Congress actively intervenes in aid of such a cause, all these streams will once more be crowded with boats carrying freight and passengers. They will become, as before, the source of profit and pleasure to millions of American citizens.

Thomas Hart Benton, "the great Missourian," once said:

The river navigation of the great West is the most wonderful on the globe, and since the application of steam power to the propulsion of vessels it possesses the essential qualities of open navigation. Speed, distance, cheapness, magnitude of cargoes, are all there, and without the perils of the sea from storms and enemies. The steamboat is the ship of the river and finds in the Mississippi and its tributaries the amplest theater for the diffusion and display of its power.

Wonderful river! Connected with seas by the head and the mouth; stretching its arms toward the Atlantic and the Pacific; lying in a valley which is a valley from the Gulf of Mexico to Hudson Bay; drawing its first waters, not from rugged mountains, but from the plateau of the lakes in the center of the continent and in communication with the sources of the St. Lawrence and the streams which take their course north to Hudson Bay; draining the largest extent of the richest land; collecting the products of every clime, even the frigid, to bear the whole to market in the South, there to meet the products of the entire world. Such is the Mississippi! And who can calculate the aggregate of its advantages and the magnitude of its future results?

Of course it is a long time since Colonel Benton uttered those glowing words, but they are as true and as wise to-day as when he spoke them to the Senate. The Globe-Democrat is correct when it says that "talk of abandoning the Missouri River is nonsense."

The towering fabric of De Witt Clinton's fame is bottomed on the Erie Canal. Last year the people of New York, by an overwhelming majority, voted $101,000,000 to broaden and deepen that canal. That much money spent on improving the Missouri River would enable the inhabitants of seven States to ship their products direct to Europe, Asia, Africa, South America, Central America, and all the islands of all the seas without breaking bulk or reloading, thereby saving vast sums of money, with much toil and much time.

It is safe to say that if the Missouri River belonged to any European country it would be improved thoroughly from its mouth to Fort Benton; its channel would be deepened, cleared out, and confined, and its banks revetted so as to prevent its constantly filling up. Revetment work would protect the channel and at the same time prevent the destruction of thousands of acres of the richest agricultural land in the world. It is an old and accepted saying that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

The Hollanders have rescued nearly their whole country from the sea, and at this very moment are engaged in the stupendous undertaking of draining and reclaiming the Zuider Zee by building an immense granite wall or dike at an expense of $99,000,000. Suppose they had such a stream as the Missouri River! Those sturdy and industrious people would so improve it that ocean steamers could and would float upon it.

The facts which the petition states as to Warren and Franklin counties apply equally to the great counties of St. Charles, Montgomery, Callaway, Boone, St. Louis, Gasconade, Osage, Cole, Moniteau, Cooper—in fact, to every county, great or small, bordering the Missouri River in the seven States through which it rushes toward the sea.

In all the history of the world there is not another instance to be found of any other country abandoning such a great natural waterway, and I do not believe that the American people have made up their minds to abandon it, though Congress appears to have so made up its mind.

If my amendment is not germane to this bill, as the Chairman has stated, I will try it again when a river and harbor bill is reported.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Does the Chair sustain the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fort Crawford Military Cemetery, Wisconsin: For the improvement and repair of the military cemetery on the Fort Crawford Reservation at Prairie du Chien, Wis., and for the purpose of purchasing a suitable approach to said cemetery, the sum of $3,000 heretofore appropriated is reappropriated and made available for the fiscal year 1904.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, on page 105, line 14, I move to amend by striking out "four" and inserting "five" at the end of the line.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be made.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bringing home the remains of civil employees of the Army who die abroad and soldiers who die on transports: To enable the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to cause to be transported to their homes the remains of civilian employees of the Army who have died, or may hereafter die, while in the employ of the War Department in Cuba, Porto Rico, Hawaii, China, Alaska, and the Philippines, including the remains of any honorably discharged soldiers who are entitled under the terms of their discharge to return transportation on Government transport, and who die while on said transport, $5,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 106, after line 16, as a new item, insert:

"CONFEDERATE MOUND, OAKWOOD CEMETERY, CHICAGO.

"For care, protection, and maintenance of the plot of ground known as 'Confederate Mound,' in Oakwood Cemetery, Chicago, $250."

Mr. HEMENWAY. I reserve the point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, so that I may ask him a question. I understand the gentleman got through legislation, or that legislation was enacted, authorizing this appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HULL. I will ask the gentleman if there was not a provision in the law authorizing a continuing appropriation?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will pardon me; I think it is proper to read the law. Section 2 of chapter 516 of the laws of the Fifty-seventh Congress provides:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized from time to time to enter contract with the Oak Woods Cemetery Association for the proper care, protection, and maintenance of the said plot of ground known as "Confederate Mound," and described in section 1 of this act: Provided, however, That the annual expense thereof shall not exceed the sum of $250.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is all right. I withdraw the point of order.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

MISCELLANEOUS OBJECTS, WAR DEPARTMENT.

Military posts: For the construction and enlargement of buildings at such military posts as, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, may be necessary; for the erection of barracks and quarters for the artillery in connection with adopted project for seacoast defenses, and for the purchase of suitable building sites for said barracks and quarters, $900,000: Provided, That hereafter in acquiring sites for fortifications it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, in every case of such acquirement, to purchase or otherwise procure at the same time, under this and future appropriations for this purpose, sufficient land for necessary barracks and quarters for the artillery troops required in connection with each of such fortifications.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, before making any motion I want to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the fact that the estimates for military posts, the same thing as we call barracks and quarters in the army bill, was $1,500,000. Now, in this item we have an appropriation of $900,000. On page 108 there is a special appropriation for Indianapolis of $523,900, making a total of between $1,400,000 and $1,500,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman in charge of the bill will consent to increase this amount, say, to $1,400,000, and strike out, on page 108, lines 8, 9, 10—down to and including line 14.

I want to explain my reason for asking this, by a statement to the committee that under this bill all the large buildings in the different posts of the United States are constructed, while in the army bill, so called, many buildings costing not over $20,000 are constructed from that appropriation. If you take one-third of all that is appropriated in the sundry civil bill and apply it to one post you will likely cripple all the other posts in the United States in these appropriations.

I do not doubt the fact that at Indianapolis there should be expended about $500,000. It is the commencement of a post; but if you consolidate these two items you can use more than $200,000 at Indianapolis on the officers' quarters and the noncommissioned officers' quarters and on the small buildings out of the army appropriation bill. You will have between $400,000 and $500,000, and leave a larger sum out of this appropriation in this bill to be apportioned to the different posts of the country. I believe it is bad policy to segregate the appropriations for army posts. It is better for the War Department to apportion it than it is to segregate it. If you commence segregating they are certain to use that amount and then stop. It is bad policy and bad administration.

Now, I am not, as I say, antagonizing the proposition that Indianapolis ought to have $522,000. That is the estimate for that post. But they would get it just the same if the two are consolidated, and, in addition to that, it will leave a balance of $300,000 or more in this bill that can be apportioned out to posts where the buildings cost more than $20,000. I hope that my friend from Indiana will consent to that kind of an amendment without any controversy, as I do not desire to make a motion.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not true that if the bill is passed in the shape that it has been reported that the probabilities are that other posts, which are urgently needed, and which will probably cost more than $20,000, may be knocked out of an opportunity to get them?

Mr. HULL. I should say that is altogether likely, and just what I am afraid of. That is why I ask the question of the gentleman from Indiana to modify this provision.

Mr. SLAYDEN. All posts ought to stand on equality as to distribution.

Mr. HULL. We meet another difficulty. This bill gives an appropriation of $1,200,000 and maybe more than $1,300,000, and you do injustice to every post in the United States. Under a ruling of the Comptroller, when a special appropriation is made for one place you can not use any other fund than that. In other words, you deprive the War Department of the power to use $200,000, if necessary, out of the army appropriation bill, and compel them to take it out of this appropriation. I am sure my friend did not intend to do that, and I hope this can be arranged without any vote of the House. I do not believe it would delay the work at Indianapolis.

The War Department wants the post at Indianapolis, and I find, by experience, when they want to build a post they generally give a very liberal amount; and if it is put in the two bills, it can be taken without doing injustice to any of the posts in the United States, while if you have this $900,000 and appropriate $520,000 to Indianapolis, the balance out of this bill, you may do injustice to every other post in the United States.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not think there is any danger of doing injustice to any post in the United States by making such appropriation as suggested by our committee.

One reason the committee reduced the estimate was that for purchase of land at Fort Niagara, N. Y., they ask about $225,000. Now, there is no reason why there should be any land purchased at Fort Niagara, N. Y. I think the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will agree with me when I say that we ought not to expend $225,000 for the purchase of land at that point at this time. There is another item for Fort Wadsworth, N. Y., $100,000. I was over there last summer, in company with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and others, and I know there is no necessity for the purchase of land at Fort Wadsworth, N. Y.

The Government has ample land there, and there is no reason why they should purchase this high-priced land in the harbor of New York when the Government has ample land. Going through the different items the Committee on Appropriations has reduced only along this line, and as far as the repairs of any posts in the United States are concerned there is ample appropriation to repair them all.

Now, as to the Indianapolis post, as the gentleman will remember, that is completely new. By legislation enacted at the last session of Congress a provision was inserted authorizing the sale of the old arsenal grounds at Indianapolis, which I think contained 80 acres, and which the Government bought many years ago for a song. The city of Indianapolis had grown up around it, and the land had become of great value. A provision was placed on the bill authorizing the sale of this arsenal ground and reinvesting the money near Indianapolis for an army post. The Secretary of War said that Indianapolis being centrally located, was a great point for an army post, and that there ought to be an army post there.

So this legislation was enacted, this arsenal was sold, and the money was reinvested, and the Government now has title to the land. This being a completely new post, a separate appropriation ought to be made for this particular post.

Now, then, why did we make a separate appropriation? What was the additional reason? So that they could not take this money that was known to be for this new post and apply it upon the purchase of land where the Government does not need land; so that they could not take the money and divert it to the purchase of land where the Government does not need any land.

I am sure that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will agree that we do not need to buy land when the Government has plenty of land, just to please somebody who would like to have quarters in a more prominent position.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield right there for a question?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly,

Mr. HULL. You have not kept them from using any part of the $900,000 to buy land, although I do not believe they have a right to buy land under that appropriation.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not believe they ever had the right. They undertook to buy land, and did buy land, and got their accounts passed by the accounting officer.

Mr. HULL. I hope the chairman will extend the provision so that no land can be bought out of the $900,000. In my judgment, it is a violation of law to do so.

Mr. HEMENWAY. They have got to buy land for the fortifications——

Mr. HULL. That is provided for in the proviso, and I think it is admirably done. But they have been buying land out of an appropriation made for buildings, and some provision of law ought to be put in that will prevent them from doing it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. We have changed the language in this bill so that I think it will prevent that abuse in the future.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Has the committee considered the possibility of punishing, by impeachment or otherwise, whomever it was in the Department that was responsible for taking money appropriated by a legislative branch of the Government for "the construction and enlargement of buildings" and devoting that money to the purchase of land?

Mr. HEMENWAY. We have not. I will say that I think it is a practice that ought to be stopped.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does the gentleman know of any way that he can stop it except by punishing somebody for it?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I would like to suggest that it would be a good idea for the committee having charge of this matter to draw up a resolution, if for no other purpose than to call it to the attention of the President and ask that it be investigated, or that whoever was responsible may be removed from the public service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I move to strike out the last word, Mr. Chairman. In this case I understand it was done under a mistaken construction of the law, but how any one could have made the mistake I do not understand.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Was it not done under this language?

> For the construction and enlargement of buildings at such military posts as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be necessary; for the erection of barracks and quarters for the artillery in connection with adopted project for seacoast defenses, and for the purchase of suitable building sites for said barracks and quarters.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is the way we make it read now in this bill, but it read before "for the construction and enlargement of buildings at such military post." They construed this to mean not only the enlargement of the buildings but the enlargement of the posts.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. My sole object in calling attention to that is to call the attention of the House to this plain abuse by executive legislation that is going on in all the Departments, except Agriculture, all the time, to such an extent that if it proceeds much further it will not be necessary to call upon Congress to make laws at all. All that will be necessary will be to get some executive head, or some little fellow, some official in the Department totally unknown and irresponsible, to say, "I thus construe something," which construction has no possible reference to the thing construed. It seems to me the committees of this House ought, by resolution, to call the attention of the President to these things, and to have men in the Executive Departments who are guilty of palpable, plain, and obvious legislation removed from the public service. Then if the President does not act we should proceed, by impeachment, or refusal to appropriate, or otherwise, to act ourselves.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] has no amendment to offer, I think we better continue the reading.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment. I offer an amendment to strike out of lines 10 and 11 the words "nine hundred thousand" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one million four hundred and twenty-three thousand nine hundred and ninety."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 107, in lines 10 and 11, strike out the words "nine hundred thousand" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one million four hundred and twenty-three thousand nine hundred and ninety."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to insert the exact amount found on page 108, and on that proposition I want to say just one or two words more. I want to make it very clear to this committee that it is not with any desire to cripple the work at Indianapolis, as I believe they are entitled to the amount appropriated here, and that if my amendment prevails they will get that amount.

It is simply for the purpose of preserving the rights of the other posts of the United States, which are compelled to come to this appropriation for whatever buildings costing more than $20,000 each they may need and must have, in many cases, or else they are deprived of them until another appropriation is made. It is bad legislation, Mr. Chairman, to segregate these items. The Committee on Military Affairs have at least for eight years refused to segregate these appropriations. There is never a session that we are not called upon to make a specific appropriation for some particular place, but in every instance we compel them to come to the Department and make their showing as to the amount they ought to have for the benefit of the service. When you once begin to segregate, where are you going to stop? The safer legislation is to make your appropriation, and then the people who have the whole field before them can figure out the amount necessary. If I believed for a moment that it would cripple the work at Indianapolis, I would not make the motion that I now do, but it will not do that. I know it is bad legislation to segregate items, and I appeal to the committee to not depart from the uniform practice of Congress in these matters in this appropriation bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I am greatly surprised at the argument which has just been made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], insisting on appropriations in lump sums. We concluded a few days ago a bill for one of the great Departments, carrying more than $170,000,000, in which the contest from beginning to the end was against appropriations for lump sums and in favor of appropriations in segregation. There is every argument in favor of the segregating of appropriations, in order not only that the House, not only that the Department controlling an appropriation, but that the country may understand directly where the money has gone. Taking this particular instance wherein the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] seeks to give authority to one man to expend all of the money wherever he may desire to expend it at any post, without limitation, and comparing it with the principle of requiring such segregation of the appropriation as will at the conclusion of the expenditure disclose exactly what has been done with the money, I believe this committee will recognize and appreciate the justice of the segregated appropriation.

Again calling attention to this particular item for the Indianapolis post, there is a bare tract of land which is yet to be improved, upon which barracks, officers' quarters, etc., are to be constructed. Will you take out of a lump-sum appropriation, authorized by this Congress, of a million and a half of dollars whatever amount they may see fit to expend there, or will you through certain limitations fix within reasonable bounds such an amount as the estimates of the Quartermaster-General may indicate may be necessary and proper for that particular construction? When the $522,000 have been expended, then the reports of the accounting officers should disclose in detail by bills of particulars how that money has been expended, under whose direction, for what purposes, and with what economy it has been expended.

I challenge the statement that lump-sum appropriations are put into the hands of officers of any Department in order that they, viewing the entire field, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] says, may be in better position than the Congress to determine the method and minuteness and accuracy of such expenditure. It would be better if all of the various military posts thus far constructed had been appropriated for in segregated items in order that the books to-day might disclose just what has been expended, under what methods, and under what directions of the Department.

Mr. HULL. Do not the books disclose that?

Mr. OVERSTREET. They ought to. I don't know whether they do or not. This is the beginning of a post. Do not cover it up into a lump sum, but put it into an item so that we can know what it costs, and it will be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, just in corroboration of what the gentleman is saying, I desire to call attention to another part of the bill, which was gone over while I was not present.

I find here, for example, among the appropriations for the Interstate Commerce Commission a general lump-sum appropriation in this form: "For all other necessary expenditures, etc., $234,000." I am informed that under this appropriation $ 2,000 a year is paid for rent of a building which ought to be procured for $8,000 or $9,000. I do not know whether that statement is true or not, but if Congress had been faced with that specific appropriation—so much for rent—it never would have been authorized until we had known whether it was true or not. A similar remark might be made in reference to all these lump-sum appropriations.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I think the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. HULL] is manifesting too much jealousy in regard to the jurisdiction of his own committee. He is afraid that segregated items might prevent that committee from knowing whether all the posts receive equal appropriations. But I insist that in the beginning where a new post is being started, where an appropriation for the construction of the building is first to be made, it is entirely proper both as to the Department and to Congress to define the amount for that specific purpose, which can be followed from the inception to the conclusion of the work.

Mr. HULL. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] to claim that the appropriations for the erection of buildings, construction of roads, etc., all come out of this sum of $522,000?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Whatever is necessary for the construction of that post.

Mr. HULL. I will state that generally the amounts necessary for construction of roads, preparation of ground, etc., are taken out of the appropriation for the transportation of the Army and supplies—not a dollar out of this.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If that is the general practice, I think it ought to be changed.

Mr. HULL. I do not.

Mr. OVERSTREET. We ought to be able to know the different sums expended at each one of these posts.

Mr. HULL. Does not the gentleman know that the War Department takes all these posts, makes out a statement of the sums to be allowed to each, and then publishes the list, so that the country does know exactly the proportion that comes out of each appropriation for each locality?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Then what objection can there be to segregating each of these appropriations where it is possible to do so?

Mr. HULL. There are 175 posts in the United States; and if what the gentleman suggests were done, this bill would have to be much longer than it is.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That may be as to maintenance; but the case is different as to construction.

Mr. HULL. I am speaking about construction. The gentleman does not seem to have caught my point—that if you make the appropriation here in a reduced amount, you can not use the appropriation in the army bill, which would give you at least $200,000 for your buildings. You leave that much more to come out of this bill for fifty, sixty, or seventy thousand dollar buildings at these various posts.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That does not disprove the advisability of the segregation of these appropriations.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I much regret that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], who has just spoken, did not quite understand the situation relative to army posts throughout the country, and the various matters that must be considered by the appropriate committees in making appropriations for the support of these posts, or I am sure he would not have made the statements he did. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has just stated that there are about 175 posts in the United States. About three years ago a board was appointed by the Secretary of War to take into consideration the general military situation of the United States, to recommend where posts should be established, what posts then existing should be increased, and what other posts in existence should be abandoned. That report has been filed, has been acted upon by the War Department, has always been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs, and I have no doubt up to this time by the Committee on Appropriations.

If we attempt to segregate these items in the army appropriation bill and in this bill, the inevitable result will be that every increase that was recommended will be made, that every post recommended to be established will be established, and that none of these posts recommended to be abandoned will be wiped out. Personal influence here and in the other House will bring about such a condition. This will mean a vast increase in the expenditures for establishment and maintenance of posts and for the enlargement of the posts, and if the policy of segregation be pursued to the end it will cost many additional millions for the support of the Army.

We have found from experience that the very best and most economical method of proceeding is to make these appropriations in bulk, and then require the strictest accounting for the expenditures from the officers of the War Department. Such accountings have been made. There will be found in the last report of the Quartermaster-General statements—itemized to a cent—of the expenditures of amounts carried in the sundry civil bill and of the amounts carried in the military appropriation bill. The result is that any person who wants to see the amounts expended on any post can find an exact statement on file in the office of the Quartermaster-General or in the room of the Committee on Military Affairs, and, I have no doubt, too, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. The Quartermaster-General has to do with the maintenance of the posts, not with the construction of the buildings.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. The Quartermaster-General has charge of the construction of all these posts.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Well, the Quartermaster-General is the officer who does the work. He is the one who makes the expenditures; he makes the contracts, and a statement of all these things which are done can be found in his report.

I agree with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that this amount should be appropriated to the Indianapolis post. Congress has considered this matter; it has established this post, and the buildings ought to be erected just as quickly and just as well as it can be done.

In order to do it I think it is not necessary to infringe on the necessities of any other post in the Army. The amount matters not. I do not doubt this amount is needed. As I informed the gentleman from Indiana a moment ago, the reports of the Quartermaster-General last year showed that at least three, and I think four, posts of the Army received larger amounts than this amount from these various funds scattered though these different bills. I think Fort Riley, Fort Leavenworth, I think Fort Sheridan, I know Fort Snelling, all received larger amounts, because the War Department found it necessary to expend those amounts there.

The committee should understand that the buildings constructed from this appropriation are, as a rule, the buildings for the common soldiers, the privates of the Army. They are the barracks and quarters for the private soldiers. All the buildings costing more than $20,000 are constructed from this fund, and all barracks now built cost more than that amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULL. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Minnesota be allowed to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, as I said, the larger buildings for the various posts of the Army are constructed out of this fund, the buildings for the common soldiers, the barracks and quarters, the large buildings for the posts, while the smaller buildings, the officers' quarters, the storehouses, stables, the inferior buildings like that, costing less than $20,000, are taken from the fund for barracks and quarters appropriated in the regular army appropriation bill.

Now, it is in the interest of economy, it is in the interest of good public service, that the War Department should have a free hand in this matter; that they should build as many of the smaller buildings as possible out of the item in the army appropriation bill. When it is necessary to come to this fund, then they should have the right to come to it and take the money from the appropriation for the larger buildings of the Army, which are greatly needed when needed at all. The purposes of smaller buildings can be cared for in some other way; those for large buildings can not be.

It is evident from what I have said, and the committee must realize, that there are quite a number of posts in the Army that have been enlarged in the last few years. Some of them have had some smaller buildings, some of them have had some larger buildings, but they are not quite complete. Some of them need additional barracks; some of them need additional quarters for the officers. Now, if the War Department is limited in its expenditures from this item, it can not construct the buildings that ought to be constructed during the next year. It will be hampered in constructing the large buildings; it will have more money than is needed for constructing the small buildings. Now, I think, when the officers of the Department appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs it was stated that there were quite a number of troops for which there were no quarters ready. Some infantry, some cavalry, that were brought home from the Philippines, were obliged to be tented out somewhere or quartered in insufficient and insanitary places, because the money was not available to construct barracks for those troops; and those are some of the things which are needed from this item.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. HEMENWAY. How many troops have we quartered in the United States now, in round numbers?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. We have about 40,000.

Mr. HEMENWAY. How many had we prior to 1900?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. About 25,000.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Prior to that time we only appropriated $200,000 to $225,000 and similar sums for this purpose. Now, in 1901 we had $1,000,000; in 1902 we had $1,000,000 again; in 1903 we had $2,000,000. Certainly, with all that money expended, we can take care of 15,000 more troops than we had prior to 1900.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The best answer to that is that there are not sufficient quarters available. The troops are exposed.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Right there I suggest that if this lump sum is appropriated here, it will not be done now, but the money will go to some favored post, and the money that ought to go to the post at Indianapolis, which is a new post established by law, will not be expended there.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It will be used in buying land.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. When the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. HEMENWAY] and the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads [Mr. OVERSTREET] exert their eloquence and influence in behalf of the post at Indianapolis, I do not think it is likely to suffer, and it ought not to suffer. The War Department will have a free hand in giving them all that is necessary. The Adjutant-General of the Army has stated that there are not sufficient quarters right at hand to house and accommodate and take care of the troops and officers of the Army; that they do need money and need it at once to construct proper barracks for the housing of these troops; that that is fully as important as taking care of the post at Indianapolis.

But I want it distinctly understood that there is no antagonism to the post at Indianapolis. If I believed it necessary, I would reinforce the words of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I would be willing to do anything I could do to expedite the work at Indianapolis; but I know it is not necessary.

Mr. OVERSTREET. What do you propose to do with this money when you cover it into the lump sum?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The War Department has full jurisdiction. They can start a large building at Indianapolis under this, and they can start the smaller buildings from the fund for barracks and quarters.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Do you expect if this particular segregation of the appropriation should be covered into a lump sum, that still they would spend just as much money at Indianapolis, taken together with another sum? Do you not think that it would be better to segregate it this way and that you would get better supervision in one item?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No. I agree that all the appropriations for these posts ought to come in on one bill. I do agree with that; but there is one accounting for it all. There is one accounting that the War Department makes, and that accounting can be had by any gentleman who wishes to investigate it in five minutes. He can find how much was taken for each post out of this fund, and how much out of the army appropriation bill, and how much for transportation. All of it can be found in five minutes. The general proposition is this: That at the present time, where construction is nearly completed in so many of these posts, with some of them without barracks for the common soldiers, it is wise to allow the War Department to do what it thinks best under all the circumstances. If a segregation should be deemed necessary, a proper amount for the buildings costing more than $20,000 could be taken from this item, and the amount for the other buildings could be taken from the item for barracks and quarters of the army bill. It is unfair and injurious to the public service to take large and small amounts both from this particular item intended only for the construction of large buildings. That is what we object to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I ask for two minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. As I said, last year I know that at least three posts the War Department expended more money than provided by the controverted clause: and I have no doubt the War Department would expend this amount and more on this particular post. If it should be done in the way suggested by the amendment, it will not cripple the oth r posts of the country: and I hope the ge tleman from Indiana will consent to this amendment or modification.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, my judgment is that we ought not to delegate our own right of legislation to any other department of the Government. You may say that the War Department knows better than this House where this money should be expended. That is probably true. If true, we ought to require the War Department to make its estimates and present them to Congress and let Congress pass upon th m. My judgment is that we ought not to appropriate a dollar of this money in a lump sum and deliver it over to the War Department. On the contrary, we ought to force the Department to say where they need the money, for what they need it, and appropriate it specifically. I call your attention and the attention of this full committee to the Coast and Geodetic Survey. The head of that Survey sets out in specific figures each amount, for what he wants his money, when he wants it and for how many clerks he wants and what each gets. He then gives Congress a knowledge of where the money that we appropriate is going, and, in my opinion, we ought to insist upon this as presented in this bill, and follow it up next winter with the other Departments, and compel them to tell Congress where they want a certain appropriation, why they want it, and when it is to be used.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is any Member of this House who wants to see the money of the Government honestly expended and fairly appropriated who will not agree with the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri, which has also been made by other gentlemen here, and which is probably heartily concurred in by all, that there should be a specific segregation in each appropriation for each item where it is at all possible to have it. But you can not always have that.

Mr. HEMENWAY. May I ask the gentleman there, is it not possible, where Congress has authorized this new post, without having anything but the bare land, is it not possible to make a specific appropriation for that particular work?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to interfere at all with the immediate, complete, and satisfactory construction of the post near Indianapolis. But I do not believe that it will be crippled or delayed in the least by the adoption of the motion made by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. There are, unhappily and unwisely, I believe, two bills which come in here bringing appropriations for the support of the military establishment of the Government. I never believed that was a wise division of the labor and duty of this House, and I believe that if one committee or the other were clothed with the exclusive power of preparing and perfecting these bills they could compel the segregati n of items and could compel specific and clear statements of the purpose of each appropriation in a much better way than to have two committees appropriate for the same branch of the Government.

I do not believe it is wise at this time to begin the segregation by the selection of this one item and the stopping there. I do not think the purpose of the law which ordered the establishment of the post at Indianapolis will be interfered with in the least, but I do believe under the peculiar system of appropriation and dispensation of appropriations given to them that it may imperil the prosperity and delay the needed improvement at other posts, as has been so clearly shown by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I understand the gentleman to say that he thinks that it will not imperil or cripple the Indianapolis post, that the same amount of money will be appropriated and used. If that is true, how can it possibly interfere with the improvements at other posts?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Just as has been explained by the gentlemen who have pr ceded me, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] and the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Will it take any greater sum of money from the amount appropriated than it would if the War Department was to make it? Why could it be crippled any more by this bill than if the War Department should make it?

Mr. SLAYDEN. It will not be crippled, for at the same time it has two funds to draw from—one in the bill presented by the Committee on Military Affairs, wherein there is no authority for the construction of buildings at a post that costs over $20,000, and in this other where there is. They could proceed with the construction of such buildings as is warranted under the general appropriation like barracks and quarters, and the construction of the post in Indiana would be in no wise delayed.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make my appeal on a general principle to the gentlemen of the Appropriation Committee, almost more than to the other Members of this House, in favor of the present system. Division in appropriation bills is right—the division is of the business: so many clerks, so much for supplies, so much for building, so much for repairs. Division by localities, as we have unfortunately found out whenever we got to any such thing as the necessity for public building or river and harbor appropriation, is so tempting to Members from the various localities that, if we begin by paying to Indianapolis so much, to Des Moines so much, or to Newark, my own city, so much, each man comes in for his particular item, and all want their particular items in the bill, until no man can know where the total of the bill will go. As it is now, when the War Department hands us specific estimates amounting to a certain sum of money, the committee says: "We will give you so much; take care you do not go beyond it." And the House says: "You had fifteen hundred thousand dollars last year, and you shall not have any more this year." And therefore they estimate for the same amount this year.

If the bill once begins to name specific places if specific localities once get into the bill, how, with the courtesy of the Senate, will this House ever get them out of the bill if the S nator of that particular State objects? I am not speaking of Indianapolis: its building is going to be paid for, but the only control that we have over this question of building (for building is to go on at one post after another all over the Union), the only control, gentleman of the House, that we have over any such appropriation is to say: "You shall expend so much money this year for this general purpose." Oth rwise there will be logrolling for many localities into one great big stream of appropriations in every bill, so that the House will have no sort of control over the total.

Now, let me suggest one other matter. If an appropriation be made of fifteen hundred thousand dollars for buildings costing over $20,000 each, and through some strike in Indianapolis or some difficulty in expending the money the estimate of $523,000 is not expended this year, Indianapolis will be able next year to get the benefit of that same general appropriation of fifteen hundred thousand dollars. If, on the other hand, the bill makes a separate appropriation and it is not spent this year, the next year the gentleman from Indiana will have to come before the House again for a special reappropriation of that amount for building at Indianapolis. He is much better without a special item, for he can draw the funds this year or next year or the year after from these two general appropriations until the amount estimated for by the War Department is expended.

Whereas if it be put in a special item of this sort it must be reappropriated. Now, the Committee on Military Affairs of the House has suffered, I remember, from various items. One was the maintenance of a hospital at Hot Springs, Ark., which happened to be in the bill and which the Secretary of War said at that time was unnecessary, and our endeavor to be rid of it almost defeated the whole military appropriation bill, because we could not get the consent of one Senator to have it stricken out. I appeal to the House not to adopt that system of local appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the system that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] has just inveighed against is a system that is very generally practiced, certainly by the Appropriations Committee. Any other system measurably abrogates and abolishes the power of this House, and in effect says to a bureau: Here is a million and a half, or two millions, or three millions of dollars: expend it as you see fit. To illustrate by a specific instance, the Geodetic Survey has been cited, and that furnishes a clear and concise statement of the opposition to the theory of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER]. The Fish Commission is another. They had a given amount, but there are twenty or thirty or forty different places where the needs of the several hatcheries are brought in detail before the committee, and that committee determines how much out of the general appropriation shall be expended in each particular instance. Then, when these specific appropriations have been provided for, there may be a lump sum to cover certain contingencies. Otherwise you will leave to one man, and oftentimes to a subordinate——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I would suggest to the gentleman from Michigan that that lump sum ought to be for emergencies.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And for things that can not be foreseen.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Yes. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] says that that lump sum ought to be to provide for certain emergencies that can not be foreseen. I agree with him perfectly, and that is the theory of this committee. I tell you, gentlemen, we do not want to turn over to a Department—and that often means to an ambitious subordinate rather than his chief—the expenditure of hundreds of thousands, and it may be a million or more, of dollars. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman closes the debate, I would like to say just one word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] has said that we ought not to appropriate lump sums, and that the Appropriations Committee is opposed to that system. Will the gentleman from Michigan point me to the bill and the year when we have segregated this item before?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. What item?

Mr. HULL. For military posts. That has always been appropriated for in lump sums.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I will answer the question of the gentleman, if the gentleman from Michigan will permit. Last session we did it, and I hope at the next session of Congress to segregate all these items. [Applause.] Why, we have appropriated in the last four years something like $5,500,000 to add to these posts.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I hope this is not to come out of my time.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, the gentleman will have his full five minutes. I am answering the question as to the segregation of these items. Mr. Chairman, we could build palace hotels in which to house this Army in the next few years at the rate we are going ahead here. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe a word of that, because in this bill the estimates are submitted for buildings to cost more than $20,000. They could not build any such thing as palace hotels, because every session of Congress knows what they have appropriated. The gentleman does not give information on segregation. He dodges that. Now, there is one line of thought that was advanced by the gentleman, I think, from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] that is true, that two committees having jurisdiction of substantially the same thing cause trouble, but the line of demarcation is made when appropriation bills were taken from one committee and distributed as now under the rules. The Military Committee has jurisdiction only over buildings that do not cost more than $20,000, while the other committee has jurisdiction for buildings that do cost more than $20,000. Mr. Chairman, the point I made in the beginning was this, that in the army appropriation bill there was something over $4,000,000 appropriated for barracks and quarters.

Under this bill there will be $1,400,000 appropriated. Five hundred thousand dollars of that, in round numbers, will go to one post and $900,000 to the other one hundred and seventy four or five posts in the country. The point I wanted to make was that no harm would result to anyone if they would take $200,000 out of the fund appropriated in the army bill for officers' quarters and for the quarters of noncommissioned officers and for the buildings that cost less than $20,000, and let the $200,000 saved out of this appropriation go to Fort Sam Houston or any other fort in the country where they need barracks for the troops or riding halls or buildings that cost more than $20,000. If you could separate all these items, gentlemen of the committee, I would not object to it in the least; but what I do object to in this bill, or the army bill or any other bill, is to segregating one item out of one hundred and seventy five or six items.

That is what I do not believe is right. I do not believe it to be good administration. To be very brief, my whole contention is this: In this appropriation the Department has now submitted its estimate of $522,000 for Indianapolis. The amount ought to be expended there, but it ought to be expended in the way in which appropriations at other posts are expended. The larger buildings should be built out of the appropriations carried in the sundry civil bill and the smaller buildings out of the appropriations carried in the bill for the support of the Army. Let all be put on the same basis.

Mr. ZENOR. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Military Committee, having charge generally of appropriations for barracks, what is the average cost of establishing these posts in the United States?

Mr. HULL. That depends upon the locality, the price of building materials, and the price of labor. All such matters would regulate the price of officers' quarters.

Mr. ZENOR. Is there not some general rule by which the average cost for the establishment of these posts might be determined?

Mr. HULL. That would depend upon the size and character of the post. A cavalry post will cost in the neighborhood of $1,800,000; an infantry post about $1,400,000. That is the average.

Mr. ZENOR. Take a post such as this proposed to be established at Indianapolis——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to express my hearty indorsement of the principle announced by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY]. All these appropriations, whether in the form of lump sums or otherwise, are based upon estimates from the proper Departments—the estimates of the officers having in charge the determination of the proper cost of the proposed improvements.

I submit that this House should adopt the policy now announced by the gentleman as our future policy in measures of this kind. These items can just as readily be carried in the different appropriation bills as not, and if such a system were adopted the House and the country could know exactly what items were carried in these bills and for what purposes. Why should these appropriations be lumped? There is not any reason for it.

I repeat, the presumption is that the different Departments know upon what their estimates are based; the officers by whom these estimates are made are presumed to know the different sums required, and it is right, therefore, that the House and the country should understand the particular work contemplated and the proposed cost of it. I hope this House will stand by the Committee on Appropriations in the policy now enunciated by the distinguished chairman of that committee.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to have the impression go out either to the Members of the House or to the country that the entire Military Committee is opposed to this item. I am frank to say, from what I gather from the expressions of the chairman of the committee and from my associates on that committee, that we are in favor of segregating items in appropriation bills. We have sought to do this in the bill we have presented to the House. We are in favor of segregating the items with reference to military posts.

The chairman of the Military Committee has stated that there are 175 or 176 military posts. There has been a segregation as to one post out of 176. That one is the post at Indianapolis. But there are 175 other posts. I should like to have the Committee on Appropriations segregate the appropriations for these other posts, specifying the amount that is wanted for the general expenditures at each one of these posts. If that be done, we will agree to assent to the segregation with reference to Indianapolis.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I want to occupy about three minutes, and then I hope to secure a vote. Let us get at the pith of this thing if we can.

The Secretary of War asks for $1,500,000 for military posts. When that proposition was made before the committee, I promptly put the question, "Where do you want to spend that money?" The Secretary of War now gives a list of the places where this money is to be expended, and the different amounts foot up $1,500,000. Indianapolis is not mentioned in the list.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman allow me a question? I know he wants to state the facts.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly I do.

Mr. HULL. Is it not true that afterwards supplementary estimates came in for Indianapolis?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HULL. So the Secretary of War told you afterwards what was wanted there?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes; but if we give them the $1,500,000, they will spend it as laid down in the first list, which includes Fort Niagara, N. Y., for land, $225,000, and Fort Wadsworth, N. Y., for land, $100,000, unless we have prevented such expenditures by the provision in our bill forbidding further expenditures at these different places for land. The bill formerly read:

For construction of buildings at, and enlargement of, such military posts, etc.

Now, they construed that language to mean that they could enlarge a military post by buying land. We changed the language, so that it reads:

For the construction and enlargement of buildings at such military posts—

Leaving no opportunity to put the construction on it that was put on before. Now, when we take from the $1,500,000 the cost of the land at Fort Niagara and the land at Fort Wadsworth, that makes $325,000 of this money they can not spend, if we have done what we have sought to do by the language that is put into the bill.

Now, this current fiscal year we have on the army bill an appropriation of $5,225,000; we had in the sundry civil bill an appropriation of $2,000,000, or all told for this fiscal year an appropriation of $7,225,000 for army posts. We have been appropriating since 1900 at such a rapid pace for these army posts that I say again we could build palace hotels in which to quarter our Army of 50,000 men with the appropriations we have made in the last few years. The Committee on Appropriations seek to cut this item of $1,500,000 to $900,000, nipping off $600,000 of it. Three hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars of it comes by stopping the purchase of this land. That leaves only a net reduction of $175,000. But what we hope to do is to get to a point where we can appropriate specifically for these posts and stop this expenditure of six or seven million dollars every year at the army posts all over the country, not to quarter the Army of the United States, but to ornament some particular locality.

I had an experience the other day. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LIND] came before our committee. He made it appear beyond question that an elevator in a building at Minneapolis was necessary. The Government did not have much ground to build on, and they were building up in the air until they had six stories, I believe, and they needed an elevator. It took $25,000 to construct that elevator. We said to the chief architect, "If this money is appropriated, when can you commence this work?" He answered, "Immediately." A few weeks after the appropriation was made the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LIND] came down to me with a letter saying, "We can not do this work. We can only take one-fourth of the $25,000 and apply it for this particular purpose," when that Government official knew that the Committee on Appropriations appropriated that $25,000 for that specific purpose; and we would have them coming back to us with the same proposition here.

Now, as to the military post at Indianapolis, I do not care any more about it because of its being located at Indianapolis than I would if it had been in some other place. The fact that the post is at Indianapolis cuts no figure with me. But it is a peculiar matter. Here is a new post started. Here is land purchased, all ready to put new buildings upon. We want to say how much money they can spend there. We do not want to take the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] and say they can take a little off of this bill and they can take a little off of that bill and put it together and can do so much work over there. We want to say in specific terms, "You can spend so much money there," and appropriate it for that purpose.

Now, gentlemen, this is good legislation, and I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] will be voted down, as I believe it ought to be voted down. I hope that within the next two years or three, and possibly in the next fiscal year, we can come to the end of this building of military posts. Why, we are spending such large sums of money for the quartering of such few people! I believe it developed in our hearings that at posts where only one company was stationed, 100 people, where the average of sickness would be 2 per cent, or 2 persons sick, that they are spending $20,000 for a hospital at such a post as that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask for three minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEMENWAY. It developed that at such points, as I have stated, where the average number of men sick would be only two they spent $20,000 for a hospital and put in a full complement of hospital surgeons, and so forth, to take charge of it, and on the conference report that has come from the Senate on the army bill, and that will be considered in this House later on, they ask to increase that limit to $40,000 in place of $20,000. I hope the House will stand by the Committee on Appropriations in an effort to bring this thing to an end sometime.

I ask for a vote.

Mr. ZENOR. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. In view of the fact that we are engaged in making a very large appropriation of money, is it not an excessive appropriation for all legitimate purposes at Indianapolis?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, no. That post has been authorized by this House and will be one of the great posts of the country. It is centrally located, and this is not an excessive appropriation. I ask for a vote.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Indiana as to the misappropriation of funds, I shall offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the proviso: At the end of line 17, page 107, make the period (.) a semicolon (;), and after that "no part of the money appropriated for military posts shall be used for the purchase of any land except as herein specifically provided."

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be reported from the desk.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not see that it changes the bill, and I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 107, line 17, after the word "fortifications," strike out the period and insert a semicolon, and insert the following: "but no part of the money appropriated for military posts shall be used for the purchase of any land except as herein specifically provided."

Mr. HULL. Now, I simply want to say to my friend the language of the bill covers it, so that generally under the language it is not necessary; but having substantially this same language heretofore, the Department has gone on, the gentleman states, and purchased land. Let us make it so that they can not possibly do it in the future.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Let me suggest to the gentleman that if his amendment would come in after the word "dollars," in line 11 on page 107, and strike out in his amendment the words "except," etc., then the subsequent proviso would strictly apply to sites and not to buildings. It will take care of itself, and his amendment will qualify the words preceding it, and render it utterly impossible to expend any of this money for land. "Hereafter in acquiring sites for fortifications it shall be the duty." The word "sites" means land.

Mr. HULL. It states what shall be the duty of the Secretary in connection with sites. I think the language where it is is better, for the reason that it permits them to acquire sites of sufficient amount. Now, I am informed that in acquiring sites for seacoast artillery posts they bought only a few acres and placed the buildings on them and then were compelled to pay greatly advanced prices for the ground made necessary for them to acquire on account of having the buildings there. Now, I want to make it plain to the War Department that, except in coast fortifications, Congress wants it understood that they are to use the full appropriation for the building, and that they must not take any money appropriated for a building for the purchase of land.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment simply reiterates what we put in the bill, and I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase of about 84 acres of land adjoining the military post at Fort Sheridan, Ill., and lying between that post and the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad, the same being required for sites for the additional buildings necessary for the accommodation of the increased garrison and for drill ground, $280,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. MAHON. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at end of line 7, page 1808: "For the purchase of about 1,200 acres of land on field of battle of Gettysburg, Pa., included in General Sickels's maps for garrison, drill ground, and barracks for United States troops, $190,000, or so much as may be necessary to purchase said land."

Mr. HEMENWAY. I make the point of order on that amendment that it is new legislation.

Mr. MAHON. I will ask the gentleman to reserve the point of order.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order on this amendment, but reserves it.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, it is conceded by all that the battlefield of Gettysburg is the great battlefield of our country. I notice in this section that for 84 acres of land we are paying $3,313 per acre. This amendment provides for the purchase of land, as shown in the Sickles map 1,200 acres of land, adjoining Confederate avenue, which can be purchased by the Government to-day at its actual cost, $160 an acre.

On that piece of ground General Dudley lost his leg. It was there where General Reynolds was killed. It is there where Archer's brigade was captured. The most important and decisive events of that great battle happened on this 800 acres of land during the first day's battle. Now, Mr. Chairman, this land has been held since that battle was fought, not a tree has been cut off it, none of its conditions have been changed, and if the Government wants to acquire this land on that great battlefield, where there are over a million dollars' worth of monuments; where every regiment and brigade, both Union and Confederate, have thoroughly marked the greatest battlefield of the world, now is their time to do it. There is no place like it. Now, for the small sum of $190,000, probably a little less, these 1,200 acres can be purchased by the Government, and if it is not purchased now these people can not hold it longer.

It will be sold into building lots, into farms, and the United States Government will lose control of it. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not insist on his point of order, but will allow the Secretary of War to purchase this land, not at $3,300 an acre, but 1,200 acres of the finest land in the great Cumberland Valley for about $160 an acre.

I hope the chairman will withdraw his point of order and allow this amendment to go in, so that the Secretary of War can get this big tract of land.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks this is clearly an expenditure not previously authorized by law, and therefore sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable claims to the ownership of land which has been gained from the Detroit by natural accretion to be adjusted the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to enter into an agreement with the owner of the premises adjoining the military reservation at Fort Wayne, Mich., to determine a location for the western boundary of said reservation and to give a quitclaim deed to all land west of the line so determined upon receiving from said owner a proper quitclaim deed to all land east of said line.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 108, line 16, after the word "Detroit," insert the word "River."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to accept from the citizens of Missoula, Mont., deeds donating to the United States the following-described lands for the enlargement of the military reservation of Fort Missoula, namely: The south half of the southwest quarter of section 25; the northeast quarter of section 35; the northeast quarter, the north half of the southeast quarter, and the north half of the northwest quarter of section 36, all in township 13 north and range 20 west, in Missoula County, Mont.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 108 strike out lines 24 and 25, and on page 109 strike out lines 1 to 8, inclusive.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The legislation has passed Congress authorizing the acceptance of this land, and for that reason I move to strike out this paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improvement of the Yellowstone National Park: For the improvement of the Yellowstone National Park, in accordance with the approved project, including maintenance and repair of existing improvements, to be expended by and under the direction of the Secretary of War, $250,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 111, at the end of line 12, after the words "until expended," add a new paragraph, as follows:

"Mount Rainier National Park: For continuing the construction of the wagon road into said park heretofore surveyed and commenced under the direction of the Secretary of War, $30,000, of which $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used by the Secretary of War in surveying and estimating the cost of a wagon road along the most practicable route from the eastern boundary of the Mount Rainier Forest Reserve into said park."

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, in rising to support the amendment which I have just offered for consideration I feel impelled to state that I am very anxious for its adoption. This is one of the great national parks of the United States, and in my judgment—and I hope without undue personal pride in the matter—it is the greatest of the national parks. However, I must confess at the outset that this particular park seems to have been born or created under an unlucky star. This park was created by act of Congress of March 2, 1899. This act which created the park made no appropriation for its improvement or protection. For the next four years after its creation I engaged in a yearly struggle trying to secure a small appropriation upon the annual sundry civil appropriation bill to begin the work of building a road into this park. My efforts to secure the first appropriation for this park were doubtless amusing to other people, but not to me.

When I first asked for an appropriation for this park the Appropriation Committee of the House told me that before they could make any appropriation for me for this park that I must first secure an official survey of the proposed work and an estimate of its probable cost. I then went to the Executive Department of the Government having control and jurisdiction of this park—the Interior Department—and asked them to make me a survey and an estimate for this proprosed wagon road into the park. That Department informed me that before they could make me a survey and estimate that I must first secure an appropriation to pay for the same. So, Mr. Chairman, you will see that I could not get the appropriation because I hadn't secured the survey, and I couldn't get the survey because I hadn't secured the appropriation. [Laughter.]

As I now recollect, it seems to me that I spent a large part of the first three years of my public service chasing myself around the outside of that legislative circle trying to break through. It would have been lost time except for the fact that during those efforts I learned a number of the occult mysteries that surround the operations of this legislative body. I have merely mentioned this circumstance in proof of my assertion that this park was created under an unlucky star.

Finally, on the 11th day of February, 1903, I secured the passage by the House of the first appropriation of any kind that was ever made for this park. It was an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill, and read as follows:

Mount Rainier National Park: To enable the Secretary of War to cause a survey to be made of the most practicable route for a wagon road into said park, and toward the construction of said road after the survey herein provided for shall have been made, $10,000.

You will notice by the language of this amendment just quoted that the survey and construction of this wagon road are to be under the jurisdiction of the War Department and under the control of the Secretary of War. I call attention to this because we have in relation to this park two Departments of this Government each of which possesses a certain jurisdiction therein. In the first place, section 2 of the act of March 2, 1899, creating this park, placed it "under the exclusive control of the Secretary of the Interior." That provision has never been changed or modified in any particular except in relation to the building of this proposed wagon road into the park. The survey of this wagon road and the building of the same, by virtue of the language of this provision making this $10,000 appropriation, are left within the jurisdiction of the War Department. I desired to make this matter of joint jurisdiction clear to the Members of the House before proceeding to the consideration of my amendment asking for $30,000 additional for further work on this wagon road.

I will also insert at this point in my remarks a copy of an official letter from the Secretary of the Interior to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, in which the Secretary states that his Department has no objection to the appropriation of $50,000 for the purpose of improving this park. The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 12, 1904.

Hon. J. R. BURTON,
Chairman Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, United States Senate.

SIR: Your letter of the 9th instant has been received, inclosing, with request for report thereon, Senate bill 342, for the improvement of the Mount Rainier National Park, in the State of Washington. The bill, in terms, is as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, to be expended under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, for the purpose of improving the Mount Rainier National Park, in the State of Washington, and for the protection of the park and the construction and repair of bridges, fences, and trails, and improvement and construction of roads."

In response thereto I have the honor to state that I have no objections to interpose to the passage of this bill, provided that the moneys therein authorized to be expended are made available until used.

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

Of course, it will be understood that this letter from the Department of the Interior is entirely separate and distinct from the recommendations of the War Department in relation to this park. Before I close my remarks I will show you that these two Departments in substance ask for $50,000 each for improvements in this park. The War Department asks for $30,000 to continue work upon this wagon road which has been surveyed, and the $50,000 which the Secretary of the Interior mentions is for the general improvement of the park and the construction and repair of bridges, fences, roads, and trails, and also for the general protection of the park.

Now, after this appropriation of $10,000 was made, a year ago, I called in person at the office of the Corps of Engineers of the War Department and asked that the survey of this wagon road be made as soon as possible and an estimate of the cost of the same be prepared as soon as the survey was completed, and that the same be forwarded from the local office in the State of Washington to Washington City in time for consideration by the Appropriation Committee this winter. My reason for being very anxious to have this estimate returned before the Appropriation Committee finished the consideration of this bill was that I had learned that in all cases of this kind where there was a proper estimate before the committee they usually made an appropriation of some amount, whether it was the full amount of the estimate or not.

Now, then, when I asked the War Department a short time ago to forward to the Appropriation Committee the estimate of money needed during the next year for work on this wagon road, you may imagine my surprise when that Department informed me that certain maps and estimates had been forwarded from the State of Washington to the War Department, but by reason of the sickness of one of the employees who made the survey that the detailed estimate had not yet been forwarded to the War Department, and that pending the receipt of such detailed report no estimate for this work during this present year had been forwarded to the Secretary of War for transmission to Congress. I attach hereto the letter of the Chief of Engineers to me upon this subject.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, March 21, 1904.

Hon. F. W. CUSHMAN,
House of Representatives of the United States.

DEAR SIR: 1. In compliance with your telephonic request, I take pleasure in furnishing you the following statement as to the status of the work on the survey of Mount Rainier National Park.

Work was authorized by sundry civil bill approved March 3, 1903. It was assigned by the Secretary of War to Maj. John Millis, Corps of Engineers. The work was begun July 9, 1903, and the field work of the survey completed late last fall. Maps and estimates were prepared during the winter, and on February 9, 1904, were forwarded to the Chief of Engineers.

2. Owing to the illness (typhoid fever) of the civilian employee who made the survey, the plans and estimates were not accompanied, as is usual, by a detailed report. Pending the receipt of such detailed report the estimates have not been forwarded to the Secretary of War for transmission to Congress. A telegram of Maj. John Millis, dated March 15, 1904, stated that the illness of the above-mentioned employee still continued, but that it was hoped to forward the detailed report in the near future.

3. The approximate cost of the survey, as made, amounted to about $5,000, and that, under the terms of the act providing for the survey, leaves $5,000 to be applied toward the construction of said road. This amount, however, is so small that in the absence of any additional appropriation by Congress it will hardly be worth while to begin work.

4. Major Millis's estimate of the cost of constructing the road is $183,000.50, which covers a road extending from the west boundary of the reserve via Longmire Springs, Cristino Falls, and Upper Paradise Valley to Camp of Clouds, a total distance of about 24½ miles. Of this amount it is estimated that $50,000 can be profitably expended in the fiscal year 1905.

5. For your information I also send a series of tracings, showing plan of the road, and a book of photographs taken during the progress of the survey. Please return the tracings and photographs when they have served your purpose, as they form part of the files of this office.

Very truly, yours,

A. MACKENZIE,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers,
United States Army.

Mr. Chairman, when I read that letter stating that no formal estimate for this work had been forwarded, I was confirmed in my belief that this park is indeed unfortunate as far as securing appropriations for its improvement is concerned. However, I called immediately in person upon the Chief of Engineers and explained this matter to him and the urgency thereof, and under the circumstances and having really sufficient data at hand he kindly consented to send a preliminary report and estimate on this proposition to Congress for consideration. This he did under date of March 22—six days ago. I will include that report in my remarks, it being as follows:

[House of Representatives, Document No. 631, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session.]

ROAD INTO MOUNT RAINIER NATIONAL PARK.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 22, 1904.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a letter of this date from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, submitting a preliminary report on the survey of a road into Mount Rainier National Park, as authorized by the provisions of an item contained in the sundry civil act approved March 3, 1903, as follows:

"Mount Rainier National Park: To enable the Secretary of War to cause a survey to be made of the most practicable route for a wagon road into said park, and toward the construction of said road after the survey herein provided for shall have been made, $10,000."

Very respectfully,

WM. H. TAFT,
Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, March 22, 1904.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith, for transmission to Congress, a preliminary report on the survey of a road into Mount Rainier National Park, as authorized by the following provision of the sundry civil act, approved March 3, 1903:

"Mount Rainier National Park: To enable the Secretary of War to cause a survey to be made of the most practicable route for a wagon road into said park, and toward the construction of said road after the survey herein provided for shall have been made, $10,000."

By authority of the Secretary of War the work provided for in the above act was assigned to the charge of Maj. John Millis, Corps of Engineers. Work was begun July 9, 1903, and the field work of the survey completed late last fall. Maps and estimates were prepared on February 9, 1904, and forwarded to this office. Owing to the illness (typhoid fever) of the civilian employee in charge of the survey party it has not been practicable as yet to submit a detailed report.

The route selected by Major Millis and covered by the survey extends from the west boundary of the reserve via Longmire Springs, Christine Falls, and upper Paradise Valley to Camp of Clouds, a total distance of about 24½ miles.

A detailed estimate of the cost of the work is as follows:

West boundary of reserve toward Longmire Springs, 5½ miles:
42 acres, clearing, at $150	$6,300.00
18 acres, grubbing, at $170	3,060.00
31,000 cubic yards earthwork, at 30 cents	9,300.00
54,000 square yards surfacing, at 5 cents	2,700.00
Drainage	465.00
5½ miles, at about $3,800		$21,825.00
Continuing to Longmire Springs, 4 miles:
30 acres, clearing, at $150	4,500.00
12 acres, grubbing, at $170	2,040.00
35,000 cubic yards earthwork, at 30 cents	10,500.00
1,000 cubic yards rockwork, at 60 cents	600.00
37,600 square yards surfacing, at 5 cents	1,880.00
Drainage	580.00
4 miles, at $5,050		20,100.00
Total to Longmire Springs, 9½ miles, at $4,300		41,925.00
Longmire Springs to Christine Falls, 4.4 miles:
32 acres, clearing, at $150	4,800.00
14 acres, grubbing, at $170	2,380.00
35,000 cubic yards earthwork, at 30 cents	10,500.00
1,200 cubic yards rockwork, at 60 cents	720.00
330 cubic yards retaining wall, at $1.25	412.50
41,400 square yards surfacing, at 5 cents	2,070.00
Drainage	678.00
4.4 miles, at $4,900		21,560.50
Christine Falls to Glacier, 1 mile:

Of this amount Major Millis estimates that $50,000 can be profitably expended in the fiscal year 1905.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. MACKENZIE,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

Hon. WILLIAM H. TAFT,
Secretary of War.

Now, Mr. Chairman, of course it was in entire harmony with the unfortunate financial history of this particular park that this report and estimate should reach the Appropriation Committee just about six hours after they had reported this sundry civil appropriation bill to the House—without any item of appropriation contained therein for this park.

Now, that in brief is the history of this matter. If this report and estimate had reached the Appropriation Committee six hours earlier I am convinced that they would have either appropriated $50,000, as recommended, or some portion of it for the continuation of the construction of this wagon road. As neither myself nor my colleagues on this floor were to blame for that delay I hope the Committee of the Whole will agree to this amendment which I have offered asking for $30,000. I desire in this connection also to state that I am not blaming any officer of the Government for this delay. It was a delay that was occasioned by the sickness of an employee, and no blame is properly attachable to anyone.

Now, out of this $10,000 heretofore appropriated for the survey of this wagon road the survey only cost $5,000. Therefore, we have now on hand $5,000 of this original amount, which we can apply on the cost of the construction of this wagon road. Now, if you will give us the $30,000 additional asked for in this proposed amendment, that will give us $35,000 with which to commence the real work of the improvement of this park. Of this amount $6,000 can be used by the Secretary of War in making a survey and estimate for a wagon road from the eastern boundary of the Mount Rainier Forest Reserve into said park. I certainly trust this amendment proposed by me will be adopted. With this statement I submit the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that no point of order has been made against the amendment.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I understand it is not subject to a point of order. It is work in progress. The estimate came to the committee after the bill had been reported. The Government has heretofore expended $10,000, or $10,000 was appropriated in the last sundry civil bill. Five thousand five hundred dollars has been expended, and therefore there is nearly $5,000 available for the construction of this road. They have commenced the construction of the road, and it is now up to Congress to determine whether they will continue it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, there are two propositions in this amendment. One is to continue work already commenced on a road from the west into this park, under an appropriation made in the last sundry civil bill, and a proposition for a survey and estimate of the cost of a wagon road from the east.

This park is on the summit of the Cascade Mountains and is approximately 18 miles square. Its scenic beauties must be seen to be realized or appreciated. Aside from the geysers and Grand Canyon, the beauties of the Yellowstone sink into insignificance beside the grandeur of this park. Beautiful streams, primeval forests, grand cataracts, eternal glaciers, and awe-inspiring mountains are found here as nowhere else in this country. No one can behold the scenes that here greet the eye and not be made better.

Standing on a mountain top within 10 miles of lofty Rainier, one seems to feel the presence of that mighty hand which molded the universe. You see a vast field of hills and hollows, dells and vales, fringed with evergreen and veined with threads of silver, while here and there are lofty mountains capped with eternal snows. Mount Rainier, Mount Adams, Mount Hood, Mount St. Helens, Three Sisters, and Mount Baker rise in majestic beauty above the crest of the Cascade range and stand like sentinels, guarding the priceless treasures of nature.

For ages the beauties which no words can portray delighted the eye of Omnipotence. It is a wise policy that will make them accessible to the people, and the more easily accessible the better. To visit them is to receive an inspiration that makes one a better man and a better citizen.

We want to get into this park: we want the people of the country to get into it. We want you people of the East to visit the Yellowstone and view its wonders, and then we want you to come and see the grandeur and beauty of a section far surpassing Switzerland.

I am glad the chairman of the committee does not oppose this amendment, and I trust it will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park: For continuing the establishment of the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park: for the compensation and expenses of two civilian commissioners, maps, surveys, clerical and other assistance, messenger, office expenses, and all other necessary expenses; foundations for State monuments; mowing; historical tablets, iron and bronze; iron gun carriages; for roads and their maintenance, inclosing Point Park; in all, $40,000.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 111, line 21, after the word "dollars," insert:

"Provided further, To enable the Secretary of War, through the Commissioners of the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park, to improve the road from Crawfish Springs, Ga., through the Widow Davis crossroads and Baileys crossroads to Stevens Gap, a distance of 12 miles, $25,000.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] whether this road is outside of the park?

Mr. MADDOX. A good portion of it is. I will say that I would just as soon the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] would make the point of order at this time.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is new legislation, as it is the construction of a road not on Government property.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. MADDOX. I realize that this has been ruled out before on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I felt, however, impelled to offer it now. At this time I shall move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I notice that $40,000 is here appropriated for Chickamauga Park. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations what is the amount of fixed expenses of that park, how much money is left, after the salaries of the officers down there have been paid, to expend on that park? That is what I want to find out.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Salaries of commissioners and clerks, $16,836; completion of forest roads, $15,000; McFarland Gap road, one-half mile, $3,000; regulating Point Park, including wall and gateway, $9,600; guttering of 5 miles of important roads, $5,000; general maintenance of roads, painting tablets and gun carriages, foundations, monuments, stationery, printing, and miscellaneous supplies, $4,000. There is a total there expended of $39,936, of which the sum of $16,836 was expended for salaries of commissioners and clerks.

Mr. MADDOX. Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wanted to draw out that fact. Is it not a ridiculous proposition? Here are three commissioners and a whole lot of salaried officers down there who are paid $16,000 in order that they may expend $40,000. We had this question up some two or three years ago, and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], whom I do not now see in his seat, then said that he had a bill which, I think, had been favorably reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, in which bill it was intended to put all of these national parks under one commission. That can be readily done.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman remembers, the Committee on Appropriations last year reported a provision doing away with all these commissions and put them in charge of a single officer, and the Committee on Military Affairs, I think, scolded us for it, made the point of order against our provision, and it went out.

Mr. MADDOX. Well, it does seem to me as though we ought to take this matter in hand ourselves. I remember that when our present Speaker was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations we had this same little debate about this subject, and he then expressed himself as favoring just what I am declaring now, that it is an outrage on this Government. Three commissioners can take charge of all these parks scattered all over this land, and then we will have an abundance of commissioners, so far as that is concerned. We have three commissioners at Chickamauga, two from civil life and one from military life, and I dare say that with the exception of General Stuart, who is now at Chattanooga, not one of them has spent twenty days in twelve months on that park. This money we are expending is supposed to be for the building up and beautifying of the park. I say, is it not time to call a halt? Three commissioners in the city of Washington can take charge of Gettysburg, Chickamauga, Shiloh, and all the other parks, if necessary, and then we can appoint a superintendent.

I believe we have only a superintendent up here at Gettysburg. He represents this Government on that great battlefield, and yet we have these three commissioners down there at Chickamauga, together with an engineer, an assistant superintendent, and a superintendent, and a whole lot of other officers doing absolutely nothing, and this continues from year to year. Everyone agrees with me, at least most of the Members do, yet we can not do anything in the matter.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I suggest that the Committee on Appropriations tried to do something along that line, but we can not legislate on an appropriation bill, and so the matter went out on a point of order.

Mr. MADDOX. I understand that, but I want to know what has become of the bill introduced by my friend Mr. PARKER? He promised to fix this thing three years ago.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that he ask unanimous consent to incorporate that kind of a provision in this bill.

Mr. MADDOX. I will, if they will allow me and give me some time in which to draw it. I think we ought to abolish all these commissioners for these parks and establish one centrally located in the city of Washington with jurisdiction over all of them, and then let them appoint a superintendent, if necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX], I ask unanimous consent to later on offer a provision here, and would ask in that connection unanimous consent that in passing this item I may have the privilege to later recur to it and at that time offer the provision which was upon the sundry civil bill last year.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to offer, at a later time, an amendment to the paragraph just read. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, does that mean that the amendment would be subject to a point of order?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, my amendment would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. Then I suppose the gentleman means to ask unanimous consent to pass the item?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not mean to prevent anyone from making a point of order. I simply wish to offer the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman simply asks unanimous consent to return to this item.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Anybody would have the right to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY]; and permission is given.

The Clerk read as follows:

Shiloh National Military Park: For continuing the work of establishing a national military park on the battlefield of Shiloh, Tenn.; for the compensation of three civilian commissioners and the secretary, clerical and other services, labor, land, and historical tablets, maps and surveys, roads, purchase and transportation of supplies and materials, office and other necessary expenses, $20,000.

Mr. MADDOX. Can the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations tell us the expenses of maintaining this Shiloh National Military Park?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The items as I have them before me are as follows:

SHILOH NATIONAL MILITARY PARK.

Salaries	$12,000
Office expenses	1,500
Traveling expenses	300
Three concrete bridges to replace wooden structures	3,000
Labor on clearing land and extending roads and on State monument foundations	10,000
House for office and headquarters of the Commission	5,000
Incidentals	2,000
Total	35,000

The Clerk read as follows:

Gettysburg National Park: For continuing the work of establishing the national park at Gettysburg, Pa.; for the acquisition of lands, surveys, and maps; constructing, improving, and maintaining avenues, roads, and bridges thereon; making fences and gates; marking the lines of battle with tablets and guns, each tablet bearing a brief legend giving historic facts, and compiled without censure and without praise; preserving the features of the battlefield and the monuments thereon; providing for a suitable office for the commissioners in Gettysburg; compensation of three civilian commissioners, clerical and other services; expenses and labor; the purchase and preparation of tablets and gun carriages and placing them in position, and all other expenses incidental to the foregoing, $60,000.

Mr. MAHON. I move to amend by striking out at the end of the paragraph just read "$60,000" and inserting "$100,000." In connection with this amendment I ask the chairman of the committee to state the various expenses, including salaries of commissioners, etc., for the maintenance of this park.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The expenses, according to the statement which I have before me, are—

GETTYSBURG NATIONAL PARK.

Salaries: Commissioners, etc	$18,000
Miscellaneous expenses of establishment	1,500
Land and legal expenses	9,000
Road construction	10,000
Bridges and fencing	6,000
Monuments, tablets, towers, etc	500
Stationery and printing	300
Labor	11,000
Rent	340
Fuel, ice, forage, and miscellaneous	3,000
Road repairs	360
Total	60,000

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I live within a few miles of this great battlefield; I am thoroughly familiar with every portion of it. We have there three commissioners, whose salaries and expenses amount to $18,000 a year. Now, I do not think anyone would object to a proper expenditure for the building of roads in connection with this Gettysburg National Park. In this bill we appropriate in the aggregate for this park $60,000. We have there 40 miles of the finest macadamized roads in the country. A few miles are built every year. The method of the commissioners is about this: They go upon a man's farm and start condemnation proceedings, taking possibly half an acre, an acre, or 3 or 4 acres, as the case may be, right in the middle of the farm. The result is that the people owning land in that part of the country are in many cases practically denied the right to sell their property. Speaking for myself, I would not be willing to buy one of those farms within a certain radius of the battlefield, because of its liability to that sort of proceedings. I should not feel at liberty to put up any improvements, lest that any time condemnation proceedings might be started.

When such proceedings have been started the commissioners go away up to Scranton, 200 miles distant, and have a jury appointed to come down and fix the value of the land. Then the landowner takes an appeal. By the time the proceeding is finished an acre of land when finally condemned has probably cost $300 to $400.

I think the chairman of the committee will agree with me in my reasons for asking an increase of this appropriation. These roads have been projected. The avenues have been named after generals who were engaged in the battle there—for instance, there is Hancock avenue and Slocum avenue. Then, too, there is Confederate avenue, a mile long. Now, I say, let us complete these roads and be done with the matter. This commission can easily expend $100,000 there next year. In the course of a few years the whole system of roads can be completed.

I remember, Mr. Chairman, that some years ago—it was since I have been a Member of this House—the Military Committee, I believe it was, proposed an appropriation of $75,000 for the completion of these roads and avennes; and that commission asked that the appropriation be made $50,000. All these commissiors are simply twiddling and diddling along, expending as little money as they can and holding on to their positions. This policy is costing this Government thousands of dollars.

Now, let us be a little liberal. Let us give this commission $100,000 for the construction of these roads. I have no doubt that they will spend it properly. What is the use of making an appropriation of simply $60,000 for roads on this great battlefield, while something like $18,000 is spent for salaries and other incidental expenses connected with the commission? Let this system of road construction be completed promptly.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, we have already expended $715,000 on the Gettysburg Park. We propose to appropriate in this bill $60,000 more. I do not believe there is any necessity for expending a larger sum during the next fiscal year. There is no recommendation from the Department for a larger appropriation.

Mr. MAHON. We shall never get such a recommendation.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I repeat there is no recommendation from the Department in favor of a greater expenditure than $60,000.

Mr. MADDOX. I dare say now you have given every cent that these park commissioners have asked.

Mr. HEMENWAY. We have.

Mr. MADDOX. The gentleman over there is exactly right. They do not intend to ask for anything to finish this job. They want to hang on.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman will permit me, my judgment is that it was finished long ago, if they will just quit. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. MAHON. The gentleman says there have been $720,000 expended.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Seven hundred and fifteen thousand dollars have been appropriated since 1896 for this park.

Mr. MAHON. How much of that has gone into the park?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, I can only judge by this report here. In one year we appropriated $82,000; in another, $75,000; in another, $80,000; and in another, $75,000. This last fiscal year we appropriated $60,000. Of that, $18,000 went for expenses of the commission, and so forth.

Mr. DALZELL. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for a question?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I yield.

Mr. DALZELL. Is there not a resident superintendent on the ground at Gettysburg?

Mr. MAHON. No; only at the cemetery.

Mr. HEMENWAY. No doubt the gentleman from Pennsylvania knows more about it than I do—I understand there is a superintendent.

Mr. MAHON. No; they have the commission, and then they have men guarding the park.

Mr. DALZELL. If there is a superintendent over there—and there used to be—I should like to know what these commissioners are for? What do they do?

Mr. MAHON. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. They are for ornamental purposes.

Mr. MAHON. There is a superintendent of the cemetery, but not of the park.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he will have to get that information from the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. DALZELL. I should like to know what duties are performed by the commissioners?

Mr. MADDOX. They are in this for the salary.

Mr. MAHON. I want to say one word. There is a superintendent of the cemetery, but not of the park. He takes care of the cemetery and has nothing to do with the battlefield. There are three commissioners. Now, gentlemen talk about the expenditure of $720,000. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, do you know that there are $1,400,000 worth of monuments on that battlefield that have not cost this Government one cent? The State of Pennsylvania purchased land, and associations formed by the regimental and brigade divisions of the Army from New York, Pennsylvania, and some of the Western States that fought the battle have purchased the land on which to erect their monuments. Some years ago the State of Pennsylvania and all these monumental associations conveyed to the United States Government all the land without the cost of one dollar to the United States. It belongs to the Government to-day.

Now, as I said before, that is the great historic battlefield of the country. You can not inscribe on any one of those monuments any sentiment of any kind. You merely have the name of the colonel or the general commanding the brigade and the number of men who were killed and wounded in action. It is to be an historic field and nothing else. We have preserved all lines. There is not a regiment on the Confederate side, there is not a brigade of the Confederate army, there is not a division whose location has not been marked with iron tablets, so that, in the future, if you gentlemen from the Southland want to put monuments to your brave men who fought and died on that field, you can put them there. We made that rule, that no sentiment should go onto a monument, in order to open the way for you, so that you can erect your monuments on that field.

Now, that battle was fought more than forty years ago. This commission has been in existence for about twenty years, I believe, and still we are making appropriations of $60,000 a year, to build those great avenues. Why, Confederate avenue alone is a mile long—a magnificent road. Every gun that was used on that line on the second day's battle, every cannon, is there in place to-day, with the name of the captain and the name of the officer who commanded it.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Was not all that matter of the location of the guns and the different points upon the battlefield done by these commissioners after hearing evidence on both sides, of Confederate and Union generals?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; it is all finished now. The only thing we are doing now is to construct these great avenues, to make macadamized roads. I ask this House to appropriate $100,000, so that this work may be completed and done with without having the Commission around from year to year.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. MAHON. Certainly.

Mr. SOUTHARD. That may be true as to Gettysburg, but is it true as to the Vicksburg park?

Mr. MAHON. I do not know anything about that. There is no recommendation for over $60,000. The Battlefield Commissioners of Gettysburg sent in their estimate for $60,000. That estimate is sent here from the War Department, and you never get it above $60,000.

Mr. HEMENWAY. We appropriated $75,000 for the fiscal year 1903, $80,000 for the fiscal year 1902, and $75,000 for the fiscal year 1901. They have not laid out work that will cost more than $60,000 for the next fiscal year.

Mr. MAHON. As an individual, if I had a contract to do $60,000 worth of work, if I had to pay a foreman $18,000 there is not a man in this House but what knows I would become bankrupt. Why should we pay this man $18,000? I ask that this amendment may be agreed to, making it $100,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, states that he proposes to offer an amendment, which will be subject to a point of order, in reference to these commissioners. I suggest to the gentleman that there is a much easier way to get at it by striking out this appropriation for these three commissioners.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, no! I do not believe in legislating in that way. Of course they could go ahead and sue the Government in the Court of Claims and get a judgment for their salary. The only way to stop these commissioners is to meet it square in the face by legislative enactment on an appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman proposes to oppose this item and insert an item in the appropriation bill which would be in conflict with another item of the appropriation bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. No; I propose by legislation to abolish these commissioners.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman proposes to abolish the commissioners in one part of the bill, while there is another item appropriating for them.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. But there are other items that we have already passed as to some of these. If these commissioners ought not to be in existence we will give the committee a chance to vote on it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman will permit me for a moment.

Mr. MANN. Always.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If these commissioners were abolished there would be no necessity for the payment of their salaries.

Mr. MANN. If this item remains in the bill, making appropriation for these commissioners, they probably will still be appropriated for. The item would be contrary to another item of the bill. Now, if the gentleman proposes to offer his amendment that it go out of the bill, then there is another item to strike out the compensation of the three commissioners, and I shall make a motion, if the gentleman will not, and give the committee a chance to vote upon it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the amendment I offer is adopted, why, by unanimous consent, we can strike out all of these items.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether that can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HEMENWAY. We will dispose of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania first, and then I will offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that the presentation of the amendment be deferred until debate on the pending amendment is closed and the vote is taken. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. MANN. I have said all I care to say, and I yield the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to know what the pending amendment is.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I only rose to say that if an attempt is made to abolish the commissioners of these parks, I shall then want to have something to say about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the pending amendment, offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Now, I offer the following amendment, Mr. Chairman, which I think will do just as well to come in after the word "available," on page 113.

The CHAIRMAN. We have not as yet reached that point.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then let it go in right where it is—on page 112, after the words "sixty thousand dollars," in line 17.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 17, page 112, after the word "dollars," the following:

"The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to prepare and submit, in the annual estimates, at the next session of Congress, a proposition providing for the consolidation of the existing commissions having charge of the several national military parks, or substituting therefor a commission, consisting of one or more members, to have charge and direction, under the War Department, of the future improvement, care, and maintenance of all of said military parks. The Secretary of War shall also submit estimates for each of said parks in accordance with the proposition herein required to be submitted."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, to that amendment I reserve the point of order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to be understood that the point of order will be renewed if it is withdrawn.

Mr. HULL. If it is withdrawn, anybody else will have the right to make it at once. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that during the last Congress the Committee on Military Affairs took up this question, and after considering it for some time came to the conclusion that when the parks were finished it would be a good idea to consolidate the commission; but I do not believe it is possible for any one commission to properly look after the interests of the Government. Take, for instance, Vicksburg; they are just commencing practically the main part of their work, and to abolish that commission and put it into the hands of a fewer number of men would, in my judgment, be unwise for the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Was the gentleman from Iowa in a moment ago when it was disclosed that $16,000 salary was being paid at Chickamauga for the purpose of expending $40,000, of which this $16,000 was a part?

Mr. HULL. It is a little more than the expenditure of money. It is looking after the whole interests of the park in addition to the money appropriated. I am very free to confess that if these works were completed, it would be in the interest of economy to consolidate all of the commissions in one commission and under one head.

Mr. BURLESON. Is it not a fact that all of the work has been completed except the Vicksburg Park?

Mr. HULL. Practically; there is some work going on at Shiloh.

Mr. BURLESON. Then there is only one to look after, and that is Vicksburg.

Mr. HULL. No; the Vicksburg commissioners have had for the last year a constant study as to the lines and as to the proper marking of them. They have been hearing testimony from my State as to what time the regiments went into action, what should be inscribed on the monuments erected to mark the places for each regiment, and all those details. They have got together a vast amount of information at the expense of the Government. Now, not more than one of that commission could be placed on a consolidated commission, and none might be placed on it, and so it seems to me that the House would be doing a wrong at this time to arbitrarily consolidate all these commissions.

I think it will come in the next three years, and I think it ought to come, but I do not think the time has come yet to make that change. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman what will be the objection to getting this information called for in the amendment for the next session of Congress and then enact legislation to take effect at a future date?

Mr. HULL. Well, I think it would be all right to make it take effect in 1907 or possibly in 1906.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. What is the objection to getting the information called for by the amendment and having it available at the next session of Congress and legislate acordingly?

Mr. HULL. I will state that that is what the Military Committee is trying to do—to pass a bill to consolidate the commission at a time when it will do no injury to the Government.

Mr. HEMENWAY. This amendment of mine simply provides that the Secretary of War shall secure the information and report to the next session of Congress a recommendation stating as to whether or not in his judgment these commissions can be abolished, and the whole work go into the hands of one man or a commission. It does not bind Congress to follow the recommendation at all, but simply asks that the Secretary of War shall get together the facts and make a recommendation to the next session of Congress.

Mr. HULL. We had that information from the Department at the close of the last session, and I think the Department believes that it can be done, and we expect to continue the hearing and report a bill at the next session. Mr. PARKER, of New Jersey, has gone into this subject very fully. If this amendment only calls for information, I am not particular about it, but the Military Committee is doing the very line of work suggested by the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The House has not had the information.

Mr. HULL. Some information has been submitted by the gentleman from New Jersey in a report on this very subject, and his report was made to the Fifty-seventh Congress. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] have given this subject much time, and during the next year I think the Committee on Military Affairs will report a measure to bring about a proper consolidation of all these commissions.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, it is true these various military park commissions involve a relatively large expense, but I hope the House will heed the suggestions made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] looking to their abolition next year. These commissioners are more than mere caretakers of the grounds. I speak particularly of Chickamauga, because as a boy in the ranks I was in that battle, and several years ago I was there again with General Stuart, of the Confederate army, and General Boynton, of the Union Army, and noted their critical knowledge of the relative positions of the lines of the two armies at various stages of the battle, and with what care they endeavored to locate the positions occupied by different commands during the engagement, in order that the monuments and markers should be properly placed. The commissioners are presumed to be thorough students of the battlefields with which they have to do.

They know, or are supposed to know, from the best data obtainable, except possibly the men who were on the ground, the relative and absolute positions occupied by batteries, regiments of infantry and cavalry during an engagement, where general officers fell, and where crucial points in the battle were contended for. They have not only made a thorough study of the field and of official reports, but have gone with surviving participants time and again seeking to locate the position of various commands. This is all important for the truth of history, and can only be determined by those who were there.

Those who visit these fields of strife in the great war will want to feel that the position of the troops are correctly marked. The main point, as I understand it, of the duties of these Commissioners is to see that the lines of battle are properly indicated and that the markers and monuments are so situated as to correctly represent the positions occupied by the troops at the time the battles were fought, not at Chickamauga alone nor at Gettysburg, but in all the military parks owned and cared for by the Government.

I perfectly agree with the gentleman from Iowa that when this has been done, and it will be done very soon, then it will be well to pass a law limiting the amount that the Government shall pay out for general supervision and care. This is now too much except for the reasons I have just stated. These battlefields for a thousand years to come will be the Mecca of patriotic Americans, and from them they will drink in common lessons of patriotism, of fidelity, and devotion to the Union. Let us now, while men live who can mark the positions, complete this work we are engaged in and then make retrenchments.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that something ought to be done to decrease or do away with the cost of caring for these national parks. I would be in favor of this amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], but it seems to me that it covers something which obviously ought not to be done. I notice in the report of the committee that the appropriation for Chickamauga Park last year was $40,000. The estimated appropriation for 1905 is also $40,000; for Gettysburg last year it was $60,000, and the estimated appropriation for 1905 is also $60,000. The appropriation for Shiloh was $10,000. The estimated appropriation for 1905 is also $10,000. When we get to Vicksburg, the appropriation for 1904 we find was $50,000, while the estimated appropriation for 1905 is $100,000.

I happen to know something about what the commission in charge of the Vicksburg Park is doing. I know they have just commenced a great work at that place. I know enough about it to know that no new commission could take up that work and go on with it as advantageously as the present commission. Obviously no new commission could be appointed to take the place of that commission, and the amendment which the gentleman from Indiana has offered ought to be such as to preclude the possibility of any change in the commission at Vicksburg Park at this time. It seems to me that is obviously true. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] has stated that part of what the work of this commission consists of is the laying out of the park, determining the great historical points in the park, and that that is a great study. It is something that requires not only critical study, but study for a considerable period of time. I think that the situation at Vicksburg Park is such that no amendment or proposition to consolidate these different boards ought to interfere with.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, as I said before, this subject has been under discussion for some time, and some two years ago—I believe exactly two years ago, in the Fifty-seventh Congress—the present Speaker of the House and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] and myself had some controversy about the matter. The Speaker of this House, then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, replying to the gentleman from New Jersey, said:

> Now, I want to say to my friend from New Jersey that of all these commissions, so far as I know and believe, the Chickamauga Commission has done its work most promptly, and I was gratified when General Boynton, one of these commissioners, in the examination and hearings before the subcommittee, stated that after this year there was no further use for that commission; that he was satisfied that one commissioner could do the work, or it could be done without a commissioner. That is a little extraordinary when somebody that belongs to a commission should suggest that at some time it may be dispensed with.

Now, this is from one of the oldest Commissioners that we have and probably one of the most experienced. I take it for granted that if we were to appoint a national committee, he, General Boynton, would be at the head of it. According to our present Speaker, at that time he made the statement that that commission had served its usefulness, and that there is now no further necessity for it. Who knows better than he? The gentleman on my right here said that we ought to finish this work. The difficulty about most of these Commissioners is that they do not ask for appropriations large enough to ever finish the work. That is not the thing they are after. They do not want to finish the job. General Boynton says that his is finished, practically; that one Commissioner can look after it, or even no Commissioner at all. What I have contended for all the time is that three Commissioners located in the city of Washington can attend to all this business and do it just as well and better, perhaps, because then they will have enough to keep them busy—that is, if they take charge of all of the military parks.

The Chickamauga battlefield is in my district. These points that gentlemen are talking about are all located. They have all been surveyed and marked out. Any State that wants to erect a monument will find the space for it already determined. Parties wanting to locate these monuments can go there and will find everything in readiness for them. One commissioner, if necessary, sitting here in Washington, can give directions to any State or organization of troops as to where its monuments belong, because there is a map prepared of the whole battlefield showing where all the troops were engaged. But in addition to that we have here the evidence of General Boynton, given before the committee—and he is one of the most experienced men in this business that I ever knew—that so far as Chickamauga is concerned the necessity for commissioners no longer exists. Instead of paying one-half of the appropriation of every year for officers' salaries, let it be spent on the park under the supervision of a superintendent, who can do the work better than forty high-priced commissioners.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I rose originally to make a point of order against this amendment because, as I understood, it proposed at once to dispense with these commissions. I want only to say now that I recognize the time will come when there will be no necessity for these commissions, and certainly their abolition will be a matter of retrenchment that every member of the committee would like to vote for whenever it is the proper thing to do.

The suggestion made by the chairman of the committee, as I understand, is simply to call upon the Secretary of War for a report to be furnished next December taking into consideration the proposition to consolidate these boards into one general central authority. Members of this Committee of the Whole must see how widely members of the committee differ upon this point.

Some think that at present we might abolish these commissions and trust to the formation of a single central authority. Others seem to be opposed to any change and want to keep these commissions right along. It seems to me that a middle course and a fair ground to stand upon would be to adopt the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee, and let us secure the information which his proposition contemplates.

I do not quite agree with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] that the work at Chickamauga is entirely accomplished. He will bear in mind——

Mr. MADDOX. The gentleman will allow me to say that in stating that the work there was finished I did not give that statement as my own conclusion. I quoted it from General Boynton himself.

Mr. GROSVENOR. He was speaking of Chickamauga proper. But under the present arrangements, as I understand, the title of that park is now Chattanooga and Chickamauga National Park——

Mr. MADDOX. It always has been.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Which takes in a series of monuments—quite a number of them not yet erected—one proposed to be put on Orchard Knob by the State of Ohio, and another at another point, and there is a very bitter controversy among gentlemen now as to where a certain brigade ascended Missionary Ridge at the battle of that name. Those are things which as yet seem to be unfinished.

As to the battlefield of Chickamauga proper, everything, it seems to me, is done. The monuments are there. My friend from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] has commented upon the fact that the monument of my regiment is there, one which Ohio builded long ago. Before I was a Member of Congress 153 monuments were erected under the supervision of a commission of which I was a member. The most active member of that commission was the present postmaster of the House, Captain McElroy, who knows more about the battlefield of Chickamauga in all its details than any other living man—more than the men who made official reports of the battle; for Captain McElroy has had the benefit of a thorough study not only of the reports, but of the physical features of the field itself, and was a gallant soldier in the battle.

I agree, therefore, there is no occasion for a commission so far as the completion of Chickamauga is concerned, and I have no doubt that next December we shall have a report, backed up by the unanimous voice of the commission itself, that the purpose of this amendment may be carried into effect. I quite concur in what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER] has said, that these commissions ought to complete their work, and I believe that the time has come when, by obtaining such information as this amendment contemplates, we shall be ready to act intelligently at the proper time.

Mr. HULL. I make a point of order on the amendment, and ask for a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

California Débris Commission: For defraying the expenses of the Commission in carrying on the work authorized by the act of Congress approved March 1, 1893, $15,000.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of line 22, page 114, the following words, viz: "No part of the said sum shall be expended except in the reimbursement of the commission or members thereof for expenses actually incurred in the performance of their duties in carrying on said work, which said expenses shall not have been paid nor be payable from any other fund."

Mr. OLMSTED. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if there is any objection to that amendment?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order. The California Members, who are particularly informed about this item, are not here, and I hope the gentleman will not offer the amendment.

Mr. OLMSTED. The act authorizing the commission says the commissioners shall be officers of the United States Engineer Corps. This is simply for the expenses of the commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear this discussion.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I was simply asking the gentleman if he would not withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HULL. What is the object of it?

Mr. OLMSTED. I do not want them to get pay out of two or three funds, that is all.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Here is what occurred in the committee:

STATEMENT OF MAJ. F. H. HODGES, CORPS OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. GILLETT. "For defraying the expenses of the Commission in carrying on the work authorized by the act of Congress approved March 1, 1893, $15,000." Last year you also had $15,000, and for several years preceding?

Major HODGES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GILLETT. Is it to do the same work?

Major HODGES. Yes, sir; it is simply clerical work. It is looking after hydraulic mining, and regulating hydraulic mining, in the State of California. The gold mining has brought down a large amount of silt and gravel, where the mining is carried on, into some navigable rivers; and it is a question of impounding that débris in order to protect the navigable rivers. This Commission is authorized to regulate that in this way, in that it passes upon permits. The law requires that any person desiring to enter into the business of hydraulic mining must first obtain a permit of a certain character; and this Commission passes upon these permits.

Mr. GILLETT. What are they?

Major HODGES. They are engineers stationed in San Francisco. When it is actual construction work that is to be done—as it is, for instance, in the Yerba—the commission works in conjunction with the State of California. A large sum was appropriated in the last river and harbor act for construction work in the Yerba River; and half of the amount for supervision and regulation by the commission was appropriated for by the State of California and half by the Government. This, however, is simply for the expenses of maintaining the office and in visiting localities and the issuance of permits, etc.

I am afraid the gentleman's amendment will work the destruction of this commission, and I hope he will not press it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Indiana to reserve the point of order.

Mr. OLMSTED. I do not think the amendment is subject to a point of order. It is simply a limitation upon the appropriation which is for the expenses of this commission.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I hope the gentleman will not press the amendment. I am pretty sure that if adopted it will destroy the value of this commission. I understand they are doing valuable work. I am not very familiar with it.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, if I may be heard upon the amendment——

Mr. HEMENWAY. I reserve the point of order, so that the gentleman can be heard.

Mr. OLMSTED. This commission was appointed by act of 1893 for the purpose of preventing the accumulation of débris in the rivers in California, resulting from mining. The commission is composed of three officers of the United States Engineer Corps. I know of no reason why such a commission should have been appointed for California more than for any other State. In Pennsylvania we have mountains of débris, resulting from mining, washed down into the rivers by every flood, doing damage to property, obstructing navigation, and so forth. But this commission has been appointed. These commissioners are paid their salaries as officers of the United States Army, and the act of 1893 provides that they shall receive no other compensation. The same act provides for the levying of a tax of 3 per cent upon the gross receipts of certain hydraulic mining, and that constitutes a fund from which some of the expenses of this commission are paid.

I assume also that provision is made in the army appropriation bill for traveling and other expenses of these army officers, the same as for other army officers of like grade. Now we have this third appropriation of $15,000 for the expenses of this commission, and my amendment simply provides that no part of it shall be paid except in reimbursement of actual expenses which have not been paid and are not payable out of any other fund. In other words, I do not desire that this appropriation shall constitute an additional compensation of $5,000 per annum to each of these commissioners.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have nothing further to say on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment seems to provide, first, that nothing shall be paid from this appropriation except the expenses of the commission or members thereof; second, that no expenses shall be paid except those which have not been paid or provided for from some other fund. Both these branches of the amendment would seem to be a limitation on the appropriation, and the point of order is overruled. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I hope the committee will vote down the amendment. There is much work connected with this commission that has got to be paid for that can not be paid if the amendment of the gentleman should prevail.

Mr. OLMSTED. If there is any work that has to be done, this amendment does not prevent the payment for it. It simply seeks to prevent two payments for the same work.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The book which the gentleman read from did not disclose the necessity for this amendment. I think if the amendment is put in here at all it would hamper and possibly destroy this commission.

Mr. OLMSTED. It simply provides against two payments for the same service.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think not.

Mr. OLMSTED. I ask to have the amendment again reported, so that it may be understood.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was put upon agreeing to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. OLMSTED. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 29, noes 48.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For farm, including the same objects specified under this head for the Central Branch, $10,500.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after line 9, page 119, the following:
"For the construction of a new barrack, $35,000."

Mr. HEMENWAY. I hope the gentleman will let this go as it is.

Mr. OTJEN. Do you make the point of order?

Mr. HEMENWAY. No; it is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. OTJEN. I would like to make a brief statement.

Mr. Chairman, the Northwestern Branch for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers is situated in the Fourth Congressional district of Wisconsin, the district which I have the honor to represent. During last summer and last fall I paid several visits to this Home and inspected every part of it. From those visits I became thoroughly convinced that it was the duty of the Government to build an additional barrack—a two-story building that would accommodate about 150 men, one that is light, airy, warm, comfortable, and cheerful, such a building as they already have upon the grounds. That which struck me most unpleasantly in going over the Home was to see men housed in basements. One of these basements is known at the Home as the "gopher hole," and I am credibly informed that if they leave their shoes or clothing undisturbed for a few days they become moldy and musty.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the management can not be blamed for this condition of things, because the Home is filled from cellar to garret. Away up in the cupola in the main building men have been placed. The hall that was built for their amusement and recreation has been used and cots put in. Now, Mr. Chairman, I fully indorse the committee in its policy of economy in all things that are reasonable, but I do not believe we can economize in a matter of this kind. I do not believe where the health and comfort of these old men are at stake that we have a right to economize. It will probably be said that we are building a new Home in the South, known as the "Mountain Home," and we are building a sanitarium in South Dakota, which will relieve the condition of this and other Homes. I am of the opinion that this view is an error. I believe that the Home in the South will be practically filled by men living within a radius of 200 miles of that Home, and the sanitarium in South Dakota will take care of but a few hundred men. I venture the assertion that not for ten years to come will the demand for admission to these Homes be lessened.

These old men, over whose lives the shadow of night is so rapidly falling, and who are old and worn and have lost their vitality, who have not the vital force to resist disease, ought not to be housed in basements. We ought to place them in a light, airy, cheerful barracks, where they can spend the closing days of their lives with reasonable comfort. We ought to take care of these old veterans, the surviving heroes of that great civil strife, I think carefully and properly or not at all. I believe if this honorable committee which prepared this bill could go through this Home and make an examination and see these men in these basements there would be no opposition to inserting this amendment. I hope the amendment will be adopted. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, with all that the gentleman from Wisconsin has said as to the care of the old veterans I agree. There is no question about that; we all agree that they should be well cared for. But I do not think any man can truthfully say that this great Government is not taking care of them, as far as Soldiers' Homes are concerned, and taking care of them well. This is one of the oldest Homes we have. We have appropriated at different times for improvements there, and in this bill we provide, for elevators in the different barracks, $7,500. The buildings are only three stories high; but the inmates are getting old, and we put in elevators, so that they will not have to walk up the stairway. We put in for repairs at this Branch $35,000.

Now, we have constructed the Danville Branch, which takes care of many soldiers; we are constructing the Mountain Branch, which takes care of many soldiers; we are constructing the new Home at Hot Springs, N. Dak., which takes care of many more. In fact, we now have in course of construction barracks and quarters that will take care of about 1,200 additional inmates, and it was demonstrated beyond question that when the new Homes are completed, which will be during this fiscal year, we will take care of a great many more soldiers than we ever have had at any one time in these Homes.

Mr. OTJEN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. OTJEN. It is true, is it not, that the Board of Managers of the Soldiers Homes recommended barracks built at this point?

Mr. HEMENWAY. They recommended that barracks be built in a number of places, but when the question was put as to the necessity of these buildings, in view of the construction that was going on at the Mountain Home and at the sanitarium in North Dakota, and in view of the additional building at Danville, they admitted that we were correct and that there were places enough. Then they went further and agreed that hereafter all construction at Homes shall be of a temporary character.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, there is another point I wish to emphasize in connection with what the chairman of the committee has said touching this matter. We have in the country a large number of State and Territorial Homes. In the hearings it was ascertained that these Homes, or at least a number of them, are not taxed nearly to their maximum capacity. There is a system of transfer existing between the National and State Homes, and vice versa, and the Government can have any soldier maintained in a State Home for $100. I can not say whether that is economy for the General Government or not, and yet, counting all the circumstances attending the National Home, I presume that it is.

The committee believe that we have reached or nearly reached the maximum of demand for our disabled soldiers of the civil war, and that we ought not, unless it seems really necessary, to expend more money in permanent improvements if our veterans, old and decrepit as they are, can be properly cared for without.

The case made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. OTJEN] may be true at every point, and yet we have in sight accommodations for 1,200 additional soldiers within a few months outside of the State Homes where many can be cared for, in addition to what we have now, as well as they are in the National Homes.

Mr. OTJEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. OTJEN. The gentleman means that there will be accommodation afforded in the Southern Home, in the Mountain Home?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. There are at least three Homes where permanent improvements are being made that will accommodate in the aggregate about twelve hundred. Am I right?

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is about right.

Mr. OTJEN. Does not the gentleman think that in the vicinity of the Southern Home there will be a great many applicants right directly around the Home that will very nearly fill it?

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I learned on inquiry that men from that section of the country are in all our National Homes; that they are all asking to be transferred to the Home in East Tennessee, and to that extent it will relieve the congestion in the other Homes and provide for additional ones that may come.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs, including the same objects specified under this head for the Central Branch, $26,000.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 120, after line 2, insert: "For extension and alteration of the hospital, $25,000."

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I will state that since the bill has been reported to the House it has been demonstrated by the board that they had to have additional hospital room at Togus, Me., and I am directed by the committee to offer that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

State or Territorial Homes for disabled soldiers and sailors: For continuing aid to State or Territorial Homes for the support of disabled volunteer soldiers, in conformity with the act approved August 27, 1888, including all classes of soldiers admissible to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, $950,000: Provided, That one-half of any sum or sums retained by State Homes on account of pensions received from inmates shall be deducted from the aid herein provided for.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make the point of order against the proviso on the ground that it changes existing law. Congress, on the 27th day of August, 1888, passed a general law providing for the payment to the various States of $100 a year for each soldier or sailor admitted and maintained in Homes erected and supported by the States. There is absolutely no condition or qualification attached to the provisions of that bill. Acting under the authority of that law, and perhaps prompted in some degree by the provision it contained, twenty-seven States have established Soldiers' Homes, and twenty-one of the twenty-seven State Homes withhold or take from the soldiers a portion of the pensions which they draw from the Federal Government.

There is no law of Congress prohibiting States from availing themselves of this source of revenue. The State of Indiana has a Home in the district which I have the honor to represent, and it takes from every unmarried member all the pension above $8 a month, and from married members all pension above $12 a month, but that Home admits the wives and widows of soldiers, and for their support and maintenance it receives nothing from the Federal Government. Now, the point I make against the proviso is this, that it changes existing law in that it provides for the extinguishment of the liability of $100 each for the members of State Soldiers' Homes upon the payment of a less sum. I concede that Congress would have the right to appropriate for only a portion of the Federal liability under the act of 1888.

I concede that the House would have the right, under its rules, to impose limitations upon the appropriation. It might say that no part of the appropriation shall be used in the payment of the per capita support to any State Home where certain things were done, but that sort of a limitation would not extinguish the liability. The act of 1888 creates a liability on the part of the Federal Government of $100 a year for each soldier or sailor maintained in a State Home, and under the rules of the House no provision which undertakes to cancel and extinguish that liability for a less amount than $100 is admissible upon an appropriation bill. This is not a limitation. The Chair is familiar with the fact that the precedents of the House in relation to the question of limitations upon appropriations are in hopeless conflict, but there are certain principles which are pretty generally accepted and understood.

The difficulty has not been in relation to the principles, but in their application to the facts in the particular case when the Chair made the decision. A proper limitation upon an appropriation is a restriction to a use that already is authorized by law, and if the appropriation bill contains a less appropriation than that provided for by law it is in order, but it does not extinguish the liability, and when it goes so far as to extinguish the liability then it is new legislation: it is in contravention of existing law. There can be no question that this provision does cancel and extinguish the liability of the Federal Government to the various State Homes. On an examination of the reports of the various State Homes I find that the Federal Government takes from the Homes on this account upward of $43.000 a year.

If this proviso did not extinguish the liability, it might be in order as a limitation, but it does extinguish the liability. It makes the appropriation for the full amount provided by Congress and then proceeds to require the managers of the State Homes to be charged with certain funds in their possession in making the payments. The law might as well say that the managers of the State Homes should be required to credit upon the liability a portion of any other legitimate fund in possession of the Home.

Of course, if it be the judgment of Congress that State Homes ought not to withhold from members of the Homes any portion of their pensions, Congress has the power to say so. It has not said so. Congress has declared, in its management of National Homes, that every member of a Home who leaves a wife in dependent circumstances on the outside, or a family in dependent circumstances, must deposit for their support one-half of all the pension he receives. The State Home of Indiana, instead of doing that, admits the wives of the soldiers and their widows, and it takes a small pittance of the pensions of the soldiers in order to accumulate a fund for the promotion of the comfort and welfare of all the members.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that this is new legislation, that it changes existing law in the fact that it undertakes to extinguish or cancel a liability with an appropriation of less than the full amount. It undertakes to legislate that a fund which legitimately belongs to the State Home shall not be used by the managers of that Home in its maintenance, but that it shall be credited upon the per capita contribution under the law of 1888. Therefore I insist that it is a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question, the answer to which may perhaps throw some light on this subject. Does the gentleman say that Congress must make no distinction in the amount granted between those States which reserve a large part of the pension and those which reserve none?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Congress may do that by proper legislation; but in order to do it it would be necessary to go back and amend the law of 1888. It can not be done on a general appropriation bill. That law makes no distinctions at all. In order to accomplish that purpose regularly under the rules of the House there must be an amendment of the law of 1888. It can not be done on an appropriation bill under the rules of this House.

I think I have noticed in the last few years a growing disposition to enact legislation on appropriation bills. Rule XXI is one of the most wholesome rules in the code of rules that govern this body; and I believe that if the rule were enforced strictly and every bit of new legislation cut off from appropriation bills, the result in the long run would be beneficial. And I believe that no Member of the House can do a greater service to the country than to insist upon an enforcement of that rule.

Such legislation as that suggested by the Chair is entirely competent to be adopted by the House. Under the guise of a limitation, the House might distinguish and provide no part of an appropriation shall be paid to a State Home that withholds any portion of the pensions from the members that it admits and supports; because that would not cancel the liability. The managers of the Home would still have a claim against the Federal Government for the unpaid balance. But when the provision is put in such form that it cancels and extinguishes the liability, then it enters into the domain of legislation. It changes existing law. And that is exactly what this proviso does.

Suppose the proviso had said that a part of a fund received from local taxation by a municipality in which a Home is situated shall be credited upon the Federal contribution. Would it not be new legislation? And can the pending proviso be distinguished in principle? It would be giving a fund to the Soldiers' Home upon the condition that they take money belonging to them legitimately and give the Federal Government credit, canceling thereby and extinguishing absolutely and unequivocally a liability fixed by existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. As stated by the gentleman from Indiana, this statute was passed in 1888. It provided that payment be made to the respective States and Territories having Soldiers' Homes at the rate of $100 per annum for each soldier who was an inmate. There is a limitation, however, that "the number of such persons for whose care any State or Territory shall receive the said payments under this act shall be ascertained by the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, under such regulations as they may prescribe." Several years later an amendment was made in the appropriation as it appeared in the sundry civil bill, providing for payment under this statute with the limitation which appears as a proviso:

Provided, That one-half of any sum or sums retained by State Homes on account of pensions received from inmates shall be deducted from the aid herein provided for.

That proviso has appeared in every sundry civil bill for now more than ten years. That act, however, it must be conceded, is only effective as a change of law for the year for which the appropriation is made.

The question arises, Is this a limitation? It will be admitted that the appropriation bill could create a limitation by refusing the whole amount or a part of it. The question which then arises is, Can a limitation be effected by means of a classification of any kind?

Perhaps there might be a classification that $100 should be given to a soldier who was 70 years old, or more, and a sliding scale granting lower amounts for those of lesser age. Possibly a classification might be made in accordance with the service of each inmate of the Home.

But it is unnecessary to decide these questions in order to reach a decision in this case. It is perfectly evident that this $100 was specified because that was regarded as a proper compensation, or donation—for it is more a donation than a compensation—to the State for the care of each soldier.

Now, certain of the States—twenty-one out of twenty-seven, it is stated by the gentleman from Indiana—reserve a share of any pension of a soldier who is an inmate of one of these State Soldiers' Homes; and in view of the fact that it was thought that $100 for each was fixed by the statute as a fair amount to be assigned to these respective States, it was considered equitable to make a distinction. If any State received a part of that $100 from any other source—namely, a pension paid by the United States Government—at least a part of the amount received might be deducted.

It seems to the Chair that this furnishes ground for a proper classification, and that it is a proper ground for a classification which creates a limitation under the rule. It would seem to be hardly fair to pay the full amount of $100 to States which reserve a very considerable share of the pension, and pay only the same amount to those States which reserve no share of the pension. They are certainly on a different footing, and if no other ground existed the fact would afford a reason why this is a proper limitation.

The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. May I ask the Chair if, in his opinion, this extinguishes the liability of the Federal Government?

The CHAIRMAN. It would seem that that is not a question of parliamentary law; it is rather one of policy for the committee to consider.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, I desire to move, for the purpose of having this question standing in the morning, to strike out the proviso. There will be other amendments offered, and I understand the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. HEMENWAY] desires to make a motion that the committee rise. This will be in order in the morning.

Mr HEMENWAY. I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] may make his motion now.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I desire it to be entered now. I move to strike out the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] moves that the proviso on page 127, lines 12 to 14, be stricken out. Pending that motion, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BURTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 14416, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LINN COUNTY, MO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following request from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 30, 1904.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 8681) to detach the county of Linn, in the State of Missouri, from the western and attach it to the eastern judicial district of said State.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, this request of the Senate will be granted.

There was no objection.

MARY H. CORNELL.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. SULLOWAY, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 76) granting a pension to Mary H. Cornell, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

HOUSE RESOLUTION NO. 278.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. JENKINS, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of House resolution No. 278, and the same was referred to the Committee on Rules.

SENATE BILL AND RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill and resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 5188. An act for the relief of L. S. Watson Manufacturing Company of Leicester, Mass.—to the Committee on Claims.

Senate concurrent resolution No. 63:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to cause a survey to be made of the Mermenton River from its headwaters at the junction of Bayous Des Cannes and Nez Pique (including those portions of Lake Arthur, Grand Lake, and White Lake lying directly across its course) to a point in the Gulf of Mexico, beyond the bar at its mouth, with a view of ascertaining the cost of securing a permanent channel to a depth of at least 20 feet—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

LEWIS AND CLARK EXPOSITION.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request for the consideration of the resolution which I offered last evening. I understand the gentleman who objected yesterday will not now object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of a resolution which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That during the remainder of this session the bill S. 276, entitled "An act to provide for the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the exploration of the Oregon country by Capts. Merriwether Lewis and William Clark, in the years 1804, 1805, and 1806, and for other purposes," shall have the privilege of bills reported from committees having leave to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I know of some legislation of general importance that is not privileged legislation, relative to the Philippine Islands. I do not believe that I ought to permit or consent to giving this legislation such privilege over legislation of that importance.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana this will not affect that question in the least. If we can get it up, we can dispose of it in half an hour. In its modified form I do not think the House will have any serious objection or will require any considerable time for its consideration.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Do you believe you could get it through in half an hour?

Mr. TAWNEY. We could pass it in half an hour.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If I had any idea that you could, I would not make any objection. I do not like the policy of advancing legislation of this character to the position of privileged legislation under these circumstances.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will pardon me just a moment, this legislation is of just as high character as that which comes from the Committee on Appropriations. We provide $475,000 instead of $1,500,000. Of course the gentleman knows that legislation coming from this committee stands in the same position as that from the Committee on Appropriations relative to this character of legislation. If the bill should be considered and the House agrees to the amendment proposed by the House committee, it goes into conference and can be disposed of right away.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why did not the gentleman include the Jamestown celebration?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. For the present I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana objects.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communication was taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with a copy of a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, a draft of a bill for the disposal of lots in the Fort Crawford military tract at Prairie du Chien, Wis.—to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives providing for printing reports of the Director of the Mint, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate by unanimous consent proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 3,000 additional copies of the Report of the Director of the Mint on the Production of the Precious Metals for the calendar year 1902, bound in cloth and wrapped, for the use of the Director of the Mint.

Resolved, That there also be printed 3,000 additional copies of the Report of the Director of the Mint Covering the Operations of the Mints and Assay Offices of the United States for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1903, to be bound in cloth and wrapped, for the use of the Director of the Mint.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the first part of the resolution be read again.

The Secretary again read the first paragraph.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator if any copies of that report have been printed for distribution by the Senate and House?

Mr. PLATT of New York. None whatever.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I do not think 3,000 copies ought to be given to the Director of the Mint and no copies furnished to the Houses. It is a valuable document. These reports have been published for a great many years, and we have always, I think, been furnished with some copies for distribution. It seems to me there ought to be some provision that the Senate and House should have some copies of the publication.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I thought there had been heretofore provision made for printing copies for the two Houses. If the Senator will offer an amendment, I will accept it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I then move to add after the word "Mint," at the end of the first paragraph, the words:

And that an additional fifteen hundred copies of said report be printed and so bound, 1,000 for the use of the House of Representatives and 500 for the use of the Senate.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I accept that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL subsequently said: I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution providing for printing reports of the Director of the Mint was agreed to. I move that the House be requested to return the concurrent resolution to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10866) to amend section 68, chapter 23, of volume 28 of the United States Statutes at Large, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend section 68, chapter 23, of volume 28 of the United States Statutes at Large so that it shall read as follows:

Whenever in the division among Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of documents printed for the use of Congress there shall be an apportionment to each or either House in round numbers, the Public Printer shall not deliver the full number so accredited at the respective folding rooms, but only the largest multiple of the number constituting the full membership of each or either House, including the Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, and Doorkeeper of the House, which shall be contained in the round numbers thus accredited to each or either House, so that the number delivered shall divide evenly and without remainder among the members of the House to which they are delivered; and the remainder of the documents thus resulting shall be turned over to the superintendent of documents, to be distributed by him, first, to public and school libraries for the purpose of completing broken sets; second, to public and school libraries that have not been supplied with any portions of such sets, and, lastly, by sale to other persons; said libraries to be named to him by Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress; and in this distribution the superintendent of documents shall see that as far as practicable an equal allowance is made to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate.

Mr. PLATT of New York. The effect of the bill is to give to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and House the same allowance that other officers of the Senate and House receive.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BOARD OF MANAGERS NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. QUARLES. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 136) for appointment of members of Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, to report it favorably with an amendment, and I submit a report thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, in lines 4 and 5, to strike out "William R. Shafter" and insert "Henry H. Markham;" and in line 14, to strike out "Gen. William R. Shafter" and insert "Henry H. Markham;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

That Martin T. McMahon, of New York; John M. Holley, of Wisconsin; William Warner, of Missouri; Henry H. Markham, of California; Henry E. Palmer, of Nebraska, and Franklin Murphy, of New Jersey, be, and the same are hereby, appointed as members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers of the United States—Gen. Martin T. McMahon to succeed himself, his term of service expiring April 21, 1904; William Warner to fill a vacancy caused by the resignation of Col. Sidney G. Cooke, whose term of service expires April 21, 1906; Henry H. Markham to succeed Maj. William H. Bonsall, whose term of service expires April 21, 1904; Capt. Henry E. Palmer to succeed himself, his present term of service expiring April 21, 1904; Franklin Murphy to fill a vacancy caused by the death of Gen. Alfred L. Pearson, whose term of service expires April 21, 1906.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

CUMBERLAND RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. BERRY. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5259) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Cumberland River at or near Carthage, Tenn.," to report it favorably, without amendment.

Mr. CARMACK. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from Arkansas.

The Secretary read the bill, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that an act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Cumberland River at or near Carthage, Tenn.," approved March 2, 1901, is hereby revived and declared to be in full force and effect, and that section 5 of the act is hereby amended so to read as follows:

That this act shall be null and void if said bridge is not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the 1st day of April, 1903.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GREAT PEEDEE RIVER (SOUTH CAROLINA) IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. LATIMER on the 29th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause to be made forthwith a survey of that portion of Great Peedee River, in the State of South Carolina, lying between the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad bridge, in Marion County, and the city of Cheraw, with a view to improve the navigation of that part of said river by cutting across several bends or loops, thereby shortening the length and deepening the channel at those points, and that report be made as to the practicability of said work and its probable cost.

HEARINGS BEFORE IRRIGATION COMMITTEE.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. BARD, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such testimony as may be taken by the committee, and to have the same printed for its use, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

LIGHT-HOUSE TENDER.

Mr. PENROSE. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5146) to provide for the construction of a light-house tender for use in the fourth light-house district, to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report thereon. I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL and Mr. GORMAN. From what committee does it come?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. From the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read again.

The Secretary again read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to contract for the construction of a tender for light-house service in the fourth light-house district; and he is hereby authorized to provide for the construction, equipping, and outfitting, complete for service, said new steam tender for buoyage, supply, and inspection service, at a cost not to exceed $130,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BATTLE MOUNTAIN SANITARIUM PARK.

Mr. GAMBLE. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5242) to set apart certain lands in the State of South Dakota as a public park, to be known as the "Battle Mountain Sanitarium Park," to report it favorably with an amendment, and I submit a report thereon. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, before the bill is disposed of, I should like to make some inquiry about it. I wish to know from some one what area of land is included in the so-called "park?"

Mr. GAMBLE. There are about 2,700 acres. The proposed park is immediately adjoining the National Sanitarium for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Hot Springs, S. Dak. The object of the bill is to establish this park in connection with the above sanitarium, which is under construction. The sanitarium is under the control of the Board of Managers of the National Homes. The grounds of this institution now embrace an area of about 250 acres. The lands proposed to be included cover Battle Mountain and the table-lands adjoining. The mountain is an object of great natural beauty and of considerable historic interest. This enlargement of the grounds would form an interesting and important adjunct to the sanitarium.

The matter was referred to the Interior Department, and its views are submitted as a part of the report of the committee. The Board of Managers, I understand, are anxious these lands should be reserved and set apart for the purposes indicated.

Mr. TELLER. As this is a limited amount of land, I am not going to object to the bill. I wish to say that I am very much opposed to the establishment of Government parks. I do not believe it is a part of the province of the Government of the United States to be establishing parks. This is in connection with a Soldiers' Home or something of that kind, I understand.

Mr. GAMBLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. That being the case, I am not going to object. If the area was as large as is usually proposed to be included, I should object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was, in section 3, on page 2, line 18, after the word "That," to strike out down to and including the word "and," in line 17, on page 3, in the following words:

In all cases of unperfected bona fide claims lying within the said boundaries of said park, which claims have been properly initiated prior to September 2, 1902, said claims may be perfected upon compliance with the requirements of the laws respecting settlement, residence, improvements, etc., in the same manner in all respects as claims are perfected to other Government lands: Provided, That to the extent that the lands within said park are held in private ownership the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to exchange therefor public lands of like area and value, which are surveyed, vacant, unappropriated, not mineral, not timbered, and not required for reservoir sites or other public uses or purposes. The private owners must, at their expense and by appropriate instruments of conveyance, surrender to the Government a full and unincumbered right and title to the private lands included in any exchange before patents are issued for or any rights attach to the public lands included therein, and no charge of any kind shall be made for issuing such patents. Upon completion of any exchange the lands surrendered to the Government shall become a part of said park in a like manner as if they had been public lands at the time of the establishment of said park. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the issuance of any land scrip, and.

So as to make the section read:

That the State of South Dakota is granted the privilege of selecting from the public lands in said State an equal quantity of land in lieu of such portions of section 16 included within said park as have not been sold or disposed of by said State and are not covered by an unperfected bona fide claim as above mentioned.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OMAHA NORTHERN RAILWAY.

Mr. CLAPP. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3611) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act granting the right to the Omaha Northern Railway Company to construct a railway across and establish stations on the Omaha and Winnebago Reservation, in the State of Nebraska, and for other purposes,' by extending the time for the construction of said railway" by a further extension of time for the construction of said railway, to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONFIDENTIAL DOCUMENTS AND PAPERS.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on Rules to report favorably a proposed amendment to the rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. HOAR November 16, 1903, as follows:

An amendment intended to be proposed to Rule XXXVI of the Senate.

Resolved, That the rules of the Senate be amended by adding at the end of Rule XXXVI the following:

"V. Whenever by the request of the Senate, or any committee thereof, any documents or papers shall be communicated to the Senate by the President or the head of any Department relating to any matter pending in the Senate, the proceedings in regard to which are secret or confidential under the rules, said documents and papers shall be considered as confidential and shall not be disclosed without leave of the Senate."

Mr. HOAR. I do not think there is any possible objection to that amendment of the rules, and if there be none I should like to have it acted upon now. If the Senate wants further time, I will not press it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the resolution be considered now. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It has been read in full to the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let it be read by title again.

The proposed amendment was read by title.

Mr. HOAR. I may perhaps make a statement in a single word. It has been the practice of the Executive Departments, when they are asked by the various committees of the Senate for the papers relating to any nomination, to send all sorts of confidential communications bearing on the character of the appointee. Very often they are communications from active politicians in various parts of the country about the effect of certain appointments on political parties, and some of them are written in a very free and easy manner.

In President Cleveland's time the Judiciary Committee used to have a good many communications setting forth the demerits of various divisions of the Democratic party and the merits of others; and such papers come here under all Administrations. I suppose probably those papers are confidential under the rules now; but there has been some little doubt in the minds of some Senators whether they are or not, and it has been thought best to make it clear.

This is a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules. It merely provides that when any communications are sent to committees of the Senate in regard to matters which are themselves confidential by the President or any Department, those communications shall be treated as confidential unless the Senate shall order otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the resolution?

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. KITTREDGE introduced a bill (S. 5342) to provide for the temporary government of the canal zone at Panama, the protection of the canal works, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington submitted an amendment proposing to make available for the fiscal year 1905 the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $30,000 for the construction of additional suitable buildings, prison wall, additional lands, including clay deposits, and wharf for United States penitentiary at McNeils Island, Washington, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment providing that in the clause for continuing aid to State or Territorial Homes for the support of the disabled volunteer soldiers, etc., there shall be included the survivors of Indian wars who are pensioned under the act of June 27, 1902, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 for a survey, reconnaissance, and engineering investigation to determine upon a plan of reclamation for agricultural purposes of the overflowed lands of the valley of the Kootenai River, in northern Idaho and Montana, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FAIRBANKS (for Mr. PLATT of New York) submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $250,000 for acquiring, under the direction of the Secretary of War, additional land for the enlargement of Fort Niagara in accordance with the recommendation of the Army Board, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, announced that the President had on the 28th instant approved and signed the following joint resolutions:

A joint resolution (S. R. 53) authorizing the reprinting of certain documents to be sold by the superintendent of documents; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 55) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to print an extra edition of the map of the United States for 1904, and making the appropriation for maps made in the acts of April 17, 1900, and of March 3, 1901, available for that purpose.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on the 29th instant approved and signed the act (S. 4640) to supplement and amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River, and to establish it as a post-road," approved February 28, 1903.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had on the 30th instant approved and signed the act (S. 2323) relating to ceded lands on the Fort Hall Indian Reservation.

PAYETTE-BOISE IRRIGATION PROJECT.

Mr. HEYBURN. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, for which I ask present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish to the Senate a copy of the proceedings of the committee on organization of the landowners of the Boise and Payette valleys, Idaho, in matters relating to the securing of Government aid in support of Payette-Boise irrigation project, under the provisions of the reclamation act approved June 17, 1902, addressed to the Secretary of the Interior on March 4, 1904, by the general committee on organization of the landowners of the Boise and Payette valleys.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the resolution?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to say a word about the resolution in order that it may be understood.

After a great deal of labor the Department of the Interior has finally formulated a model or a method of procedure for taking advantage of the irrigation law. The matter came to me through a representative of the Department, and I present it to the Senate so that it may take such action in regard to it as it may think proper. I believe it is well to have a model of procedure in order to secure uniformity in the Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Let the resolution be again read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have no objection.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

LOUISIANA PURCHASE EXPOSITION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. ELKINS, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the Senate a copy of the report filed in the Department of State by Thomas W. Cridler, commissioner for Europe of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition.

Mr. ELKINS. I ask for the passage of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The word "requested" in the resolution will be changed to "directed."

Mr. ELKINS. Yes; I have inserted the word "directed." The resolution was objected to yesterday because the word "requested" was used.

Mr. LODGE. To whom is the resolution addressed?

Mr. ELKINS. To the Secretary of State.

Mr. LODGE. I did not catch the reading of the last part of the resolution. I desire to know what is the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

REPEAL OF DESERT-LAND ACT, ETC.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I rise, Mr. President, to what I understand is the unfinished morning business. I ask to call up Senate bill 5168, which, I think, is upon the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is on the table awaiting its second reading.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to speak to that bill for ten or fifteen minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill, on which the Senator from Wyoming desires to address the Senate.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5168) to repeal the desert-land act and the commutation provision of the homestead act.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator from Wyoming if he has any objection to yielding to me to call up a small bill, which is very meritorious?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the bill is short and will not lead to debate, I shall not object to yielding to the Senator for a few moments.

Mr. SPOONER. Has the bill anything to do with salmon?

Mr. FULTON. No; it has nothing to do with salmon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the bill does not lead to debate, I shall not object.

Mr. FULTON. I do not think it will.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Very well.

VOID ENTRIES OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. FULTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 278) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees, purchase money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands."

The bill was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator how much money the bill involves?

Mr. FULTON. I do not know the exact amount; but the passage of the bill is recommended by the Department of the Interior and has been recommended by several Secretaries.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think we ought to pass a bill appropriating money without knowing what the amount of the appropriation is to be.

Mr. ALDRICH. Or approximately.

Mr. LODGE. Or approximately.

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will allow me, I will briefly state; but if the bill is going to involve any discussion, I will ask to have it laid aside, because I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], who has the floor.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will suggest to the Senator, before the bill comes up again, that he either have a report from the Committee on Public Lands or from somebody else regarding it. There should be a statement as to how much money is involved, and what is the exact purpose of the bill.

Mr. FULTON. Before yielding the floor to the Senator from Wyoming, I wish simply to explain briefly what the bill is, and, it seems to me, when it is once understood there will be no objection to it, no matter what the amount involved may be.

Provision was made in the law that where persons entered lands within the limits of a railroad land grant they should be required to pay double the usual or minimum price.

It was provided in the law that if it should be afterwards discovered that the lands were not within the railroad-grant limits one-half of the price paid by them should be returned, but there was no provision for the repayment in case a grant should be forfeited because the railroad could not be built. This bill simply provides for the repayment to them of one-half in case the railroad has not been built and the land grant has been forfeited. That is all the bill amounts to and the only change it makes.

But I shall not ask to have the bill further considered at this time in view of the fact that the Senator from Wyoming has the floor.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to make a statement about the bill. I think the bill should be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands and be referred to the Interior Department. It involves a great expenditure of money; it involves all cases where any of these particular land entries—timber-culture entries, homestead entries, or desert-land entries—have been made and have been canceled for some reason. It involves the restoration of the fees paid to the Land Office. To pay back all those fees in all those cases would involve an enormous amount, and I do not think the bill ought to pass.

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will allow me, I will call his attention to a fact which he has evidently overlooked, which is that he himself reported this bill from the Committee on Public Lands in the Fifty-seventh Congress, and recommended its passage.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator is entirely correct. I did report such a bill at that time, but I did it through a mistake, which I have ever since regretted. I am not too old to learn. I feel it my duty here to protect the Government. When it is proposed to restore all these fees, for instance, in the case of homestead entries; when a man makes a homestead entry he is obliged to pay $4 to the Land Office and that goes in as a part of the fees. In the timber-culture entries—I do not remember just exactly how many fees there are—and the desert-land entries, you will find that this bill will involve over a million dollars. I should like to have the bill recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands and referred to the Interior Department, in order that we may ascertain approximately what it will involve.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is not before the Senate.

Mr. FULTON. I have no objection to the bill going back to the committee so long as the Senator from Minnesota apologizes for the report he has made.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that an order be entered that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands. Both Senators are willing that that shall be done, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to recommitting the bill to the Committee on Public Lands? The Chair hears none, and it is recommitted.

REPEAL OF DESERT-LAND ACT, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair again lays before the Senate the bill on which the Senator from Wyoming desires to address the Senate, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5168) to repeal the desert-land act and the commutation provision of the homestead act.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I feel that I owe something of an apology to the Senate for attempting to make remarks upon a bill which is not really before the Senate for its definite action. The bill to which I wish to call attention for a few moments is one which was introduced by the Senator from Montana [Mr. GIBSON], and has not yet been sent to a committee. I had intended, if that bill should go to the committee and be reported therefrom, to address myself at length to it and to conditions generally in regard to our public-land laws. I think, however, that in justice to myself, and in justice to the State which I in part represent, I ought not to allow the occasion to pass without calling attention to some of the features of our public-land laws, lest it be charged that I acquiesce in the sentiments which were expressed by the Senator from Montana a few days ago in favor of this bill, and in regard to the provision for the administration of our public-land laws.

Mr. President, I have lived in public-land States all my life. For the last twenty-five years I have lived in the arid region, that portion of the country over which the public-land laws at this time most usually operate. In all that time I have never seen it to my profit or interest to take advantage, under the laws of the United States, of my right as a citizen to enter upon one acre of land. Therefore I do not consider that I can be charged with having any personal or ulterior motive in the position which I take on this question. It is for the purpose of giving the observation which I have had, and my opinion as to what will work best, that I now address myself to this bill. Of course, I could not attempt in a limited time and without the data at hand to reply to the very elaborate speech of the Senator from Montana—probably I should be unable to do so in any event; but there are certain general statements made not only by the Senator from Montana, but by others, in favor of this proposed legislation, which I think call for some statement of fact.

I believe that whatever there is bad—and there are some things bad—in our public land laws and their operation comes from the fact that Senators and Representatives many times are not fully acquainted with the local conditions existing in parts of the country where those laws operate. I believe if this proposed repeal shall be carried out it will be because of a lack of understanding of the existing laws and of their operation. So far as I am concerned, I have no hesitation in saying that if this bill should become a law it would absolutely stop the development of the whole arid and semiarid country, which even now labors under many and serious disadvantages.

Many laws, good in themselves, when locally applied work a great disadvantage in the development of communiti s in the States. The forest-reserve acts, which had their inception in what was thought to be the good of the whole country, have been found to work badly in places, and by reason of their administration have set back progress in the very regions which they were designed to benefit. This is not the fault of the law. It has simply been because the law has not adjusted itself to the conditions as it has found them.

You would be surprised to know the amount of land that has been withdrawn from settlement, withdrawn from improvement, withdrawn from taxation in the States of the West because of the operation of the forest-reserve acts. In my own county, containing ten to twelve thousand square miles, as large as many individual States of the Union, the forest-reserve and the other reservation acts have operated to withdraw from settlement more than two-thirds of the entire area of that county. It is not the fault of the law. Everybody believes in forest reserves. Everybody believes in their utility. It is not the fault of the preemption clause of the homestead act; it is not the fault of the timber and stone act; it is not the fault of the desert-land act that the frauds, or some of them at least, of which the Senator from Montana complains have been allowed to go on.

I do not agree with the Senator from Montana that these acts were conceived in fraud and were passed through a gullible Congress for the purpose of despoiling the public domain. I do not believe, further, with the Senator from Montana that the extensive frauds which he cites are all frauds in fact. I believe in the operation of any law, whether it be the desert-land law, the timber-culture law, or the preemption clause of the homestead law, that will wrest one acre of ground from the arid condition where it has been profitless and make it taxable and producing prop rty.

Of course, it is possible for frauds to exist under any act; and I understand perfectly well that this is an opportune time to press this bill under the cry of fraud, because the air is surcharged with suspicion; but I am not yet ready to believe, nor am I yet ready to acknowledge, that our Western States are engaged in the one sole operation of stealing the lands of the United States from the public domain.

An instance from my own State was cited by the Senator from Montana in his speech, where 48,000 acres of land had passed into one ownership by virtue of the operation of the desert-land act. Very likely that is true, and, if I am not mistaken, I can say that the case he has cited is true, and there was no fraud nor attempted fraud in it. He intimates that 48,000 acres were taken from the public domain and taken for the purposes of the cattle barons, the sheep lords, and the land grabbers.

Those 48,000 acres, Mr. President, were taken to form homes for what now constitutes the most prosperous colony and farming community in the State of Wyoming. It was taken under a ditch company that was controlled by a former member of this body, and an honester man never drew the breath of life nor one more competent to tell what is for the good of his State, and, knowing what is for its good, to pursue it.

That company went to the expense of hundreds of thousands of dollars tunneling the mountains to bring water from the Big Laramie River into this tract of desert land, and the tract of 48,000 acres to which the Senator points as a monument of these land frauds the people of Wyoming point to with the greatest pride as one of the most prosperous agricultural communities in the State, and no farm there, so far as I know, has over 160 acres, and every farm supports a family.

Mr. President, it was only possible by the operation of the desert-land act that that colony could be established, and the purposes of this bill, if they had been carried out before the colony was established and before the entries had been made—that colony to-day, which is as fair as the Greely colony in Colorado, would have lain untouched by the plow or tree or drain.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. With pleasure.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from Wyoming paints a very glowing and a very interesting picture of the colony to which he refers, admitting, at the same time, as I understand him, that this 48,000 acres of land is in one ownership. Will the Senator tell the Senate by what process it got into one ownership?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will.

Mr. PATTERSON. And then by what process it became distributed out among a colony?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If I can give any information to the Senator from Colorado or anybody else, I shall be very glad to do it.

This land, as I understand, was taken under the desert-land act, which formerly allowed 640 acres and now allows 320 acres to every citizen of the United States and every citizen of a State or Territory who will reclaim it under the provisions of the law. I can not better answer the Senator's question, I think, in a general way, than by reading from the report of the Secretary of the Interior, Secretary Vilas, in 1888, which was also cited by the Senator from Montana. It is the same report from which the quotation was made in his speech a few days since, in referring to the land district at Cheyenne, Wyo., which was the particular district to which the Senator from Montana referred; and while I am not altogether sure that this tract that I speak of is this tract to which he referred, I am unable to find any other tract of like acreage that fits the description.

The Senator from Montana well stated that the Secretary of the Interior recommended the modification or the repeal of the desert-land act. The report from the Cheyenne office reads as follows—and to this I call the attention of the Senator from Colorado:

> Much desert land is so situated as to be almost impossible to reclaim by men of moderate means, but this difficulty is largely obviated by the organization of companies, which, by a recent Territorial law—

This was while Wyoming was still a Territory—> are required to furnish water at reasonable rates, while the corporations, formed under the old statute, are enabled to dominate large areas by granting water or refusing it at will.

Mr. President, this land passed into private ownership just as any other land passes into private ownership, and with just as much legality. There was no question of fraud raised in regard to this land being in private ownership.

Mr. PATTERSON rose.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator will wait just a moment, I wish to say that this land passed into the private ownership of this company—what it was I do not know—but the land was then divided up into 80 and 160 acre tracts, to be sold the same as other private land is sold, with the water rights, which water rights were sold at not to exceed the price fixed by the legislature of the Territory of Wyoming.

Mr. PATTERSON. Then, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, according to his statement, a private corporation was formed, which succeeded by some process in securing enough of desert-land entries under the desert-land law to aggregate 48,000 acres of land.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator must not understand me as saying 48,000 acres of land. It is a large body of land.

Mr. PATTERSON. Very well; there or thereabouts.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. Then this company, having put water upon the land and having got title, commenced to sell it to such purchasers as it could find at the price that it could get. If that is the fact, I want to ask the Senator from Wyoming whether a proceeding of that kind does not entirely frustrate the basic principle of our public-land laws—namely, that the lands shall be divided into small parcels among actual settlers?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Not at all, Mr. President; it exactly carries out the principle of our public-land system, because there are upon that 48,000 acres to-day 160-acre farms which would be a credit to any agricultural State in the Union. The result has been that this great tract of land, which would have lain there uncultivated until time should be no more, is now populated by farmers and reputable citizens, with their schoolhouses and churches. If that is fraud, we want some more of it in my State.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I want to submit to the Senator from Wyoming, if that is the way in which our public lands are to be disposed of, whether we ought not to change the system and create land laws by which corporations can get possession of tracts of land in any quantity to speculate upon, they investing their own money in ditches and then selling the land to small owners at such prices as the corporation can get from them. Is it possible to proceed in that way even under the desert-land law without fraud, expressed or implied, of a very grave character to be committed against the Government?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator's question is answered by his own knowledge. I was simply calling attention to the fact that was illustrated by the Senator from Montana [Mr. GIBSON]. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON], who is an able lawyer and who is familiar with all these laws, knows that under the present desert-land act no such body of land could be assembled, whether for good or ill.

Mr. PATTERSON. I know to the contrary.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the senior Senator from Colorado?

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know that I can locate the tract of land that the Senator from Montana referred to.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say to the Senator that I refer to the Wheatland tract, the one the Senator from Montana referred to, or I understand it is the one referred to by him.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that he referred to the same tract that the Senator from Wyoming is now referring to. If he did not refer to that tract, there is no other tract of that kind in the State of Wyoming.

I pretend to know something about this identical piece of land. That piece of land was taken up by an association of people who took up whatever the law allowed them to take and made assessments on themselves for the purpose of bringing it within the provisions of the law as to irrigation. When hard times came they found themselves unable to go on, and the enterprise practically broke down. Thereupon some people who had already put money into it took an assignment of the inchoate claims and completed the enterprise. Having completed it, they put the land on the market for sale.

If that is the company, as I understand it is, there never was any reason to suppose that it was an attempt to aggregate a lot of land in the hands of any one man; and if it turned out that it was aggregated finally into the hands of a number of men, a corporation which finally took it, it was because the original parties could not carry out the original enterprise, and no public service has suffered. On the contrary, as the Senator said, it has been the means of opening up that section of country for farming purposes as it never would have been opened up otherwise.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me one word in this connection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. PATTERSON. I want to remind the Senator from Wyoming that if he allows too many interruptions, he will be compelled to surrender a little time to me to reply to those gentlemen.

Mr. STEWART. I will not take up much time.

I wish to say a word in regard to the desert-land law. The desert-land law, whatever may be its evils, has one virtue, and that is that there has not been and can not be any monopoly of land under it, because it requires too much constant labor to take care of the land. If the work was completed, you could not give the land to a cattle company to keep it up, because they could not afford to keep it up. Desert land, when water is put upon it, and that has to be done, is the most productive of any land in the world. It can probably produce several crops in the same year, and it will produce a maximum crop every year without regard to the weather. It is most productive, but it requires a great many people and great care in distributing the water. A monopoly can not make any use of the land in that way. Wherever they have desert lands in large quantities, my experience in every instance is that they have been compelled to sell it to other people in order to make it profitable. It is not profitable to hold any large quantities, because there is too much detail, and a stock company can not irrigate it and raise stock in large quantities. I think it is the best antimonopoly law we have ever had upon the land subject. I want to give that testimony from experience.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I thank the Senator from Nevada, and I was about to mention that feature of the desert-land law, because I am free to confess that the desert-land law, of all the laws mentioned in this bill, is the one in which the people of my State are most concerned. Upon the desert lands of Wyoming, have arisen, by virtue of the operation of this law, three-quarters of all the farm homes in that State. I doubt if there has been 1 per cent of what even the Senator from Montana with his liberal construction would call "fraudulent desert-land entries" in that State. It has been under that law that our greatest advancement has been made. It has been under that law that the most taxable property has been put upon the rolls.

Now, it is true, as the Senator from Nevada says, that the desert-land law is the one law of all the laws that we have upon the statute book which is not, if any are, an incentive to fraudulent entries. It costs too much in time and money and brain and brawn and hardship to get title from the United States under the desert-land act for a man to use it for a fraudulent purpose.

I believe many Senators do not understand what that law means. People have been given to understand by the Senator from Montana and others that all a man has to do is to invoke that law and to go out and take unlimited quantities of the public domain wherever he can find it. I will tell you what he can do under the desert-land act, and I will tell you what he must do to obtain title from the Government of the United States under the desert-land act. If he is a citizen of Wyoming to-day, he can go and select 320 acres upon the public domain, by metes and bounds, provided it is arid land. He can not take that land under the desert-land act if it produces even a good crop of native grass. He can not select it under the desert-land act if it produces cottonwood trees upon the bottoms. It must be absolutely desert land, unfit for cultivation in its present condition.

Then, if he wants to take that, he can go to the land office of the United States and file upon it, provided he shows to the land office of the United States that under the laws of the State of Wyoming, or Montana, or wherever he is operating, he has obtained from the State engineer a permit to take a sufficient amount of water out of some of the living streams properly to irrigate that land and raise crops. Then he pays 25 cents an acre as a starter.

Within a year from that time he must go to the land office of the United States and show by proof absolute and abundant that he has expended a dollar per acre for his 320 acres in the reclamation of that land and in applying water to it; and he must do that same thing the second year and the third year; and if he fails in any one year his title is gone and his claim has vanished. And at the end of that time, if he can comply with all the rules of the land office and all the rules of the engineer's office, he can go up and by paying a dollar an acre more to the Government of the United States obtain a final certificate for his 320 acres of land.

Four dollars and a quarter an acre and three years of his life must be spent to take 320 acres of land upon the public domain. There is no law upon our statute books that is so guarded as is the desert-land law, and yet it seems to be the pivotal point of attack of this bill.

It was urged by the Senator from Montana and others that we were not wise in our day and generation; that the people who live in the Western States have not a just appreciation of what we have and ought to have. It is urged that the Secretaries of the Interior and the Commissioners of the Land Office from 1881 down have united in agreeing that all our land laws are vicious save one, the original homestead act.

Mr. President, I would not detract one iota from that splendid piece of constructive statesmanship which graced the birth of the Republican party—the homestead act—which gave 160 acres to every man, a citizen of the Republic, who wanted it as a place to build a home and to rear his children. Notwithstanding the Secretaries of the Interior, the experience of western men in the arid region now is that of all the laws upon our statute book the five-year homestead act is the one least calculated to secure homes and least calculated to be honestly administered.

Where, I ask the Senator from Montana or any other Senator, will he go to find 160 acres upon the public domain in the arid regions where a man, unaided by any other land law and without money, can live for five years? Nowhere in all that arid country. The desert-land act and others were passed to aid the settler. They have aided the settler.

Right here I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the homestead law, which everybody concedes was a good law, has itself been the vehicle for some fraud. Had the Senator from Montana searched long enough through the records of my State and of the land office he would have found that the homestead law has been the medium for fraud there, and I will explain what I mean.

The homestead law as amended provides that any soldier who has served in the armies of the United States may take a homestead upon the public domain, and that he need not reside thereon five years, but that he can have deducted from his five years' residence such length of time as he served in the armies of the United States. Many soldiers did not take advantage of that provision. Many soldiers of our armies did not take homesteads upon the public domain. The law was extended to embrace their widows and their orphans; but the law does not require, as it has been interpreted, that they are to live one day upon the homestead. The law permits the guardian to enter for the orphan, but the law does not require him to live one day upon the homestead. The consequence is that some shrewd, sharp lawyer, finding out how he could collect a lot of land available for his purpose, conceived the idea of getting assignments of these widows' claims. It is true they had to be upon the land. They had to designate somewhere the land which they wished to take.

The consequence was that carload after carload of widows of soldiers from Iowa, from Illinois, from Missouri, and other places came in there and were taken by the agents out to the land and set up a sign, "I, the wife of So-and-so, take this as a homestead." She had complied with the law. Under the rulings of the Interior Department and under the homestead law the 160 acres became hers at that time, to dispose of as she saw fit. It required no residence to hold it. She could lease it; she could sell it; she could do as she chose with it. That is the only case I know of and the only law that I know of which in my State has been made a medium for fraud.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Wyoming to the fact that the bill now before the Senate does not provide for the repeal of that law.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; that condition of affairs can still continue under the homestead law.

The Senator from Montana, as I started to say, urged that we repeal these laws because the Interior Department, from time to time, has urged its repeal and the others. Mr. President, I have the greatest admiration for the men who have filled the office of Secretary of the Interior. I believe it is the greatest Department under the Executive of this nation.

I sometimes wonder that they are able to get along as well as they do under the vast amount of business that crowds upon them. Especially is this true in regard to the Land Commissioner. One can hardly imagine that one officer, with a few clerks provided for him, could dispose of the immense amount of business that comes before him. As a rule, we have had men at the head of that Department who were intelligent, capable, businesslike men. Too often, Mr. President, we have had there at times men whose lines of training had run in different directions—men who were able to deal with vast business propositions, but men who, unfortunately, were ignorant of the true situation and of the proper application of the land laws.

It is not strange, then, that from time to time, under the hue and cry that has been raised among certain classes for the repeal of the laws, that they should be brought to recommend their repeal.

But the one man above all others who has administered the affairs of that great Department with a full knowledge of the situation with which the Department was called upon to deal, the man above all others who dealt in that Department in a way to preserve the integrity of the public domain, in a way that none who knew of the operation of the Land Office or the general Department at that time failed to speak of in the highest praise—that one man now living will not be found, I apprehend, upon the floor of the Senate Chamber to-day urging the repeal of these land laws. Their modification may be necessary, but their repeal, as I stated in the beginning, would retard beyond redemption the advancement of those States.

Mr. President, speaking of the matter of repeal, I think it is but fair to say in connection with the recommendations of the Interior Department and the Executive that the last utterances of the executive department have come here within thirty days.

The Interior Department and all the other Departments of the Government, when they are shown a condition that exists, can well modify their former opinion in deference to the good of the public service. The commission was appointed by President Roosevelt to deal with the question of the public lands. From somewhere, from all over, springing up like a gourd in the night—where it came from we can not any of us exactly tell; where it came from we all of us think we pretty well know—came a demand and pressure upon the Administration for the repeal of the desert-land act and for the repeal of the commutation clause of the homestead act.

The President of the United States has been declared in some quarters to be an unsafe man. The President has been declared a rash man, who acts upon impulse; but in this thing, which concerns such a vital interest in our country, the whole arid region, he acted with a consideration, with a definite purpose, with a deliberation that have put him far away from the characterization which was given him on the floor of the Senate yesterday.

The President appointed a commission to visit this country where the laws operate, to see what should and what should not be done. That commission consisted of the Hon. W. A. Richards, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, than whom no man has known more about the public lands; F. H. Newell, and Mr. Gifford Pinchot, of the Forestry Bureau of the Agricultural Department. These three men undertook no investigation, except to find things as they existed. If anything, I think it is safe to say that they were prejudiced in favor of the repeal proposition. They did not make their investigation in the General Land Office in Washington. They took the train and went from place to place over the western country.

I happened to be present at one of their meetings in the city of Cheyenne, and there were gathered there in the house of representatives representative men from every part of the State—cattlemen, sheep men, farmers, ranchers—everybody interested in any way in the public-lands question. Their investigation was minute in detail and intelligent. Now, this is the last utterance of the Interior Department upon the proposition of repeal:

The commission is of the opinion—

This was sent to the Senate in a message from the President March 7, 1904—

The commission is of the opinion that the desert-land law should, for the present at least, be allowed to stand, with a few changes in detail. With the experience of the past for guidance, it is possible to enforce this law so that its essential provisions shall be complied with. When this is done it is evident that the entrymen will have earned a patent at an expense too great for speculative purposes.

That is the present recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior after a careful study on the ground of the operation of these laws.

Now, if there have been difficulties in the past, if there have been frauds in the past, I undertake to say that it has been the fault not of the law, but of the administration of the law. We can pass laws providing the punishment of hanging for murder, but murders will be committed. We can pass the most beneficent law under the shining sun, and culprits will still be found. You can have the best land laws that it is possible for the wisdom of man to conceive, and there will now and then be a rascal.

But with these land laws, as I say, it is a question of administration, of enforcing the law, and I undertake here and now to say that no man can take an acre of land under the desert-land act and make it the means of fraud if the law is executed as it is written. And the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior, through the President of the United States, say in the last utterance of their Department that it is now possible so to enforce the law.

Then, Mr. President, who is it demanding its repeal? Who is it that says the waters of our streams in the West should still run between the banks? Who is saying that the waters shall not be diverted under the desert-land act to make homes? Is it the settlers in those States? Show me anybody or any association of homebuilders in the West who are demanding the repeal of these laws. Is it those who are concerned principally with the upbuilding of their individual localities? They know full well that 640 or 320 acres of land redeemed from the desert become at once an asset of prosperity.

Mr. President, the only people who can possibly profit from the repeal of this law must be the men who are urging it. It seems to me if there ever was a logical statement on the face of the earth, that is it—the men who are urging it are the men who will profit from it. I do not believe with some Senators that these laws were put upon the statute books at the behest of any lobby. I do not believe that this desert-land act was passed because certain people in California wanted it enacted for a nefarious purpose. Neither do I now believe that any member of this body or of any other legislative body is seeking this repeal from ulterior motives. But I do say that the men who will make something out of its repeal are the ones who naturally want it repealed.

Now, who are they? What would be the effect upon our public lands if this bill should become a law? It would at once take out of the operation of the public-land laws of the United States every acre of land in the western country, because I undertake to say here and now that the possibilty of a homestead entry under the old law without the commutation clause is practically an absurdity in the arid region at this time. The water courses have long since been taken up. As I say, it would then practically wipe out the opportunity of any man to obtain public lands under any of the land laws of the United States. But the public land would still be sold. How? It is familiar to us all. We all know that the Congress of the United States has from time to time donated vast tracts of land to transcontinental railways, and I for one believe that that is one of the wisest actions the Congress ever took.

I am not one of those who decry the land grants to the great railways. We would not have had them without the grants. But every alternate section for miles and miles became the property of these land-grant roads. By and by the forest-reserve policy came in, and forest reserves were created without reference to the ownership of the land over which they were thrown. The consequence was, especially with reference to one of our great northern transcontinental roads, that hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of thousands of acres of railway land fell within the forest reserves.

The railway, finding its land grants within the forest reserves, immediately took pains to protect itself, and under the provisions and operations of law for every acre within a forest reserve it could take an acre outside of the forest reserve by surrendering the former. The consequence is that this exchange scrip or these exchange certificates, whatever you may be pleased to call it, are to-day in the hands of parties who formerly owned the land or had purchased it. That man can lay his 160 acres of scrip upon the public domain where he pleases, land law or no land law. If he has 40,000 acres of scrip, he can lay 40,000 acres in a chunk wherever he pleases, land law or no land law.

The great scrip holders to-day, the men who have lieu-land scrip, who have forest-reserve scrip, which has a certain marketable value always, are the ones who are pushing most adroitly and most effectively this legislation, because it means that every acre of their scrip, if we wipe out the United States of America as a land giver, will be worth twice as much to-morrow as it was before the law was passed, and why should they not be in favor of the repeal?

Mr. President, I undertake to say, and I say it with a full knowledge and with responsibility for my words, that never in the history of public-land legislation has there been such a determined and such an insistent lobby as has been behind this proposition for the last three years to repeal the land laws of the United States.

It is no secret that they have a bureau established here in this city for that purpose. It is no secret that they maintain a weekly organ of publication devoted to this and to this alone. It is no secret that one of the greatest of these holders boasted in a public speech at a banquet within the last two months that his company alone had contributed $25,000 to this propaganda.

Now, Mr. President, it is not the settler, it is not the man who is building up by hard knocks and hot summer work——

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the Senator from Wyoming state what railway man he has reference to, or what company he has reference to?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not think it is necessary. I will tell the Senator in private. I do not think it is necessary to exploit that upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. PATTERSON. It seems to me that a thing of that kind ought to be made public. We ought to mark it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. As long as the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Montana are not charged, I do not think there is any need of bringing in any particular name.

Mr. GIBSON. It should be given for the information of the Senate.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If any Senator desires the name I will give it to him with pleasure, but I shall not make public that name upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. PATTERSON. The name of the man or of the company ought to be made known and branded, so that he or it would be known wherever he or it went from one end of the country to the other.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I apprehend the Senator from Colorado will find no difficulty in ascertaining the name of the man and in reading the speech, because it has been published.

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not know——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I shall be very glad to give both Senators the name of the man.

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not know the extent of the Senator's knowledge. I only know that I have no knowledge of a lobby.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I speak with a good deal of warmth and perhaps a definiteness that I ought not to use, but I state all I know about it. I did not hear the speech. I read the newspaper report of the speech. It has never been denied in any form, although reference has been made to it.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator speaks of a lobby. Who constitute the lobby?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, the Senator must not ask me to go into those things. The Senator himself knows who constitute the lobby.

Mr. PATTERSON. I want to say to the Senator——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. He knows this propaganda, too, as well as I. I am not going to be drawn into any personal allusions whatever in any part of my remarks.

Mr. PATTERSON. I want to say to the Senator from Wyoming——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am only speaking of lobbying in connection with this bill, because it was charged in the speech that the desert-land act originally had its conception in the wishes of such a lobby.

Mr. PATTERSON. I want to say to the Senator from Wyoming, Mr. President, that when he says I know the lobby or know anything at all about it, he speaks a little hastily and without justification.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will withdraw that statement.

Mr. PATTERSON. There is not a word of truth in that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I intended to say that I thought the Senator must have observed what was going on.

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, yes; I know there is quite a feeling in the country at large in favor of the repeal of these laws. I want to say that I sympathize very deeply with the effort, and it is because I live in an arid State that I do; and it is because I live in an arid State that the fact has been brought to my attention that in Colorado and Wyoming eight acres of land out of ten to which title has been given in the last twenty years have been obtained fraudulently and not for agricultural purposes at all.
